The Talk of the Sanctum

Who's Who in This Week's Issue

Mr. George Perry Morris, who characterizes for us Sir Auckland Geddes, is the Washington correspondent of The Congregationalist and a member of the staff of The Advocate of Peace, published by the American Peace Society, also the staff of the Washington Herald.

Rev. Isaac Ogden Rankin, the author of our series, "Little Pilgrimages with the Fathers," is Associate Editor of The Congregationalist. Pilgrim history has been one of his special interests for many years.

Rev. George Lawrence Parker is a Congregational minister who is giving his time at present to writing and lecturing, and in the intervals to farming, at his home in Falmouth, Mass. He is writing for us a series of "Knockabout Papers," based on incidents and observations gathered during his lecture trips.

Rev. Edwin H. Byington, who discusses the question, "May vs. December," is pastor of the Congregational church in West Roxbury, Mass., a member of the faculty of Gordon Bible College, and among our national leaders of Congregational affairs.

Dr. Mary Alice Emerson is specially qualified to conduct our Department of Religious Drama by her connection with the Religious Education faculty of Boston University. She has written and produced a number of pageants on religious subjects.

International Council Numbers

Next week's Congregationalist and Advance will contain a report of the opening of the International Council of Congregational Churches in Boston. It will go to press during the early days of that great convention. The paper of the following week, the issue of July 15, will be enlarged and will contain interesting comprehensive reports of the various sessions and events relating to the Council in Boston. Orders for extra copies of this special issue—at 10 cents per copy—should go to the Circulation Department as soon as possible.

In the Circulation Department—

Cheering words of appreciation of the real value of our paper come to us daily from all over the country. That you may know what others are thinking and have the courage to write (even at the risk of making us vain), we will quote from some recent letters which have come to our office.

"Since coming to New England from California in 1895, I have been a subscriber to the paper, and think it would be hard to do without it. There is so much that is helpful, instructive and uplifting. I wish you all success in the good work, . . ."

"The Congregationalist is taking a broad and fine stand on the problems of the day and should be in every Congregational household in the land.

"Heartiest congratulations for the fine works of the paper."

"We believe every home ought to have, not only a religious paper, but The Congregationalist and Advance, for there is none other just as good."

"In a word of appreciation let me say that I thoroughly enjoy every word of it, and wish that every family might have it to read, as the very best thoughts from the very best people are found among its pages."

A New Slogan for America

We are about to celebrate another Independence Day. May it bring afresh all the old pride in the land we love, all the old joy that, whether by birth or by adoption, we are Americans. As soon as we awake to greet the dawn of this glad holiday shall we not bow in humble prayer of gratitude to the Father of all Nations for this our country, and especially for all it symbolizes of freedom, of justice, of opportunity; for all it has been; all it is and all that it may be? And then and there ought we not, in the spirit of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, to pledge, as they pledged, our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor—that we may be true to the trust that is ours as Americans?

The words, "America First," suggest a noble sentiment and a great patriotic purpose, but they have become a sinister slogan of demagogues with unworthy, selfish appeal. What should we make our slogan for this coming Fourth of July? Perhaps we might get it from that little band of Pilgrims whose coming to America three hundred years ago we celebrate this year. They laid the real foundations of this government. They brought the Pilgrim spirit, which inspired the Declaration of Independence, the spirit that is America —America at her best.

The Pilgrims of the Mayflower, the signers of the Declaration of Independence and our great first President all builded better than they knew. We do well to honor their memories, to cherish their spirit and, as far as fits the times, to emulate their example. But none of them knew or dreamed of twentieth-century America. None of them caught the vision, then afar, of the world we know today, the world that is bound about with wires and rails and ties of business and the common causes of mankind, the world made one great neighborhood by flashing messages and speeding carriers of goods and men.

And so, a broader, bigger, bolder plan befits America today than we can find designed upon the trestle-board of yesterday, and so the founders' plan must be enlarged. If we did not adapt it to our times we should be false to them. Only by daring the adventure of advance wherever duty's pathway runs may we be true.

A war-torn, starving and chaotic world looks to America, the rich, the strong, the free. We served, we fought for, we helped to win a righteous cause in war. We gave the nations a new vision of a law-linked, organized and peaceful world. We stood in honor pledged to help our allied comrade nations in the mighty common task of making that new vision a reality. And then—we sadly disagreed among ourselves—our leaders quarreled, quarrel still—and still we wait. But the world goes on—on in distress, in strife, in poverty, still needing us—and still we only see that plan of yesterday upon the trestle-board.

Have we forgotten that our Christian faith writes large the Brotherhood of Man?

Does love of country really mean that we must fail to love and serve and help to save the world?

What, then, shall be our slogan for this Independence Day?

Can we not see it in the flaming starry flag that thrills the heart of every true American? Does not that flag symbolize service to all beneath the stars, and float as an emblem of the Brotherhood of Man?

Inspired beneath that flag, a mighty host of heroes of the Pilgrim faith have served and ventured far. They have given their lives to help their fellow men in every land beneath the sun. Theirs is the spirit we should emulate today. And for these times shall not our slogan be: WORLD BROTHERHOOD?

WHAT THE CHRISTIAN WORLD IS DOING

Annual Conference of New Missionaries

OVER sixty of them! The largest number gathered in fifteen such conferences that has preceded it! They came to get information and inspiration from those who conducted the conference. They gave far more than they will ever realize in their winsome personalities, their optimism and their enthusiasm. The conference met in the American Board Rooms in Boston, June 18-23. Thirty-seven are to be credited to the American Board. Rev. Alden H. Clark, Candidate Secretary, has spent a busy year in selecting these choice recruits out of many applicants. The Woman's Board of Boston furnishes thirteen. Sixteen come from the Woman's Board of the Interior, and the Woman's Board for the Pacific furnishes one. The varied types of service they are to render are evident. There are six ordained men, five doctors, three trained nurses, an expert financier, a trained agriculturist, a domestic art specialist, teachers for colleges and kindergartens and general mission workers. They are as well trained as they are varied in their life purposes. Already registered are nine married couples, not to mention those about to be.

Among the number are Miss Aldyth Eaton, daughter of ex-President Eaton of Beloit who is a member of the Prudential Committee of the Board, who goes to teach in Spain. Robert W. Fairbank is a son of Rev. and Mrs. Edward Fairbank of India. With his sister in India the Fairbank family will register 100 per cent. in the mission field. Miss Laura Cross, who goes to North China, has a brother there, Rowland M. Cross. She is a sister-in-law of Governor Burnquist of Minnesota. Mrs. Markham, wife of Rev. R. Finney Markham, whose field is Turkey, is the daughter of Rev. and Mrs. J. P. McNaughton of Constantinople. Miss Jessie Martin, who goes to Central Turkey, is the daughter of Rev. and Mrs. J. C. Martin of that mission. Miss Margaret Welles, going

EDITORIAL

Welcome, International Council!

For Boston where it is published, for American Congregationalism which it represents and for itself, The Congregationalist and Advance extends the heartiest of welcome to over two thousand official representatives of Congregational churches in the United States, Canada, Great Britain, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Hawaii and other lands, who are now assembled in the city where the faith of the Pilgrims and Puritans was established nearly three hundred years ago.

It is fitting that in this Tercentenary year the Council, which held its second and its only other American meeting in Boston in 1899, should now return thither. Boston, more than any other large American community, has been for three centuries an unfailing fountain of intellectual and spiritual life. From it have proceeded those influences—educational, philanthropic, missionary—which, under the banner of Congregationalism and in the interests of a broad and aggressive Christianity, have blessed the world.

Boston is still a storehouse of power. Within fifty miles of the State House are some of the strongest churches, the ablest ministers and the most devoted laymen and women of the denomination. They have taken pleasure in preparing for this great assemblage of Congregationalists from all over the world.

But Boston is by no means the only host of the occasion! Nation-wide Congregationalism is represented in the provisions for guests, in the program and the accessories. The gathering will be an exhibit not of one section or one type, but of the varied elements that constitute American Congregationalism. The West, the South, the Pacific Coast are sending men and women who have done yeoman's service in the newer parts of the country. They have built the frontier churches, started and maintained the institutions of learning. To them are to be credited adventures and achievements that redound to the honor of the denomination and the welfare of mankind.

Equally interesting are the delegations from Canada and overseas. If certain of the older statesmen are missed from the British group, it represents worthily the strength and aggressiveness of the elements now at the front and sure to be increasingly influential. It is also good to see those fellow workers and fellow soldiers in the gospel who come from the Antipodes, from the isles of the Pacific and the regions where Congregationalism has rooted itself through the labors of missionary pioneers and their no less consecrated successors.

The Boston meeting inaugurates a long series of gatherings in different parts of the world that will celebrate the landing of the Pilgrims. It ought to set the pace and determine the dominant notes that will be struck in many a subsequent assembly large or small. The world still has need of the witness and the service which Congregationalists are peculiarly qualified to offer.

At a time when the extremes of opinion among Christian thinkers are very far apart, Congregationalists owe the world a new and strong expression of their simple vital faith in Christ and his gospel. At a time when in both church and state the tendency is either toward unregulated liberty and sheer independence or toward the assumption of autocratic powers, Congregationalism, if it be true to its traditions, must find and follow a middle path both in civil and ecclesiastical organizations. At a time when all institutions are being judged from the point of view of their contribution to the commonwealth Congregationalism must not hesitate to subject its churches, its colleges and schools of theology, its missionary agencies, its interdenominational relationships to the same crucial test.

The Boston Council of 1920 should be worthy of the Landing of 1620 which it commemorates. It should look forward more than it looks backward. Its pride in the record of 300 years should be quite subordinate to its desire to make the next ten years glorious in visions cherished and service rendered.

Political Questions and Hopes

Since the adjournment of the Republican Convention in Chicago sentiment among Republicans continues to be divided, but with evidence of a trend toward unity. On the one hand the conservatives seem to be satisfied with the platform and the nominees. The majority of those who normally vote the Republican ticket seem to be lining up and, while they await Mr. Harding's speech of acceptance before final alignment, the more moderate liberals find encouragement in Mr. Harding's attitude and expressed purpose of uniting all factions, recognizing the liberals as well as the conservatives. But on the liberal side there is continued disappointment that the platform does not express more of moral earnestness, and especially that it does not take a stronger position in favor of the League of Nations.

For the present, at least, we do well to assume that Mr. Harding will really represent the best thought of right-minded citizens and that a broad and fair constructive policy of domestic problems will be developed under his leadership. May we not also assume that, in a similar way, his foreign policy may come to be in accord with the best thought and the highest ideals of our times. Another hope in Mr. Harding is in his apparent purpose, as reported, if elected President, to surround himself by a Cabinet of strong men in which the liberals shall be well represented.

In some ways it may be an advantage that the platform does not say more on some controversial subjects. It is not so much the platform which matters, after all, but it does make all the difference in the world what kind of men are elected to high office and what their personal attitude is toward public questions.

As we go to press the Democrats are gathering for their convention in San Francisco. Strong conflicting elements are in evidence there and big moral questions are at stake, not the least among them being national prohibition and our international relationships. May moral purpose have more weight than political expediency, and when the issues are fairly established may we not hope for a creditable campaign on both sides, and may the results be worthy of America.

The sixteenth annual conference of the American Board with newly appointed and prospective foreign missionaries, as reported on another page, was held in Boston last week and the week before. Such conferences emphasize the challenge of missions—the challenge to young people to devote their lives to work of evangelizing the world and the challenge to the members of our churches to support the cause with hearty interest, generous giving and constant prayers. These are days of unprecedented opportunity in mission lands and days of great need for more missionaries. Shall we not rise to the call with the determination to become more intelligent as to the needs of the field and to do our part, whatever that may be?

Congregational World Movement Plans

The Congregational World Movement is a "going concern," and reports steady progress of returns from the churches that continue to respond to the call of the Emergency Campaign of the past spring. The leaders of the Movement are talking over plans for the coming year. During the meetings of the International Council in Boston the Survey Committee of the Movement will meet and undertake to prepare a tentative budget for next year, and beginning the evening of July 6, at the close of the Council, the Commission of One Hundred will meet in Boston when its plans will be more definitely determined.

One important question is whether the next Every Member Canvass shall be in December or in the spring. Opinion is divided, but there seems to be a probability that the spring may be preferred. Something in the nature of a simultaneous canvass by other denominations is probable either under the name of the Interchurch Movement or otherwise, and many of our leaders feel that we should gain a decided advantage by having our canvass when others have theirs. Rev. E. H. Byington speaks for many who prefer the December date in a short article on another page in this issue. The size of next year's budget must be substantial, but will not be excessively large.

There is hope that the Congregational World Movement may prove an effective means of helping to gear up denominational interests and finances more effectively than ever before, but many details remain to be planned and the earnest sympathy and support of all our churches is needed for the whole Movement.

Working Toward Reunion

While the work and worries of the world go on and the political conventions are in session the joint commission appointed by the Protestant Episcopal General Convention and our own Council has been quietly at work. We print in another column its preliminary statement of the questions at issue—a statement upon which the Commission has unanimously agreed. It indicates the method and the spirit in which they propose to take up the great task and responsibility committed to them.

It is a great advance that each of these representative delegations should so fully and cordially recognize the point of approach of the other. We all at different times and for different purposes speak of the universal or of the individual church. In a time when there is a striking recrudescence of factional bitterness and aggressive proclamation of extreme opinions is common it is well to remember that at heart all Christians are at one in loyalty to the Lord of the Universal Church, and that the unity for which he prayed must be sought and found in the central and common sphere of agreements and not at the extremes of tradition and prejudice. We continue to cherish grave doubts concerning the precise method suggested of effecting a common working basis between the bodies. Nevertheless we have hopes that there will come out of this consultation a clearing of the air and some approach at least toward the outward expression of an admitted inward brotherhood.

A Warning on Autocracy in Justice

Perhaps the most striking of the baccalaureate addresses this year was that of Former-Justice Charles E. Hughes at the centenary of the Harvard Law School in which he commented on our tendency to change liberty for certain forms of autocracy. We are too much given, he thinks, to attempt legislation in which "there is too little evidence of perspective and an abundance of elaborate and dreary futilities."

> "Our material progress," he said, "seems to have created complexities beyond our political competency, and disregarding the lessons of history there has been a disposition to revert to the methods of tyranny in order to meet the problems of democracy. Intent on some immediate exigency, and with slight consideration of larger issues, we create autocratic power by giving administrative officials who can threaten indictment the opportunities of criminal statutes without any appropriate definition of crime."

As a lawyer's and judge's point of view Mr. Hughes's apprehension that though we went to war for "liberty and democracy" it has followed that we have "fed the autocratic appetite," and suffer from a continuance and misuse of the war powers, is interesting and admonitory. The ideal of law making is that the statutes should be clear and comprehensive enough to meet and provide for experiences as they arise. And the ideal of executing the laws is that courts should be fair and impartial, leaning, if necessary, to the side of the weak in matters of patience and of procedure. But Mr. Hughes tells us that in practice there has been an often unrebuked tendency to use the powers conferred on judges and prosecutors autocratically and unfairly so that "we find a growing tendency on the part of prosecutors to resort to grossly unfair practices."

In support of this view he quoted a recent statement that

> During the last year no less than forty-four convictions were reversed by appellate tribunals in the United States for flagrant misconduct of the public prosecutor or of the trial Judge whereby the accused was deprived of a fair trial. In thirty-three of these cases the District Attorney made inflammatory appeals to prejudice upon matters not properly before the jury. In three of them the District Attorney extorted confessions or coerced witnesses by palpably unlawful methods. In four, witnesses were so browbeaten during the trial as to prevent the accused from fairly making his case. In two, the trial Judge interposed with a high hand to extort testimony unfavorable to the accused or to intimidate witnesses for the accused. It is significant that these cases come from every part of the country and from every sort of court.

This is an admonition which we must heed if we are not to deprive the common man of his right to full and impartial justice. Mr. Hughes has done well to call public attention to a tendency which if carried farther might put unfair opportunities within the grasp of the powerful as against the plain citizen ignorant of his rights or unequipped to assert and defend them.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Iron Fetters

I rode upon a Train; and the day drew on toward Evening, and the Porter came to make down my Berth. And I sat for a time in the next section, where was a man and a young man. And the Man said, Sit here if thou wilt. And he moved over. And when I sat down, behold, there was something hard under me. And I Essayed to remove it, but I saw what it was, and I pushed it into the Corner of the Seat, for I did not desire to publish unto the people of the Car what I had found. And I said unto the man, I am not very familiar with this kind of Ornament.

And he said, It belongeth unto me.

And we talked of other things. But I saw the young man's ankles that they were bound with an heavy strap, so that he might walk a little in the Car, but take short steps only. So that not every one noticed that he was bound with Fetters.

And in the Night I heard in the berth that was next to mine the Clank of the Fetters. For the Sheriff took off the strap and placed the iron fetter upon the ankle of the lad, one fetter upon the lad's ankle, and one upon his own. And this had they done for Four Nights. Even all the way from Seattle to Syracuse.

And I listened unto the clank of the Fetters, and it grieved me that it should be so. And I considered that he that bindeth his fellow man is bound with him; and the Keeper of a Prison is himself a Prisoner; and the fetters of iron wherewith a man may manacle another man bind him also.

Now in the evening I had not spoken unto the young man of his bonds. Neither did I let him see that I had noticed him. But in the morning the Sheriff spake unto me, and he said,

This young man and I have slept for four nights in the same berth, bound foot to foot, and neither of us have slept any too well. And last night we spake of thee: and I said unto him, I think that he is a man of God. And now, behold, the lad desireth to speak unto thee. And it may be that thou canst say good things unto him. For we have come from the Coast, and we get off at Syracuse, and then he goeth to jail to await his Trial.

So I sat with the young man, and I asked him no questions, but he told me many things. And the Burden of it all was this,

I have a good Father, but I thought he was too strict with me, and a good Mother, but I thought she was an Old Fogy. And I loved the Bright Lights and the Praise of the Gang. And I saw in the Movies how easily one might be Rich, and I wanted some Easy Coin. Therefore have they brought me back twenty-five hundred miles for Grand Larceny.

And I spake unto him such words as God gave unto me. And I said, Think not that the chain of iron upon thy feet is thy worst Fetter. For behold, thou wast chained already when thou didst covet that which was not thine own: and in throwing off the yoke of thy father and the advice of thy mother, thou didst become the Prisoner of Evil.

And he said, Verily, I know it.

And the Sheriff said, He is not a bad kid at heart: but thus is it with the man that despiseth the law of his father and disregardeth the tears of his mother.

Now the train reached Syracuse and there was a Patrol Wagon backed up at the Curb. And I said unto the young man,

Tell the truth, whatever it shall cost thee. Take thy medicine, however so bitter it may be. Beware of evil companions. Seek forgiveness and help from thy God. And see that thou die not until thou make thy mother proud of thee.

And he asked me for my name, and the name of the City where I dwelt. And he said, One day I shall come to see thee; and then shall be no bracelets on my wrists, neither straps nor irons on my legs, but I shall be honest and free.

And I said unto him, If the Son of God shall make thee free, thou shalt be free indeed.

In Brief

The best remedy against worry in the world-changes is a serene and quiet mind. The best receipt for serenity of mind is a simple faith in Christ and obedience to his commandments.

We should all be thankful that in the case of the Republicans at least the Vice-Presidency did not go, as it has done more than once, to a man whose chief qualification for the office was his money bags.

We are all glad to know from his specialist's report that President Wilson "is well on the road toward recovery." He certainly must have powers in reserve if as a sick man he is able at once to attend to the duties of his office, look after the San Francisco Convention and recover health.

One of the laws which failed of attention in the last session of Congress was that which was intended to make lynching a crime under Federal law and to be tried by the Federal courts. The latest—we wish we could say the last—instance of this crime is written against the fair fame of Richmond, Va.

President Butler of Columbia has done the obvious thing, if not quite completely or cordially, in making a public retraction of the charges in "words spoken under the strain, turmoil and fatigue of the Chicago convention, and in sharp revolt against the power of money in politics," which he acknowledges "were both unbecoming and unwarranted." But the fact remains that the primaries, as at present managed and with no public restraint upon the lavish use of money for what in themselves may be quite proper purposes, are a defect in our political system which should promptly be considered and amended.

Is it quite fair to criticize the entire Interchurch movement as "financially and morally unsound," as did Rev. W. L. Sperry of Boston the other day, because it sought to obtain money from men who are not Christians? Nearly every church and missionary enterprise draws a portion of its support from those who have never openly confessed Christ before men. Until the local church disdains all such assistance we can hardly expect missionary administrators to confine their solicitations to "devoted men and women who make their sacrifices on their knees." Where the Interchurch people made their big mistake was in depending on outsiders for so large a sum. But it was a mistake in judgment and not a moral delinquency, and does not vitiate the good the Movement has done. It should be a valuable lesson to all who have the responsibility of raising money for religious ends. We agree with Mr. Sperry that the chief reliance of Christian missions must always be Christian men and women. At the same time it is true in this recent campaign the giving by some people who had never before given to missions proved the beginning of a new personal interest in the church and in the things of Christ.

It is always a delight to put on record the story of a heroine, and not least when she is only nine years old. We do not wish to depreciate the fame of that Polish boy of about the same age who is a genius in the game of chess. But Louise Depuis, to whom has just been awarded the Henri Fortin prize of 500 francs, which is given each year in France in recognition of some exceptional act of heroism or devotion, has worked in a more important sphere. Louise was the oldest of a family of six children in Paris when her mother was killed by one of the shells which the Germans threw into the city from their big hidden gun. The father was faced with the necessity of sending the six to be brought up in a public institution when Louise stepped into the breach and undertook the job. She was then seven years old. For two years she has not only affectionately but also effectively mothered the five and they have prospered. What a girl of nine thought of the public presentation with appropriate speeches by a committee at the Trocadero Palace we can only guess. But it needs no guessing to be sure that she had no difficulty in seeing ways of spending the 500 francs for her family—unless her father in the usual French fashion at once set it aside for her dot when she was married. It is the genius for helping in the family fortunes and managing the family affairs which has more than once made the financial recuperation of France possible after the wreck of successful or unsuccessful wars. We are rather surfeited just now with portraits of people who are, or who wish to be, more or less, in the public eye, but we confess that we would like to see a good portrait of this nine-year-old little-mother Louise Depuis.

to Marathi Mission, is Secretary Patton's niece, and joins her sister, Miss Carolyn A. Welles. Mrs. C. E. Crawford, who with her husband is going to Africa, is the daughter of the late Rev. H. G. Bissell. Miss Helen Hawkes has not yet been assigned to any field. She is the daughter of the celebrated Hawkes family of which the father and six children are all engaged in the ministry or missionary work. Africa draws the lion's share, eighteen, but the strategic wisdom of the Boards is shown by their getting ready to put seventeen new workers from the group into Turkey at the earliest possible moment.

Impressive Services

"THE Missionary and the Board," "The Missionary and His Home Constituency," "The Missionary and His Field," "The Missionary and His Work" were the subjects presented by the secretaries of the Board. Rev. Edward H. Byington of West Roxbury gave a fine interpretation in his address of "The Temper of American Congregationalism." The culminating service centered about "The Personal Life of the Missionary," and was held with addresses by Dr. Edward C. Moore, President of the Board, and Secretary Clark, concluding with the Communion, in Central Church, conducted by Dr. E. P. Drew of Auburndale.

One service of especial impressiveness was that in the nature of a God-speed to the candidates on Sunday evening held in Park Street Church, redolent with missionary history. Over 200 Endeavorers from Greater Boston occupied a greater part of the galleries. The whole atmosphere was charged with exuberant spirits. Secretary Clark presided and fourteen of the missionaries made addresses that were models of brevity and wit, and yet full of impressiveness. The total effect of the service on the packed church was immensely stimulating. The joining of old days and the new was indicated in the participation by Rev. A. W. Clark, D. D., a missionary of the Board for forty-eight years in the Czechoslovak Mission. An international character was furnished by the inspiring address of Rev. Nelson Bitton, Home Secretary of the London Missionary Society.

Such a conference, with so large a group of choice young men and women ready to go to the field, not only white for the harvest, but even whiter than ever before, constitutes a mighty challenge to us at home for their unqualified support through prayer and gift. It means a great challenge also to others of our young people who are in their collegiate days and training. The field calls for more, MORE, MORE.

Returns to Labrador

DR. and Mrs. W. T. Grenfell arrived in St. John's, Newfoundland, last week en route to their Northern home. The Doctor has found it necessary to secure some other boat than his hospital ship Strathcona for his summer work "on the Labrador," because of the length of time required for necessary and immediate repairs on this ship of mercy, so long in service. It is possible that the boat will be condemned as beyond repairing and a new boat may be necessary. Meanwhile, it is the Doctor's hope to secure the loan of one of the Canadian Government navy boats for use this summer. A summer without Dr. Grenfell and his familiar boat on the Labrador would be lamentable, especially this year of greater needs existing all along the coast. Two Amherst College men left June 16 to take the yawl Northern Messenger from St. Anthony through the Straits of Belle Isle to Harrington Hospital, Labrador. Twenty-five helpers, including medical men, graduate nurses, dietitians and teachers left Boston the same day for St. Anthony, Pilley's Island, and other stations of the Grenfell Mission.

Sir Auckland Geddes

The New British Ambassador to the United States

By George Perry Morris

Jenny Geddes, who threw the stool at the head of the officiating bishop in St. Giles Church, Edinburgh, in 1637, had a very undiplomatic way of expressing her dissent from ritualism. I suspect from impressions gained by several hearings of the new ambassador that, while he will not throw stools, he will speak plainly and argue logically, if necessity demands. For he is a massively built, powerfully geared, forthright speaking personality with a scientist's love of verity, an educator's interest in fundamentals, and an administrator's liking for realism. Using the symbolism of the dog family, he is of the mastiff breed, whereas Lord Reading, a predecessor made you think of the lithe wolfhound and James Bryce was an inquisitive, affection-breeding, vigilant terrier. Spring-Rice and Viscount Grey I never saw. Nor did many other Americans.

A Democratic Diplomat

Ambassador Geddes, like Viscount Bryce and unlike Spring-Rice, is to be an ambassador to the American people as well as to the government. You can see that by the zest he already has shown in getting in touch with our representative academic, commercial, quasi-political and religious gatherings. Being a Scot, he is going to do it with greater facility than Lord Reading the Jew or Spring-Rice the English upper-class product of Oxford and the Foreign Office and diplomatic service could. For the Scot and the Yankee have many affinities. Their theologies, philosophies, democratic theories of education, inventiveness and likenesses as shrewd traders account for this. To this general equipment Ambassador Geddes will add the other asset of knowing and having lived in Canada, our cousin on the North, a New Scotland that steadily wanes in its British colonialism and as steadily waxes in its affinities for the United States, a sister nation.

Though a scientist by training and a surgeon by profession and a proved efficient administrator during "the War," the new ambassador is a humanist and a humanitarian, rightly diagnosing the world's greatest needs at the present time as ethical and spiritual; and this though he is fully aware of the powerful effect that diminished production of food, destruction of property and wreckage of civilization's physical body, are having on the tasks of statesmen who are salvaging the world.

Religion and Ethics

This was shown markedly one Sunday afternoon soon after his arrival in Washington, when he appeared with Vice President Marshall at a meeting held in the interests of the Interchurch Movement. As a listener it took him some time to get on to the curves—to speak colloquially—of the facile, witty, quaintly humorous Indiana lawyer whose piety and naïve religiosity were not of the sort that runs rampant in London or Edinburgh or Montreal. But his austere aspect altered as the "Little Sycamore of the Wabash" began to preach the truth that is universal as to why nations rise and fall, as he flayed the wicked who profiteer by and during war, and as he vitriolically denounced the selfish, nationalistic policy of the Senate and its obstruction to the cause of international good will.

Consequently when the Ambassador's turn came he was tuned up. Under prudent restraint, but with the color of the inner fires giving a glow to his stern words, he got right down to business. Not for him any of the flowery amenities of a mere orator. He took up the "hymn of hate" against materialism, selfish nationalism, mere commercialism and a utilitarian theory of life, where the American stopped. His terminology revealed not the amateur in discussion of religion and ethics but the man who could speak unto laity and clergy present the language they understood. Part of it was biblical and part of it was contemporaneous. All of it was vital.

He struck the same note when he gave the commencement address at the Central High School, and also when he spoke at the recent great conference of the Chambers of Commerce at Atlantic City. So will he at the International Council of Congregational Churches in Boston.

The Newer Diplomacy

It is a pleasant prospect that we Americans face as he goes up and down the land speaking as opportunity offers. His great passion, for which he is to take great risks of misunderstanding, is to induce the people of this country to deal fairly as well as frankly with Great Britain as the process of world-reconstruction goes on. His purpose apparently is to play the rôle of an exponent of the "newer diplomacy." He has the great advantage of not being mixed up personally with any of those recent chapters in British diplomacy that implicate it in the war. There is no Lord Loreburn who can indict him as Viscount Grey stands indicted, superior as he undoubtedly was to the ruck of diplomats with whom he had to deal. Ambassador Geddes stands much nearer Lloyd-George than the Asquithian Foreign Minister did, and he will be far more of a persona grata at the White House than the much-praised veteran diplomat of the old school ever could have been, even had he abstained from playing into the hands of the senatorial cabal that was manœuvering against the Treaty's ratification. Grey was an imperialist. Geddes is to be a maker of the "British Commonwealth," which events already are showing is to be a much more democratic state than the empire, one far more decentralized, far less ruled by caste, and far less bent on exploitation.

Ambassador Geddes had Presbyterian ancestors. He attends the Church of the Covenant, the leading local Presbyterian church. He will know how to speak to a council of Puritans and Pilgrims without confounding Calvinism and Wesleyanism or adulating Episcopacy. He may even set forth the claims of theology more convincingly than any divinity school professor.

Washington, D. C.

FACE TO FACE

By Pauline Frances Camp

No, I have never seen him face to face;
But I have spoken in his listening ear.
Have tasted freely of his saving grace;
Have proved his promises and felt him near.

I have not seen him face to face; what need?
When day by day, his tender love and care,
Wrap me around; when I can with him plead
My heart's desires, and know he answers prayer.

Not face to face; not yet! but hand in hand!
As he has willed it, I would have it so.
But some sweet day, I shall in his own land,
Behold him, and his glorious beauty see!

Little Pilgrimages with the Fathers

VII. Why the Pilgrims Left Holland

By Isaac Ogden Rankin

We must always keep in mind the determining fact that the twelve years of the Pilgrim Church in Holland almost exactly covered the period of the famous twelve years' truce of the Dutch with Spain. Bradford himself puts that first. The Pilgrims were no cowards, as their escape from England shows, but they were loath to fight and this was not their quarrel. To stay on in Leyden was to accept a share in a probable experience of war with what in outward seeming was the most formidable fighting power on earth. Leyden itself was a witness of what that war might mean. There were men and women not yet old, neighbors of the Pilgrims in the red-roofed houses of Leyden, who had been to the verge of starvation in the famous siege, who had themselves hunted rats and mice for food, and joined with feeble voices in the hymns of praise when the rescuing fleet sailed in among the treetops.

When we ask, therefore, why it was that the Pilgrims were not content, why they did not let well enough alone in Leyden, this was the first reason. There was a shadow of war over their pleasant places.

AT HOME IN LEYDEN

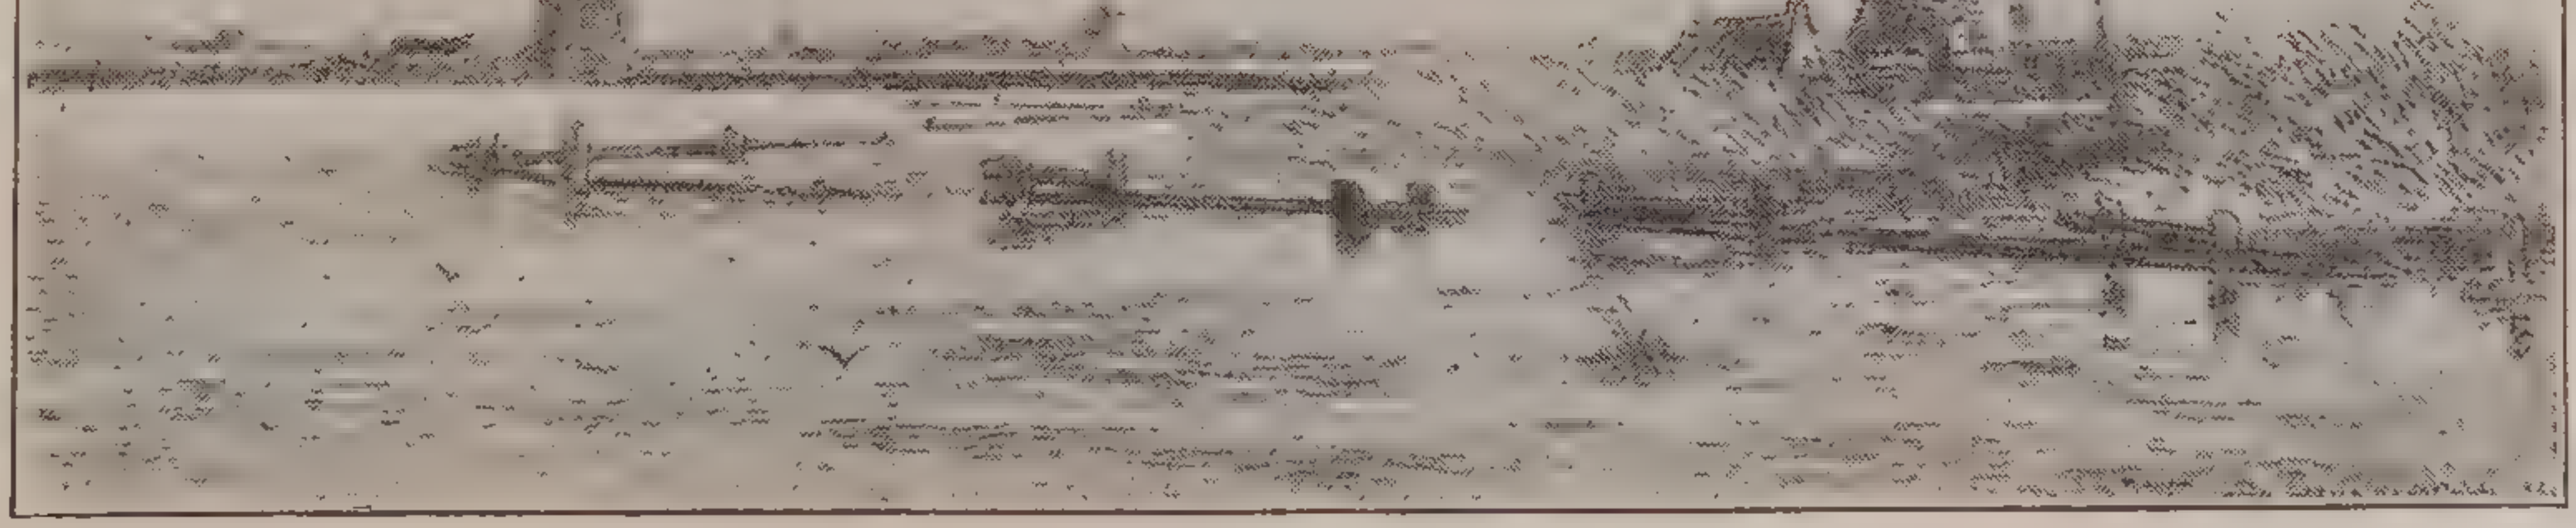
That the places they had made for themselves in that friendly city were pleasant, though the work was hard, there can be no doubt. Here is Bradford's testimony; in which you will notice that the word comfort is three times used: "And at length they came to raise a competent & comforteable living, but with hard and continuall labor. Being thus settled (after many difficulties) they continued many years in a comforteable condition, injoying much sweete & delightefull societie & spirituall comforte togeather in ye ways of God, under ye able management of Mr. John Robinson, & Mr. William Brewster, who was an assistante unto him in ye place of an Elder, unto which he was now called & chosen by the church."

The company of the Pilgrims had increased threefold since they came to Leyden. They had the good report of their neighbors. Their credit was ample: "And first though many of them were poore, yet ther was none so poore, but if they were known to be of yt congregation, the Dutch (either bakers or others) would trust them in any reasonable matter when yey wanted money. Because they had found by experience how carefull they were to keep their word, and saw them so painfull & diligente in their callings; yea, they would strive to gett their custome, and to imploy them above others, in their worke, for their honestie & diligence."

THE SPANIARD AND TURK

This shadow of war hung both in the East and South. Spain, which really at this time was like a hollow shell, weakened by its loss of industrious citizens in the recent expulsion of the Moors, with a bankrupt treasury, had at this time the greatest appearance of power. It held Portugal and with it all the Portuguese colonies and possessions in that world of the Indies which had been the bait for Columbus when he sailed west to win a short way to the East. All America except the north seemed to lie in the Spanish grasp. And in America the North offered to the invader neither gold nor jewels. Had there been a gold mine on Cape Cod the Spanish would no doubt have been in possession and there would have been no place secure for the Pilgrim Fathers when they came. Tobacco was to be the gold mine of Virginia, but there was no tobacco then upon Cape Cod.

PASTOR ROBINSON'S HOUSE, LEYDEN



THE RHINE NEAR LEYDEN

You must remember that these wars of Europe in the time of the Pilgrim migration were wars of religion as well as of dynastic ambition, and cruel accordingly, as wars of religion have always been. Philip of Spain could not find means to drive back the Turk because he spent his strength to fight and kill and burn the heretic. Two years before the Pilgrims sailed for America the war that was to last in Germany for thirty years broke out. It was in a sense King James' war, for he had married his daughter to the Prince Palatine who was the Protestant leader. The Battle of Prague, which ruined the hopes of the German Protestants and left them helpless until the Swedes under Gustolphus Adolphus came to their assistance, was fought while the Mayflower was in mid-Atlantic and it was long before the Pilgrims heard of it. But beyond Germany was the shadow of what might have seemed a greater danger still, the danger of the Turks.

THE CLOUD IN THE EAST

It is difficult for us to remember that in the time when Robinson and Brewster and Bradford were studying maps to find a refuge for the Pilgrim Church—a refuge which would be also an open door of opportunity for spreading the good news of Christ—a large part of the Mediterranean was a Turkish—or at least a Moslem lake. Like Spain, Turkey was really weaker than she looked, but the turning of the tide of her victories had not yet come. Venice and Poland and Hungary and the Knights of St. John, who, driven out of Rhodes defended Malta, were the outposts of Christianity. There was a lull in the Pilgrim time because the Turks were fighting in Persia. Then the wave of conquest moved west again. The Pilgrims had been eighteen years in Plymouth when the Turks first captured Bagdad. They had been there forty years when Crete was captured from the Venetians. who had held it for four centuries, after a siege of more than twenty years. It was against the Turks that Othello the Moor fought as an admiral in the Venetian service. That great adventurer, navigator and administrator, Captain John Smith, had fought the Turks and been a slave in Turkey before he sailed the Atlantic with a company for Virginia and brought order out of the chaos at Jamestown. And Bradford, Winslow, Brewster had long been dead when the Turkish wave of conquest broke at its high water mark on the walls of Vienna in 1683 under the attack of John Sobieski, King of Poland.

But the point to remember is that the Moslem, and especially the Turkish conquests, shut and barred the old gates of access to the East by way of the Eastern Mediterranean and Egypt. Therefore within five years, not much more than a century before the Scrooby Pilgrims left for Holland, the Cape of Good Hope was discovered by the Portuguese, Bartholomew de Diaz, and America by Columbus, an Italian in the service of Spain. They were both looking for a way to the Indies which would avoid the way which the Turks had closed. And as a reward to Spain and Portugal the Pope divided the unknown world between them by a line drawn north and south with his ruler on the map.

But in so dividing the new-found or rediscovered world the pope had not consulted either Holland or England or France. They all sailed east and west through the newly opened doors. France sent a colony to Florida, which was destroyed and its people massacred by the Spaniards. In the year that the Pilgrims went to Holland, Champlain founded Quebec. While the Pilgrim Church was beginning to feel at home in Leyden, the Dutch built their city of Batavia in Java.

THE SHADOW OF PERSECUTION

But war was not the only shadow whch hung over the "comfortable" Pilgrims in their new home in Leyden. There was a shadow of persecution. With the Pilgrim leaders it was not merely a case of the burned child which dreads the fire, though they never could forget the experience which Bradford has recorded, when they were "Hunted & persecuted on every side. . . . For some were taken & clapped in prison, others had their houses besett & watcht night and day, & hardly escaped their hands." We have seen how King James attempted to prevent their settlement in Leyden and recent researches have revealed how he followed them and tried to have them driven out. Brewster and Brewer, when they had set up their printing press for printing books which could not be printed in England, were before long forced to flee by the interference of the English king and church and Brewster was long in hiding. And they all knew that they could not go back to England without danger of arrest.

Thomas Hutchinson in his History of Massachusetts Bay, published in 1764, sums up the situation: "Bigotry and blind zeal prevailed among Christians of every sect or profession. Each denied to the other what all had a right to enjoy, liberty of conscience. To this we must ascribe, if not the settlement, yet at least the present flourishing state of North America. Persecution drove out Mr. Robinson and his church from England to Holland about the year 1608."

So heavy was this shadow of persecution that it explains the exultation of Governor Bradford when, in Plymouth, long after the settlement, he heard of the overthrow of King Charles and the bishops in the Puritan revolt: "Doe ye not now see ye fruits of your labours, O all yee servants of ye Lord that have suffered for his truth, and have been faithful witnesses of ye same, and ye, little handfull among ye rest, ye least among ye thousands of Israil?" To be rid forever of all fear of persecution and interference with their following of the truth they knew was in itself motive enough to take up their journey from comfortable Leyden into the unknown continent across the sea.

The Shadow of Controversy

Another shadow which hung dark above the thoughts of their leaders was the shadow of controversy. The Pilgrims were not by nature or by practice a quarrelsome folk. Only a few of them had education enough to follow questions of theology. Least of all, at the bottom of his thought, was the pastor, Robinson, a lover of strife, for all that he was pushed and persuaded, much against his wish, into the great controversy over Calvinism which raged in the Dutch churches and especially in the University of Leyden. He was an effective fighter, for he had logic and clear utterance, but his farewell utterances to the Pilgrims show no controversial spirit. But the Pilgrims had seen the fruits of controversy in the quarrels of friends and the breaking up of families. They had seen how Prince Maurice used a theological dispute for the advancement of his own autocratic power and, just before they left, as a pretext for the judicial murder of Holland's greatest citizen, John of Barneveldt, following the disputes and condemnations of the Synod of Dort. And they had been observers of the quarrels and divisions of the English exiled churches in Amsterdam and elsewhere on the continent. It was on that account that they had kept themselves apart in Amsterdam.

The spirit of the Pilgrim Church was wholly different, as the Dutch authorities bore testimony when they rebuked the French Protestant (Walloon) Church in Leyden for their quarrels, holding up the Pilgrims as an example: "These English," Bradford reports them as saying, "have lived among us now this twelve years and yet we never had any sute or accusation come against any of them; but your strifs and quarrels are continuall." It was different when they came to barter with King James for his permission to settle in the wild lands across the sea over which he claimed authority. They were ready then, under the stress of need, to yield every point except the central one of the authority of each church to choose and commission its own ministers. The king might make as many bishops as he chose and they would not quarrel with his right or their authority. But they would not, and did not, acknowledge the authority of these bishops over them. The right of the king and of the laws of England they would not dispute; but when they reached the wilderness where those laws did not extend or apply they made laws for themselves, as their Saxon and Danish forefathers had done, to suit their present need and surrounding circumstances. But they were neither controversial nor quarrelsome folk.

The Shadow of Worldliness

What these clear-sighted and far-sighted leaders of the Pilgrim Church feared most of all for the future of the church was the shadow of worldliness. Their own people were changing rapidly before their eyes in comfortable Leyden. The old folks were dying, the children were going to the schools of the town, were learning Dutch and playing with Dutch children. Bradford had crossed the Harlem Lake back to Amsterdam to marry a wife, and there were other marriages. Many had taken out papers of Dutch citizenship, because without citizenship they could not be admitted to the trade guilds and without membership in the guilds, the trades unions of the time, they could not get work in Leyden. And the growth of Dutch wealth and prosperity in the still days of the truce with Spain notoriously tended toward careless and luxurious living.

I have already quoted Bradford's reference to "fair and beautiful cities, flowing with abundance of all sorts of wealth and riches." They themselves were too few to influence the customs of the people about them and their children were manifestly being influenced. "But that which was more lamentable and of all sorrowes most heavie to be borne," says Bradford, "was that many of their children, by these occasions (the hard-working poverty and narrow living of their parents, that is) and ye great licentiousness of youth in yt countrie, and ye manifold temptations of the place, were drawn away by evill examples into extravagante and dangerous courses, getting ye raines off their neks, & departing from their parents. Some became souldiers, others tooke upon them farr viages by sea, and other some worse courses, tending to dissolutnes & the danger of their soules, to ye great greefe of their parents and dishounor of God. So that they saw their posteritie would be in danger to degenerate & be corrupted." In Hutchinson's words: "The manners of the Dutch were too licentious for them."

It must always be remembered that the Pilgrims were but a drop in the bucket—a very little drop in a single bucket—of Dutch life. The Dutch were themselves more or less a mixed people. There were many disbanded soldiers among them. The zest of their piety had been a little rubbed away by controversy and church polities. They were a busy, not always considerate folk, much taken up with their own affairs. "Blunt" is Shakespeare's adjective for them. And their wealth was tending to a kind of luxury which alarmed the country-bred, almost too serious-minded Pilgrims.

Dutch Life and Taste

There is a picture of Dutch life a generation later than the Pilgrim's stay in Leyden, which is interesting in itself and throws a little light on that result of the Dutch wealth and self-indulgence which tended toward what the Pilgrims meant by worldliness. It is taken from the "Brief Character of the Two Countries," published by Owen Feltham in 1652:

"Their houses, especially in their cities, are the best eye beauties of their country. For cost and sight they far exceed our English, but they want their magnificence. Their lining is yet more rich than their outside; not in hangings, but in pictures which even the poorest are there furnished with. Not a cobbler but has his toys for ornament. Were the knacks of all their houses set together there would not be such another Bartholomew Fair in Europe. Whatsoever their estates be, the houses must be fair. Every door seems studded with diamonds. The nails and hinges hold a constant brightness, as if rust there were not a quality incident to iron. Their houses they keep cleaner than their bodies; their bodies than their souls. Go to one, and you shall find the andirons shut up in net work. At the second, the warming-pan muffled in Italian cutwork. At a third the sconce clad in Cambric." There are numerous pictures of low life and revelry by famous Dutch painters which reflect the vulgar tastes of certain classes of the people, but which the wealthy bought and hung in their houses. Evelyn tells us in his Diary how he found the shops in Amsterdam full of these records of vulgar mirth and drunken revelry and sent a number of them home to England.

The contrasts of these tastes and this display with the Pilgrim poverty was great; and greater still the contrast with the Pilgrim manners and the Pilgrim thoughtfulness. And this dread of worldliness went so far with the Pilgrim leaders as to become a dread of extinction. "So as it was not only probably thought, but apparently seen," writes Bradford, "that within a few years more they would be in danger to scatter, by necessities pressing them or sinke under their burdens, or both." In Hutchinson's words, again: "In a few years their posterity would have been Dutch and their church extinct."

The Pilgrim Ambition

Now the extinction of the church would be its failure in a mission and a testimony, the loss of a great and precious hope. They had not come out of persecuting England to lose themselves like the flow of a river in the desert, or like the currents of the Rhine at Leyden in the sand dunes of the shore. Therefore we may be sure that Governor Bradford, looking back from peaceful Plymouth over the long course run, had reached the deepest thoughts of their hearts in that time of decision and uprooting when he wrote as the final reason why they left their homes in comfortable Leyden: "Lastly (and which was not least) a great hope & inward zeall they had of laying some good foundation, or at least some way therunto, for ye propogating & advancing ye gospell of ye kingdom of Christ in those remote parts of ye world; yea, though they should be but as stepping-stones unto others for ye performing of so great a work."

So through all their thougths of the future ran the golden thread of witness which makes the whole church one. So the thought of the young men at Williamstown and Andover, of the bands and individuals who planted homes and villages all across the continent, was anticipated. So the Fathers put themselves in the great succession of the saints and apostles and their line has gone out through all the earth in witness to the good news of Christ.

A Church With a Fruitful Program

Remarkable Ingathering at White Plains

The work of the White Plains, N. Y., congregation of the Westchester Congregational Church is attracting wide attention by reason of the splendid results following a definite program of church work. The church is located in a typical suburb section, the constituency made up pretty largely of commuters and their families. Rev. William D. Street, the minister, has been pastor of the church since it was organized in 1901.

Early in the fall Mr. Street and his committee on membership organized the program of the church in definite fashion. The program was carried through with the hearty co-operation of the congregation and on May 2, 1920, 144 new members were added to the membership of the church, which had before this large accession a membership of 933. The program coming to such a climax has attracted wide attention in the community. The Daily Reporter of White Plains, N. Y., commenting on the event said in a splendid editorial:

> It is gratifying for the friends of Rev. Mr. Street and of the church, to note the large number of new members who were received into the congregation on Sunday. One hundred and forty-four new members on the one day is the largest number ever received into the church since its organization at any one time. It can well be taken as an indication of the awakening consciousness that religion is the keynote on which our lives and the life of our country are founded.

Mr. Fred B. Smith, a member of the church, in the following quotation furnishes the background of a survey of the very definite plans and consecrated activity of the members of the White Plains parish:

> The remarkable results of our church accessions were brought about by these powerful factors: (1) There has been a persistent method of evangelism for ten years. We do not depend upon imported whirlwinds but rather upon our own spiritual resources. (2) The tremendous force of the leadership of a pastor who is so genuine that he is a permeating evangelistic messenger all the time. His devoted life and unselfish service make people long for the Christian life and fellowship. (3) The vitality of a "Class A" Sunday school. This produces 75 per cent. of all our results year after year.

The Organization

Mr. Street organized a very efficient Membership Committee led by Mr. Franklin Humphrey Warner, who put unlimited energy, prayer and personal participation into the planning, in which the Sunday school through its Superintendent, Mr. Vining, gave hearty co-operation, so that Mr. Street describes the campaign as being a "beautiful piece of team work." The Membership Committee consisted of five workers who selected from the church membership more than fifty visitors. The visitors were called together successive Wednesday evenings after prayer meetings for a definite assignment of work to be done, which was mapped out by the Membership Committee, and also to make reports on the calls made. In addition to the Wednesday evening gathering, members of the committee and of the visitors were invited to meet the pastor each Sunday morning before the morning service for conference and a brief season of prayer.

The List of Prospects

There were two sources from which the names were taken of those who should become actively identified with the church. (a) All Sunday school pupils twelve years of age or older not enrolled in church membership. (b) The Every Member Canvass List, which is made up very carefully and which includes every family which could in any way be counted as a member of the parish. The "Canvass" consists of a friendly call on newcomers and others and has no connection with the canvass made in behalf of church finances.

Correlating Activities and Themes

The various organizations of the church were a unit in a concentrated and consecrated effort. The subjects of the Sunday morning sermons were chosen to harmonize with the general spirit of the campaign. For two months previous to the reception of the Easter class, brief addresses were given each Sunday during the Sunday school hour on the general subject of "Why Young People Should Join the Church," the speakers (both men and women) being very carefully chosen. The Christian Endeavor Society during this period was led either by the pastor or one whom he selected, the subject fitting into the evangelistic program; and the Wednesday evening prayer meeting also emphasized the evangelistic and devotional note.

CHRISTIAN SERVICE FLAG OF WESTCHESTER CHURCH

The Campaign in Operation

The names of all possible candidates to membership, which were carefully selected by the Membership Committee, were placed on cards to be distributed among the visitors. From these the visitors each selected two or three names to visit. The cards were not assigned to the visitors as the Membership Committee felt it very essential that the right man should see the right man, and thus by the visitors choosing, they were distributed with ease and wisely. The real work was now in progress. Mr. Warner describes it as "quietly, normally done by the natural agencies of any church." Mr. C. K. Calhoun, a member of the church, and also of the Congregational Commission on Evangelism, commenting on the results of the church work said: "It was almost entirely a matter of personal conversation and visitation, with the object of reaping the fruits of previous faithful work in the church and in the Sunday school."

The Pastor's Training Class

In planning for the Pastor's Training Class a personal letter of invitation was sent to every candidate in the Sunday school. All the Sunday school teachers were asked to become personal workers in their classes; to drop the regular Sunday school lesson at any time a member of the class desired to discuss church membership; also they co-operated in following up the absentees to the Pastor's Class.

This year Mr. Street departed from his custom of many years of holding the class on a week-day afternoon, because it would have conflicted with the high school schedule. He therefore tried the experiment of conducting the Christian Endeavor meeting on Sunday evening in much the method of the Pastor's Class, using topics coming naturally out of the general theme of "Friendship with Jesus." There was an increased attendance of from 44 to 58 at these meetings, and from the Christian Endeavor Class sixteen came into church membership.

The second group, or class became almost entirely a group of sixth, seventh and eighth grade pupils, boys and girls together, with an enrollment of 48, an attendance ranging from 30 to 41; and 37 of whom united with the church. A short, intensive course—this year seven sessions—Mr. Street has found wiser than the longer course. This class included fourteen who had attended before and two who were already members of the church. The course of instruction consisted of a very flexible, original method of instruction. The blackboard was used very freely and notebooks furnished the pupils. With the younger pupils both the questions and answers are put on the board. The lessons were (1) Jesus; (2) The Church; (3) Baptism; (4) The Lord's Supper; (5) Prayer; (6) The Order for the Reception on Confession; (7) Sunday Observance.

In speaking of the general plan of a Pastor's Training Class, Mr. Street said:

> The Pastor's Training Class is not limited to those who have decided to join the church, but I try to have every child at least one year during the Sunday school course attend voluntarily the Pastor's Class. There are a number every year taking the course who do not unite with the church. Ideally, they would unite the second year of attendance. I find boys and girls like to come back even five or six years in succession, which involves my varying the course greatly and often providing special courses for church members—as on Prayer.

Deciding for Christ

We again quote from Mr. Street:

> We made no effort to get decision along the usual evangelistic lines. We think of our boys and girls as growing naturally into the Christian life. I simply invited any who wanted to come and give me their names after the Pastor's Class or the Young People's Meeting to do so. At the same time the Sunday school teachers and I were watching outside the class and adding the personal word where needed. There was nothing more touching and earnest than the simple way these boys and girls surrounded me several times after the class. The Christian Service Flag, made by the Pilgrim Press, was constantly kept before us, and a star was added on the red outer background to signify an individual's acceptance of Jesus.

The Influence on Parents

As a direct result of a child's uniting with the White Plains church three fathers and six mothers joined on confession of faith; one father and three mothers came by renewal; three fathers and four mothers joined by letter—a total of seven fathers and thirteen mothers. There were also two fathers and six mothers whose children are in the Sunday school, too young to be received, who joined the White Plains Church.

With the 144 new members and a previous membership of 933, the White Plains Church now has an enrollment of 1,077 members.

Certificates of Membership

Certificates of Membership were presented to each new member received on confession of faith. The certificates were mounted in the front of an appropriate gift book. The books given to adults were largely Fosdick's "The Meaning of Prayer"; for boys, Foster's "Making Life Count," Forbush's "A Boy's Life of Christ"; for the girls, Foxcroft's "While You Are a Girl," and the Y. W. C. A. "Girl's Year Book."

A Tentative Basis for Church Union

Preliminary Statements from the Episcopal and Congregational Commissions

An Introductory Word by Dr. Smyth

At a meeting of the Congregational and Episcopal Commissions on the "Concordat," in New York, June 1, the following statement was adopted. As an official utterance it should be widely read and for many reasons it will be of special interest to those coming to the International Council from England, as similar proposals are under discussion there, and what is being done in America at the Archbishop of Canterbury's request will be presented at the Lambeth Conference.

At our meeting we adopted this paper as signifying the method and spirit in which we propose to take up the great task and responsibility committed to us; we then brought out the various phases and questions and conditions in both communions, occasioned by this action and other movements, and we appointed a special committee of three from each communion to put them in shape and to refer them to special small committees to go into thoroughly together, and to report to us at subsequent meetings. We trust that the method outlined in the inclosed declaration, which is so different from the customary way of discussing these matters, may lift the whole consideration of unity to a higher plane, and also go down to the really precious things, the fundamental religious values, which are to be the contribution of all of us to the one Church of God. The unanimity and earnestness with which it was welcomed were exceedingly gratifying.

The word Church is used in the New Testament in two distinct senses. Our Lord, as his words are recorded in the Gospel according to St. Matthew, used twice and twice only the word Ecclesia, and it cannot be otherwise than significant that he employed the word with these two. When he said "upon this rock I will build my church," it is manifest that he did not mean a single local congregation. When he said, "Tell it to the church," it is manifest that he did not mean a world-wide company existing through the centuries.

Two Uses of "Church"

This distinction is evident in Apostolic usage. The Church is the whole company of the disciples of which the risen Lord is the mystical and living head which St. Paul has in mind when he declares that Christ also loved the Church and gave himself for it that he might sanctify it . . . that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing. It is this all comprehensive Church which is the one body possessing "one Lord, one faith, one baptism," which "is built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone."

But again the New Testament uses the term Church of a local congregation, "the church of God which is in Corinth," "the churches of Galatia"; "the church which is at Cenchreæ," "the church that is in the house" of Prisca and Aquila. When the Apostle exhorts the Corinthian congregation to discipline the unworthy members it is clearly action by the local Church that he has in mind. Early church history furnishes abundant examples of this twofold usage. An appeal therefore to Scripture and to Christian history in defense of one or the other of these emphases is alike possible. Both present real and important truths.

Unfortunately Christian history too often shows the emphasis on the one aspect of the church at the expense of the other. An over-emphasis on its organized unity has resulted in the papacy, with consequent rigidity of uniformity, centralization, and the stupendous assertion of infallibility. An over-emphasis of the unity of the local church results in independency, in the obscuration of the sense of historic continuity, and in the weakening of the feeling of the organic whole of which the local congregation should be a part. Yet each of these aspects and usages of the word church, consecrated by Apostolic usage, contains truth which cannot be ignored, and both must be recognized as we seek a greater unity among the now divided membership of the household of God.

The time is now fully come when each church is called upon to consider its own position in relation to the whole Church of God in the world. Each church is to judge for itself, as it would be judged by the Lord, whether it so holds its own position as to prevent any other part of the Church from communion with the whole Church. This is the vital significance of the proposals and the questions submitted by the action of the last General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church and the response of the National Council of the Congregational Churches. By this concurrent action the entire discussion of Church unity is brought down from the air and placed before the churches as a practical question, which requires definite action.

In the providence of God there has been laid upon these two Commissions the solemn responsibility of considering in what manner it may become possible for the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Congregational Church to overcome at a particular point the separation between them which is deplored alike by them all. The point so specified is central and vital. It means oneness at the very place, in the same act, in which our Lord caused his disciples to realize their unity in him—in the upper chamber and at the Last Supper.

It will be obvious to thoughtful men that we may vainly hope to render any worthy and effective answer if we begin merely by restating our respective ecclesiastical positions and then proceeding by some give and take method of compromise to some merely external adjustment of our differences. Our respective communions may well require of us to render an answer to the particular points submitted to us which shall be more than an endeavor to throw a temporary bridge of expediency over the existing separation between us.

In entering therefore upon the duties with which we are charged we deem it to be our first obligation to determine together a method of procedure in which most hopefully the visible organic unity of the churches may be sought until it shall be found. Such method seems to us to be not far to seek.

First, and always throughout our conferences and discussions, we are to keep in mind our part and obligation as partakers in the one succession of the Life of Christ with his disciples. In the continuity of his life, spiritually and historically, always with his disciples, is the continuity of his Church in the world. Consequently the Christian method to be pursued in relation to the particular questions before us becomes clearer. (1) It will lead us first to seek out the religious values of the distinctive beliefs and customs of our communions. (2) These vital values are to be found both in their historical development and in the present religious experience and worship of the Christian communions. (3) Given these values, we may then proceed to inquire of one another what guarantees, certified in our history or now of approved worth among us, we may give to one another in Christ's name and for the extension of his rule in our time throughout the world. (4) Then, and by these signs, we may by the grace of God find ourselves prepared to render an assured account to the two Christian bodies, whose action has committed to us this great and solemn engagement, and meanwhile we may appeal to all the brethren in their conferences and discussion to labor with us for these same ends, praying that in this providential hour of history the living Christ may be made manifest through his Church as Lord of the nations, and Redeemer of our civilization.

Our Boston Guide Book

The Congregationalist has issued a useful, informing and very attractive Official Boston Book of the International Council. It contains the program of the Council, the list of official delegates, a map of Boston, and a fresh list with descriptions of places of historic interest in and around Boston, also a carefully prepared guide for visitors. It includes an outline of trips to Concord, Lexington, Plymouth and other historic towns in Eastern Massachusetts. The book was compiled and published under the direction of Miss Ethel M. Wentworth, the Circulation Manager of The Congregationalist. Rev. Albert F. Pierce, D. D., of Dorchester, assisted in preparing the descriptive matter for the guidance of visitors. This book will be on sale in Mechanics Hall during the days of the Council Meetings, and in the Circulation Department of The Congregationalist and the Pilgrim Book Shop at 14 Beacon Street. The price is only twenty-five cents, which is less than any other Boston guide book now published.

Department of Religious Drama

Conducted by Mary Alice Emerson, Ph.D.

With the coming of summer vacations, attention is turned to the many forms of religious drama that can be presented out of doors. Camps, conferences, outing clubs and churches are asking for suggestions for Fourth of July celebrations, Sunday vesper services and anniversary entertainments. The most evident preference is for Pilgrim Tercentenary or nature material.

In midweek and out-of-door plays, the term "religious" may have a somewhat elastic interpretation to cover whatever is beautiful and uplifting. Indian legends are especially popular this year, partly because they always appeal to Boy Scouts, Camp Fire Girls and other groups of young people, and partly perhaps because of the association of Indians and Pilgrims. Hiawatha is a favorite. It will be given in the form published by the Houghton Mifflin Co., by the falls of Minnehaha in Minnesota. A special version of it is being prepared for use in a boys' camp in Washington, Me., by Mr. A. Vincent Bennett, Musical Director at Union Congregational Church, Boston. Other less ambitious versions are being given in Oregon, Illinois and New York. A delightful book, entitled American Myths and Legends, by Charles M. Skinner, published by the J. B. Lippincott Co., will furnish a number of stories that can be easily dramatized to serve local interests.

Mothers and recreational leaders will find some charming entertainments for birthday parties and Saturday afternoon treats in the dramatization of favorite stories, such as Kingsley's Water Babies, Kate Douglas Wiggins' The Birds' Christmas Carol, Joel Chandler Harris' Tar Baby. The children are easily taught to invent their own scenes, which secure in pleasure and education whatever they forfeit in dramatic unity and finish. There are, however, versions in print for those who prefer "not to trust too much to chance."

The King Arthur Stories are always successful. A particularly good collection has been dramatized by Marion Lansing and published by Ginn & Co. Several short plays for Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts and Camp Fire Girls are available. These require little expense for setting, costumes or properties, and afford both amusement and instruction.

On Sunday afternoons, the younger children like to give the simpler Bible stories, especially of Moses, Samuel and Ruth. More ambitious versions of Joshua and Esther are available for older groups of young people, while Sunday school conferences give such beautiful dramas as Isaiah by Mrs. John P. Whitman or my own simple pageant, "The Way of Holiness."

Missionary scenes are appealing and educational. A succession of plays showing scenes in China, India, Japan, Turkey and Africa, such as are to be presented daily in Mechanics Building during the International Congregational Council under the direction of Miss Ruth Seabury of the Missionary Education department, are especially to be recommended.

Another kind of informal but significant pageant is being used frequently during the warm weather. It has all the real essentials of a pageant, a community theme, a community cast and a community service, without the incidentals of special scenery or costumes. Some churches use it for one month, and others, like Union Congregational, Boston, use it all summer for the evening service. A simple pulpit is placed near the open door of the church. Here stands the leader of the community singing and later the pastor who gives a brief, human-interest gospel message strong enough for the wisest and simple enough for the most unlearned. Church members of varying ages constitute the informal choir and the committee of hospitality to welcome the strangers who stop from the trolleys or on a casual walk. Some pause only five or ten minutes: most remain throughout the service. Many return regularly, moving from the outskirts to the center of the ever-shifting group. On calm nights the message of "Rescue the perishing," or the challenging question, "What is the worth of a man?" reaches to the open windows of boarding houses across the street where lodgers sit in curious but respectful silence. The results are often known weeks later, as in the case of the wayside preaching of the Master. Story-telling in city parks often reaches parents as well as children.

The members of my class in Religious Dramatics at the Missionary Education Conference at Ocean Park, Me., are planning to set one missionary pageant on the beach at twilight. Another missionary group will put on a similar pageant on the foothills of the White Mountains this summer.

May vs. December

The Every-Member Canvass Date

By Rev. Edwin H. Byington

The recommendation has been made that the date of our regular Every Member Canvass be changed from December to about the first of May. From the pastor's standpoint this seems unadvisable.

The first week in December is the very best time for such an effort. From the vacation period there is a steadily rising tide both in attendance and interest which the diversions of the holiday season have not yet checked. Furthermore an appeal for a forward step to be taken at the beginning of the new year receives from many a welcome that would not be accorded at any other time. The autumn gives ample opportunity to prepare for the canvass and the people have not been wearied with the streams of appeals that follow each other in close succession during the winter.

By the first of May on the other hand the ebb tide of attendance and interest is well under way. The indifferent and casuals come to church little after Easter. The regulars become less regular. The warm spring days not only lure those who have automobiles and the many who love outdoor walks but create a lassitude within closed buildings. Enthusiasm and zeal are not easily aroused. People have been having appeals all winter. They wish to be left alone. If Easter comes early, the decline will be well under way. If Easter comes late the plans for the drive will have to be pushed in Holy Week, which should not be. December first is the best time for the canvass and May is surely one of the worst.

Of the money pledged, less will be paid in, if the canvass is in the spring. Experience has shown that people who pay little or nothing on their pledges the first few months are apt to let it all go. Those who have paid regularly the first months, and then fall behind, usually make it up before the end of the year. There will be considerable loss among the indifferent who make a pledge in May and after one or two payments do not look at their package of envelopes until October. In the spring the farmer finds cash at a low point compared with the autumn, and to many others vacation expenses loom large on the horizon, far more than the little Christmas gifts.

The change will raise the perplexing question as to the date for the canvass for current expenses. In most churches there are very definite reasons why the pledges for the local work should be secured about January first. Of course the change could be made but probably will not be as a rule. Having two Every Member Canvasses every year is not altogether desirable. A canvass in December for current expenses and another in the spring for the missionary apportionment would work to the advantage of the former and the great disadvantage of the latter.

Proposing this change, moreover, will be disconcerting to our people. For several years we have been telling them that our denominational leaders urge us to have both causes presented in the one Every Member Canvass and to make that in the first week in December. Having persuaded our people to adopt this plan, it looks as though we should be called upon to tell them that these same leaders assure us that we should change to May, even if it results in two canvasses. Of course there is an explanation but the feeling in their minds will be "When and where will these leaders ask us to jump next?"

We are told that by changing we shall have the aid of the Interchurch Movement. It is very hard for us to see that, so far as next year is concerned. The Methodists had a five-year drive last year and the Baptists a four-year drive this year and neither will do much next year. The Episcopalians and Unitarians are not in it, so that in my community and many others the Congregational Church will be alone in a vigorous effort, if made next spring.

It is said that we are committed to the Interchurch Movement. That does not mean that we must follow them at every point. The Methodists apparently do not feel themselves bound in this way. At any rate in our community what campaign the Methodists did have for their church this year was made in March. Moreover we have not surrendered our Congregational freedom in going into the Interchurch Movement.

In the emergency campaign pledges were made for twelve months and will run until next May. Many of these, however, were single payment contributions and others will be paid in full by the end of the year. Better some embarrassment over this than allowing it to force us into a change, that is intended to be permanent, which will seriously handicap us in our desires and efforts to bring larger financial support to our great missionary enterprises.

I believe that I speak for many pastors when I urge that there be no precipitate action in this matter. Let us have our usual Every Member Canvass this year in December, increasing the apportionment to meet the needs of the year and the continuing emergency and assuring our people that there will be no more Every Member Canvasses for missions and denominational needs during the year.

Then let the matter come up for full and free discussion at the National Council one year from now. By that time it will be possible to judge how much permanency there is in the Interchurch Movement. It will also be possible to reach some conclusion as to whether the five-year pledges secure better results than annual pledges. If the long-term pledge is the better way, we then shall have plenty of time to adjust ourselves and to be ready to join in the next big five-year drive which both for Baptists and Methodists, the two largest bodies, will come four years from this spring.

Let us not be hasty in changing from December to May.

Drury's Successful Campaign

Drury College went over the top in its endowment campaign before the annual Board meeting June 1. It has added $750,000 to its endowment and when the collections are all in it will be a million-dollar institution. Drury's future now seems assured. In fact, $25,000 has been secured since the Board meeting as the beginning of a new effort to secure an additional quarter of a million. Besides this the entire budget for the next year is wholly financed, allowing for an increase of something over 50 per cent. in the salaries of the teachers.

International Council Delegates

Rev. A. C. Hill

Rev. A. C. Hill is strictly speaking a Scottish delegate, for though his ancestry is quite English, his accent notwithstanding, he is the minister of Elgin Place Church, Glasgow. Mr. Hill is a Congregationalist by convincement, as the Quakers say. His early training was in Methodism and it was from a Methodist pulpit that he was invited to New Court Chapel, Tollington Park. In mental make-up and outlook Mr. Hill is essentially Congregational. He impresses one by his capacity to see things from a new standpoint. His approach to a question suggests a turning movement, not a frontal attack. He views things from a tangent and flashes new light on many a tangle, because he has come up to it by a pathway of his own cutting. This has been the charm of his books. Their weakness was the sustained dazzle of a style far too epigrammatic for common consumption. Scotland appreciates Mr. Hill better than North London did—though he was happy and successful at Illington Park where, however, a homelier evangelical diet is better appreciated. But Mr. Hill has his own strong following, with a large element of young people who relish his fresh and vivid setting of things and do not despise scintillations even in the pulpit.

Rev. Akira Ebizawa

Rev. Akira Ebizawa is the first of the younger group of Japanese to represent officially the Kumiai churches of Japan at a gathering of Congregational delegates in America or England. He belongs to the second generation of leaders in that virile Congregational body, and is a distinct product not only of our missionary work in Japan, but of the Kumiai leadership itself which has been so well represented here in years past. He says he was "first drawn to God through the English language" taught by Rev. T. Tanaka and by Miss Adelaide Daughaday of Sapporo. He refers to the latter now as his "mother in the Lord"; and feels toward Dr. and Mrs. Rowland as son toward parents. After completing his studies at Sapporo, and after serving in the army during the Russian war, Mr. Ebizawa entered the Theological Department of Doshisha. Since his graduation he has been pastor of the Sapporo Kumiai Church and has become a leader of note, particularly along lines of religious education.

International Council Jottings

Probably the largest delegation from any single church is that from Allston Church, Boston, which has one hundred registered delegates.

The Council is a cosmopolitan body made up of delegates from every continent and many nations. There are a number from Australia and New Zealand, two from British Guiana, several from India and about one hundred from Great Britain.

The International Council Hymnal used in the sessions is a unique book made up of seventy-seven of the great hymns of the church arranged so far as possible in their historical order. It is compiled by Rev. Charles F. Carter, D. D., of Hartford and Prof. H. Augustine Smith of Boston.

The rendering of Horatio Parker's memorial ode at the service Sunday afternoon is looked forward to with great interest. The ode itself, "A.D. 1919," by Brian Hooker, is a notable piece of work and the music by the late Professor Parker of Yale University is said by the critic to be one of his greatest works. It will be sung by a chorus choir of two hundred voices under the direction of Prof. A. Vincent Bennett, organist at Union Church, Boston.

The musical program will be one of its notable features. Under the direction of Prof. H. Augustine Smith, Director of the Department of Fine Arts in Religion at Boston University and Mr. A. Vincent Bennett, organist at Union Congregational Church, a chorus choir of over two hundred voices will sing at several sessions. At the Friday evening session they will be assisted by a Children's Chorus, and at the Sunday afternoon Memorial Service by players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Pilgrim International Committee of which Gov. Calvin Coolidge is honorary chairman and Hon. Arthur H. Wellman, chairman, has done heroic service in providing for the comfort and convenience of the delegates. They have labored under unusual difficulties owing to the fact that the Council comes just at the time when most people are starting on their vacations, but they have succeeded in surmounting the difficulties in various ways and should receive full credit for the success of the gathering.

The meetings in Park Street Church which are held daily at 12.30 noon, are designed especially for the business people of Boston but will interest many Council delegates. The speakers and their topics are: Wednesday, Rev. J. Morgan Gibbons, D. D., of London. Thursday, Rev. H. H. Proctor of Brooklyn, "Pilgrims in Bronze." Friday, Rev. Frederick F. Shannon, D. D., of Chicago, successor to Dr. Gunsaulus at Central Church, "The Voice of God in American History." Monday, Rev. C. Bernard Cockett of Melbourne, Victoria, "Battles for Public Morality in Australia." Tuesday, Pres. Henry Churchill King of Oberlin, O., "Conferences in the Near East."

The Armenian Mandate

In relation to the Armenian question, the following article by Dr. J. Edward Kirbye, pastor of Plymouth Church, Des Moines, which appeared in the Des Moines Register will be of interest to our readers. It was called forth by a letter from Senator Kenyon, in response to a request from Dr. Kirbye that the Senator from Iowa should vote for the Armenian mandate. Senator Kenyon said, in substance, that he did not think it right to compel our boys to spend their lives over there, unless they volunteered for this service; that another troublesome question, that of Mexico, was nearly as bad as Armenia and right at our door. The following paragraphs are taken from Dr. Kirbye's reply:

> We have in the United States a standing army which must be supported and it is designed primarily to protect American interests and to carry out American obligations. We do not consult these lads when we send them to the Philippines, to Porto Rico, to Cuba or to any part of the world where United States interests are involved. It would be a very interesting situation if the logic of Senator Kenyon were applied to the United States army and navy. If we have a standing army of 300,000 or 500,000 in the United States, may I ask why it costs any more to support 15,000 or 20,000 of them in Armenia than it does to support this same number in Porto Rico, the Philippines or at Camp Dodge?
> The argument of Senator Kenyon as to Mexico is not a parallel. Armenia has asked us to help her and our Allies of the war have asked us to accept this as one of our after-the-war obligations. No such a request has come from Mexico; in fact, Mexico has asked us to do otherwise.
> Is an Armenian mandate foreign to us as a people and fraught with danger to our interests?
> First—An Armenian mandate would be one of the easiest and most natural after-the-war obligations. We certainly do not wish to assume the attitude that other nations have obligations and we do not. Lincoln spoke of binding up the wounds—are we trying to do that now or are we seeking to evade the call of humanity and justice? Armenia has suffered and she now calls for help. It would be a natural task because American schools have acquainted the people there with our ideals for more than seventy-five years. We have large and important educational interests among them. This has led thousands of Armenian men and women to come to America for study, so that in the last quarter of a century there is scarcely a college or university in the United States that has not had a number of Armenian students. These men and women are to be the leaders. It is a vast army of intelligent, virtuous and self-reliant men and women who have been developed. Their sympathies are American and their ideals have been furnished by us.
> Second—An Armenian mandate which will make possible a republic will do more to guarantee world peace in the Near East than anything else. An Armenian republic will confine the Turk to the province of Anatolia and geographically speaking prevent him from any alliance which would make him, in the coming years, the dominating factor of the Near East in politics and religion.
> This in my estimation is one of the strongest reasons why we should desire an Armenian mandate. The peace of the world for the next half century or more is dependent on the way the reconstruction is now carried on.
> We will find the path of security today in the attitude of John Hay to China—in the attitude of the nation to Cuba and the Philippines—meeting all our international duties in the spirit of justice and good will. That will mean both peace and prosperity. To have practically the civilized world organized into an effort for order and the United States outside, can only mean mischief for us.

Object for Intercession

For Those in Perplexity:

O Thou who guidest those who trust in thee, show a way in the dark, we beseech thee, to those who are perplexed and troubled and those who know not where to turn in order to fulfill the duties which are laid upon them or to escape the dangers which seem to threaten them. Give them confident hearts in remembrance of thy merciful care and forethought. And crown their day with deliverance that they may praise thee in remembrance of thy mercies. In the name of Christ. Amen.—R.

OUR READERS' FORUM

Church Schools Should Be Kept Open

Dear Mr. Editor:

In the July issue of the Church School I was personally much interested in the article, "Shall We Close Our Church Schools This Summer?" As superintendent of a school in this city this problem has confronted me for the past five years when I assumed the superintendency. I felt as though I should like to express in a few words my experience.

Upon taking the important office of superintendant I at once began to investigate the cause of the seemingly hard times in getting the school back into its regular work in the fall. For at least one month and a half following the opening of the school in the fall it seemed almost impossible to get the school together as it was at the time of closing the last Sunday in June.

This year I determined to see if some plan to keep the school open during the two months of July and August could be hit upon that would meet with success. I immediately began investigation of placing in the school a moving picture equipment. The project was placed before the pastor of the church and the school teachers and it at once met with success. The only question was, how the proper program could be arranged? The teachers of every school should be allowed their vacation, if they choose to take it, and, therefore, I began looking around for an entire change. The result was that the following program has been arranged, but as yet untried:

School Opening
Hymn Prayer
One reel of pictures
Solo, and school collection
One reel of pictures
Ten-minute talk, placing thought in pictures to school work
Hymn Benediction

From all prospects this program is to meet with decided success. I shall be pleased to report later in regard to the success of the new plan.

A Call to Face Facts

Dear Mr. Editor:

I have read what was said in The Congregationalist, of May 20, about the rejoicing at Congregational Headquarters over the success of the drive for funds for the Congregational World Movement. Of course this drive was a success, and from the very first it was taken for granted that it would be a success. In this Tercentenary Year the Congregationalists would not permit this drive to fail, though many questioned the advisability of it, coming as it did before the Pilgrim Fund was completed.

While on the face of it, the drive has been a success, yet it is related to one of the greatest defeats that the Church has ever met. Some of us were absolutely opposed to the Interchurch Movement, and the more we learned of it, the greater the opposition we felt. It is now a time for honestly facing the facts, and not suffer the Church to remain longer under any illusion, if not even delusion. The secret of the calling into an alliance of thirty denominations was the promise made by the Interchurch that if the churches would ally themselves under the leadership of the Interchurch in raising funds, then the Interchurch would raise from the so-called friendly citizens a very large sum, which would be distributed among the co-operating denominations. The least amount thought of was $40,000,000; the counties through the United States were apportioned on the basis of raising $100,000,000. The returns are now in, and the friendly citizen group has come across with something less than $3,000,000. From figures gathered from another paper it now is disclosed that the Interchurch to date has spent about $8,000,000. All of this enormous sum was raised through the underwriting of the Boards of the co-operating denominations. To date there remains a deficit of about $5,000,000 which must be taken care of from the funds of the denomination.

We are defeated and we heartily deserve the defeat. The leaders of this Interchurch Movement will quietly withdraw and leave this bill to be paid by the churches. Let us now honestly face the situation and have the courage to meet it. The thing to do seems very plain to me—and that is to pay our full share of this deficit, and at once cut ourselves free from the Interchurch. The longer the relationship is continued the greater the calamity ultimately. About three months ago I wrote you asking certain questions about the Congregational World Movement and its relations to the Interchurch. These questions were such as to indicate my doubt of the wisdom of such an alliance, and from the letters I received from pastors who read the questions I found that I had much sympathy. Through your paper I wish to register my vote for the immediate severance of our connection with the Interchurch. I shall be much surprised if hundreds of thousands of Congregationalists are not ready to vote with me.

John O. Thrush, D. D

River Falls, Wis.

Editors' Note.—We do not share Dr. Thrush's view that it is best for the Congregational World Movement to detach itself entirely from the Interchurch World Movement. Few of the participating denominations have done this, not even the Northern Presbyterians, who rejected at their recent General Assembly in Philadelphia the counsel to this effect from its former moderators, Maitland Alexander of Pittsburgh and Mark Mathews of Seattle. Instead the assembly followed the advice of the more moderate men like retiring Moderator John Willis Baer and pledged $100,000 to the Interchurch World Movement when it shall be properly reorganized. This seems to us a wiser and fairer attitude than that of complete severance from the Movement. It is hardly fair to say that the leaders are withdrawing and leaving the bill to be paid by the churches. They are addressing themselves earnestly to the task of reorganization and are not demitting entirely upon the churches the effort to raise the money to meet present obligations.

Congregationalists should not forget that if it had not been for the Interchurch Movement, we should not have started the Congregational World Movement on the basis on which it was launched, which has already registered a gratifying degree of success. If seventy-five or eighty per cent. of the three million dollars that were sought shall come to hand, as now seems probable, the sum attained far exceeds what the societies and institutions would have secured had they not had behind them the inspiration and the backing of the Interchurch Movement. Moreover, the fact that next year our Congregational objective may be as high as four million dollars shows that the Interchurch Movement has taught Congregationalists to think in larger financial terms than ever before. For the last ten years we have been struggling to raise two million dollars annually for benevolence. Now we are about to ask our people for at least twice that sum, and we shall probably never recede from the larger figure.

In our just dissatisfaction with certain methods of the Interchurch Movement, let us on the other hand seek to be absolutely fair toward it. On this point Dr. Stanley White, one of the secretaries of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, speaks as follows:

> The movement stood for three splendid ideals. They were embodied in its name: first, church unity, a thing earnestly to be desired and desperately needed in these days; second, an international viewpoint and world vision without which the peace of the world cannot be permanently established; third, aggressive Christian work. Unfortunately the financial side of the movement which was inevitably related to it was conducted in such a way that the main objectives were overshadowed. This brought the movement into disrepute and has caused some to label it a failure. Personally I feel that if the three objectives named above have been accomplished, the movement is far from being a failure and I trust that it will be so reorganized that the emphases can be kept in the right place and that its real values may be preserved.

The Andover Anniversary

The one hundred and twelfth anniversary of Andover Theological Seminary was observed on Monday and Tuesday, June 14 and 15. At the meeting of the Alumni on Monday afternoon there was an interesting and able discussion of the task of the Congregational ministry in the next twenty years, in which Rev. Richard H. Clapp of Northampton, and Rev. E. C. Boynton of Worcester, led off. After the annual meeting of the Trustees early Tuesday morning, the Graduation Exercises were held in the Seminary Chapel. Three students representing as many great nations of the world received the degree of Bachelor of Divinity: Bhaskar Pandurang Hivalè of Bombay; Iwao Matsuhara of Tottori; Frank William Thompson, Harvard, 1916. Mr. Hivalè, who is an old pupil of Dr. Robert A. Hume, returns to India in the fall to join the Marathi Mission of the American Board. Mr. Matsuhara will go back to Japan to engage in the work of Christian education. Mr. Thompson has accepted a call to the Congregational Church of Bedford, Mass. Rev. Alfred E. Garvie, D. D., principal of New College, London, was a welcome guest of the Seminary during the anniversary, and delivered a most interesting address on the general subject of theological education in Great Britain and America.

The annual luncheon for alumni and invited guests was served at the Colonial Club at one o'clock and was largely attended. Dr. Carter presided and acted as toastmaster. Dean Platner gave a general report of the work of the year, and addresses were delivered by Principal Garvie, Dr. Robert A. Hume of the class of 1873, Dean Washburn of the Episcopal Theological School, Dr. Charles L. Noyes of the class of 1880, Dr. George W. C. Hill, 1895, of New Britain, Ct., and Rev. Frank P. Beal, 1915, of Hillsboro, N. H.

A unique feature of the day was the ordination of Mr. Hivalè late in the afternoon in the Seminary Chapel. The Council was called by the Central Church of Boston and was made up of ministers and delegates from the churches of the Suffolk West Association. Dean Platner offered the ordaining prayer. An intimate and affectionate "charge" was delivered by Dr. Hume, between whom and the candidate it was clear that the most delightful personal relations exist. Mr. Sperry gave the right hand of fellowship and appropriate words of greeting from the American Board were spoken by Rev. Brewer Eddy. Mr. Hivalè's appointment by the Board is noteworthy in that he is the first native Christian to return to India as a full member of a Mission.

Another unique feature of the anniversary was supplied by a very interesting exhibit, arranged by Dr. Owen H. Gates, Librarian of the Andover-Harvard Theological Library, showing all the publications of members of the Seminary teaching staff from the beginning, including some of the historical treasures of the library, such as early manuscript records of the student societies, the first edition of Eliot's Indian Bible, etc. This exhibit, which is well worth a visit, is to be continued until after the meeting of the International Congregational Council.

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

Jonathan Befriends David

International Sunday School Lesson for July 11. 1 Sam. 20:32-42.

The lesson today is a little gem taken from the story of the friendship of David and Jonathan.

1. A Friend's Plea and What It Cost. This is the first fine mark of friendship that we study. The king was angry at David without reason. It was a serious matter to cross the royal will. Jonathan might have kept silent. But he spoke out bravely and at once. An absent friend needed a defender and Jonathan rose to the privilege. Does this often happen? Are we ready to back up our friends when they are criticized or accused in their absence?

Now note what this brave action cost. The king cast his javelin at Jonathan. He was so angry that he would have murdered his son on the spot. So Jonathan risked his physical life for his friend. It may sometimes cost as much to be loyal. Then after the feast was ended and Jonathan had escaped his fathers wrath he was so distressed on account of David's danger that he refused to eat. Perhaps we think that this did no good; but it was the Oriental way of showing deep emotion. When we have a case of desperate sickness in the family it is often the case that we do not eat or sleep. Our anxiety and grief are too severe. We cannot think of ourselves when those whom we love are in danger.

2. A Friend's Warning and How It Worked. In order to get the full connection of this section read the preceding part of Chapter 20. The plan that had been worked out would allow the King's decision to be made known to David without any evident collusion with Jonathan.

Jonathan had his little arrow-gatherer with him, a sort of caddy of long ago. He was to practice archery and the boy was to gather and return the arrows. It was all simple and natural. David was hiding where he could hear and see as much as was necessary. So Jonathan shot the arrow and then called to the boy to run for it where it had fallen far beyond the place where he was standing. David knew that this meant that he had incurred the anger of the king and must flee for his life. The boy knew nothing more than that he had gathered and returned an arrow shot by his master. Then Jonathan sent the boy away to the city with the arrows.

3. The Covenant of Friends and How Long It Lasted. Why did not David escape at once rather than come into sight and meet Jonathan face to face? If they were going to see each other anyway, why was it necessary to go through the performance with the arrows? Doubtless this question has perplexed more than one reader of the story. David might have remained in his hiding place, watched his friend out of sight and then escaped to safety. Jonathan might have sent the boy back to the city and then slowly, as if nothing had happened, gone back without looking toward the place where he knew David was hiding with a heavy heart. But would that have been true to form? These two men were comrades; they knew that one and perhaps both might meet death at the hands of Saul. It is impossible to imagine David leaving Jonathan without a word; it is unthinkable that Jonathan would go back to the city without one more clasp of his friend's hand.

Lesson Points

1. Love speaks in acts more than in words.
2. Love is ready to risk life for its object.
3. Love finds ways to declare itself that only lovers know.
4. Love is not afraid to express itself even in tears.
5. Love of one another is sealed by the love of God.

So they met face to face, not to repeat the message that had been told so clearly by the sign of the arrows; but just to look into each other's faces once more and promise one another to be true to the end.

Study this covenant. First, it was between these two men. They had blended their interests and united their welfare in a league of love and loyalty. Then it was extended to include their children forever. They felt so sure of the spirit of those who would come after them that they bound them also into their covenant. And finally it was a faith in one another with God as the witness. The pledge was sacred because God shared it. How could anything have been stronger or more beautiful!

One of the most satisfactory ways in which to interpret religion is to consider it in the nature of a friendship between man and God. When the supreme Friend is Christ we have the Christian religion. But it is not so important that we make our religion a friendship as that we make our friendships religious. We drift into the most intimate and masterful relationships of life; we often permit little misunderstandings to break up loyalties that have endured and then blessed. David and Jonathan teach us that such a relationship is sacred and that we ought to fill our human relations with the very spirit and purpose of God, making them wholly religious. Is there some fading loyalty that we ought to renew with some friend? Is there a separation coming between us and some comrade? Let us bring back the old love and joy as we make our friendships true because they are renewed in God.

Summer Conferences for the Young People

Never before in the history of our churches have there been so many conferences for the instruction of our young people in the Christian life which they should live as individuals and the responsibility which they must increasingly take for the ongoing of the Christian church. The various student conferences conducted by the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. if not already held are now in session. These attract a great number of young men and young women for ten days of Bible and missionary study and for the facing of the problems of the individual Christian life and those of the church. These conferences are used also by the organizations that conduct them and by the denominations as recruiting times for leadership in Christian enterprises. The sessions already held this year indicate that the missionary spirit is running at high tide and that our great missionary organizations will find it easier to get recruits now than it was three or four years ago.

The M. E. M., as it was formerly known, was taken over last year by the Interchurch World Movement and will be conducted this year by this organization. It will hold Conferences at Winter Park, Fla., Blue Ridge, N. C., Silver Bay, N. Y., Estes Park, Col., Asilomar, Cal., Ocean Park, Me., Lake Geneva, Wis., and Seabeck, Wash. These gatherings last about ten days and bring to the young people in their instruction in Bible, in missions, and in methods of church work, the best leadership that the denominations afford in our country. Most of these gatherings are held at places that are very attractive by their very nature to young people so that the recreation that they afford is a very valuable part of the sessions.

In addition to the M. E. M. conferences, which represent all of the denominations, a number of the larger of these are holding throughout the country conferences for their own young people. The Methodist Episcopal Church has done very successful work with its young people in this respect. The Presbyterians have also given much attention to this method of instructing their young people.

Congregationalists are just beginning upon this important task. This year Southern California will hold under the leadership of Miss Sarah E. Bundy, the Conference Director of Religious Education, a Young People's Conference at Long Beach. A varied program under the leadership of some of our most noted ministers is promised. Rev. Fred Grey, District Secretary of the Education Society for the State of Kansas, has already conducted two such conferences, one held at Wichita, the other at Topeka. The South Dakota State Conference with the aid of the Education Society will conduct in July three such conferences—to be held at Waubay, Placerville and Lake Andes.

Pastors and other church leaders can do no better thing for making the work of their young people effective for recruiting for the Christian ministry and other forms of leadership in the church than to send as large a number as possible of their young people to these conferences. All needed information will be gladly given by any Secretary of the Education Society or may be obtained by addressing Rev. F. M. Sheldon, 14 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.

I sing today of the benedictions of the quiet hour—the hour which makes dreamers and poets of us; the hour which comes when for a moment we get away from the hurry and drive of our daily routines; the hour when we commune with our innermost selves; the hour which speaks of flowers and stars, of thought and love and longing. Certain it is that no life can afford to be without its quiet hours—its hours for holding itself receptive to the higher thoughts, the deeper feelings, and the nobler aspirations.—Frederick A. Hinckley.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

The Ministry of Womanhood

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for July 4-10

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Passage. Luke 2:25-39; 8:1-3; 23:50-56.

Are Women Doing Their Share in Our Church? In all the churches I have personally known, either as pastor or attendant, the answer to this question would be in the affirmative. They have indeed usually been doing rather more than their full share. If you raise this question it will have to be rather for direction than for calling out of energy. And about even this the women themselves are usually the best judges. Their agencies and committees have their own methods, but they usually are effective and arrive. This meeting might be a good opportunity for what in the language of the street we call a "show down." You might make the meeting both profitable and interesting by arranging for a report by women of what the women of your church are doing, and how. There is a good deal of ignorance among the men and the careful choice of those who are to report would make such an exhibit instructive to them. Nor would there be any objection to that friendly emulation which makes for efficiency.

Are Women Doing More Than Their Share? What is the share which the women should have in the life of a church? The Scripture passages suggested for our reading show how women of the time of Christ were active for him in tendance of childhood, in ministry of hospitality, in personal service after death. We have enlarged since then, and mainly under the influence of Christ, what we call the sphere of woman. Along these lines in which she is necessary to the race we have made her a housekeeper, a nurse, a teacher of children, a minister of mercy in neighborly relations. But we have also opened the doors of business and the professions. There are women doctors and lawyers and ministers. It is no longer a wonder when a woman is professor. Our own free churches have been foremost and are so still in this widening of the opportunity of women. Too often we have thrown so large a share of responsibility upon them that it is not good for the men.

What Is the Woman's Share? It might be well just here again to consult the women. It might be possible to present this question to them in such a way that they could answer it freely with no dread that their names would be drawn into publicity, while yet their opinions of what they ought to do and give might be used to form the opinion of the church. Such a questionnaire, handled by the pastor, or by some careful and judicious woman, might throw a good deal of light on the failures and opportunities of your church. It would hardly do, I suppose, to ask them, even anonymously, what they think the men ought to do and what they think they fail in doing. But that would tend to come out as a part of the background of their own thought. And the questionnaire would be a challenge for the thought both of the men and women which might strike out sparks of suggestion for more efficient and fruitful work all round.

FRIENDSHIP WITH CHRIST

I know whom I have believed. 2 Tim. 1:12.

Personal acquaintance with Christ is a living thing. Like a tree that uses every hour for growth, it thrives in sunshine, it is refreshed by rain—even the storm drives it to fasten its grip more firmly in the earth for its support. So, troubled heart, in all experience, say, "This comes that I may make closer acquaintance with my Lord."—I. O. R.

I recommend Christ and his love to you in all things. Let him have the flower of your heart and your love. Set a low price upon all things but Christ; and cry down, in your thoughts, clay and dirt, that will not comfort you when ye get summons to remove.—Samuel Rutherford. Abr.

Love is the key of life and death,
 Of hidden, heavenly mystery;
Of all Christ is, of all he saith,
 Love is the key.

As three times to his saint he saith,
 He saith to me, he saith to thee,
Breathing his grace-conferring breath:
 "Lovest thou me?"

Ah, Lord, I have such feeble faith,
 Such feeble hope to comfort me;
But love it is as strong as death,
 And I love thee.
—Christina Rossetti.

The love of Christ hath a height without a top, a depth without a bottom, a length without an end and a breadth without a limit.—John Mason.

The friendship of Christ is for our immediate use. When Christ had won Peter's confession he straightway gave him a command of work.—I. O. R.

O Heavenly Friend, whose love disdained not mortal life and death, we bless thee for the grace of every day's companionship with thee. We thank thee that thy patience and compassion never fail and that thou hast set before us the hope and glory of thine own eternal life. Deal gently with us, O most loving Friend and Guest, cleansing our troubled hearts that we may grow like thee. Reprove and purge our faults that we may overcome them by thine aid. Teach us to bring forth fruit in righteousness. Give us the joy of fellowship with thee in work. When sorrows and perplexities overcloud our thoughts may our souls even then abide in the secret of thy presence and share the perfect peace of those whose hearts are stayed on thee. Keep us from every idle thought and foolish word. Confirm in us by thy loving oversight all pure desires and holy ambitions; and shine through us, O thou true Sun of our darkness, for helpful light on other lives. Amen.

Brotherhood Among Men

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for July 11-17

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Christian Brotherhood among Races and Nations. Acts 17:24-28.

Light from the Bible Passage

All thoughts of Christian brotherhood find their source in God's creation of all men and his common care of them. They all alike receive benefits from his hand. There are no distinctions in his sight. Paul leaves no doubt that the Lord's supreme purpose was to have his creatures one in heart and mind. Differences in places of habitation he recognized and approved. Still these do not diminish his yearning that they should all seek him. Reaching out toward him gives the feeling of kinship with our fellows who are doing likewise. The surprise in the search for God is his nearness which we cannot recognize. Jesus' longing for brotherhood among men everywhere is voiced in his farewell prayer: John 17. He longed for that unity of heart and interest among men that he enjoyed with his Father.

Leads for the Leader

Was not the underlying hope of those engaged in the war that eventually we should become more brotherly as races and nations? Since the armistice have we lost the note or at least softened it? What force is equal to the Christian church and Christian organizations in developing this spirit? These are questions by way of approach to our subject.

Note the difference between emphasizing "brotherhood" to secure our "rights" and to perform our duties.

Note the effect of the war on the movements among nations for brotherhood.

Study the forces that make for brotherhood: Better acquaintance, sympathy, common tasks, love and Christ.

Study those that make against it: Ignorance, suspicion, jealousy and lack of Christianity.

Thoughts for Members

The wide world is knit with ties of common brotherhood in pain.—Susan Coolidge.

Of a truth men are mystically united; a mystic bond of brotherhood makes all men one. —Carlyle.

A worthy aim—
"To count life's battle good
 And dear the land that gave you birth,
And dearer yet the brotherhood
 That binds the brave of all the earth."

To pray together in whatever tongue or ritual is the most tender brotherhood of hope and sympathy that men can contract in this life.—Madame de Staël.

A Moment of Prayer

O thou, our Father, from whom all thoughts of brotherhood come we thank thee for that Elder Brother whom thou didst send to earth to show us brotherhood at its best. Teach us anew in every land to show true love for all men and thus help to answer his prayer for the world. Amen.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

By Popular Authors

Woman Triumphant, by V. Blasco Ibanez (Dutton). There has been much discussion, both in Spain and America, about the moral quality of this story. Certainly it is not such a book as the Frenchman would consider proper for the reading of that "young person"—his unmarried daughter. Nor does it appeal to the Anglo-Saxon sense of propriety to discuss some of the matters detailed at length in its pages. The Woman Triumphant is the wife of a famous painter who is jealous of her husband's love of the nude and of his models. The original title has direct reference to a famous nude painting by Goya, The Gay-woman Disrobed. The wife's jealousy, even of her own flesh as painted by her husband, ends in driving him to another woman. The wife's death after long estrangement, re-establishes her in her husband's now insane as well as remorseful imagination. He, as Signor Ibañez himself says in his preface, "is simply the personification of human desire, this poor desire which, in reality, does not know what it wants, eternally fickle and unsatisfied." The novel, then, is romantic rather than realistic. We do not think the story either wholesome or agreeable, but it does preach a warning lesson and has indisputable elements of power.

The Passion for Life, by Joseph Hocking (Revell). A religious novel by a well-known English writer based on the theme, "If a man die shall he live again?" Francis Erskine, told by his physicians that he had only a year to live, came up against this great question. He retires to a little village in Cornwall, where he tries to find peace to his soul and an answer to his question. Neither the Anglican nor Methodist Churches with their ministries help him. Then comes the war—and the death of the brave boys of the village. Their parents begin to ask the same question. In this atmosphere Erskine is injured—but sees a vision. His faith is strengthened, likewise his body. Isabella is the other half of the love story, who, beginning as an agnostic, comes not only to faith and love, but also to Erskine. It is really a good discussion of immortality—and a wholesome story with a good religious flavor.

Robin Linnet, by E. F. Benson (Doran). The chief character of this book is not the nineteen-year-old youth, familiarly known as "Birds," but his mother, Lady Grote. The Harlot's Progress, Downward and Upward, would make a good sub-title. Great lady as she is, wife of a peer, mistress of an old English estate, the early pages reveal her on the verge of a vulgar, loathsome intrigue. Only accident saves her, an accident due to the oncoming of the war, to which she had been blind. The son at Cambridge, sowing a commonplace crop of wild oats, turns to meet the harsh conditions of service with gay courage, giving himself to the utmost. Then Lady Grote, also, turns to service as the only antidote for grief and so finds her hidden soul. The realism of the story is intentionally repulsive, giving rise to wide-reaching reflections.

Miser's Money, by Eden Phillpotts (Macmillan). Another Dartmoor story in the author's best vein. It chronicles the rise of a family of farm laborers to a place of prosperity and dignity. The characters of the clan are sharply drawn and the action and interaction of their dispositions steadily accumulate interest. An uncle who is a miserly misanthrope provides the nest egg of fortune with results which must have been distressing to his ghost. A nephew inherits this genius for ruthless money-making but marries a woman of truthful nature and clarity of vision. Though ignorant of her husband's career she conquers just by being what she is. Another couple illustrate the tenacious strength of weak, even "feckless" people. Quite as appealing is the maiden who is angered by fresh expectations of money, never having known what to do with the extra windfalls. It is a great story, revealing the ineffectiveness of material possessions.

The Slayer of Souls, by Robert W. Chambers (Doran). An extraordinary story of the criminal plans of a band of assassins to pervert the minds and slay the souls of men. Their efforts are revealed in the United States by the teachings and doings of the Bolsheviki and I. W. W. Marvelous knowledge of psychic laws gives the assassins this power and the only method of defeating them is through the agency of some one equally familiar with their secrets and even more adept in the practice of their "magic." A beautiful American girl is the champion of America in this story.

No. 26 Jayne Street, by Mary Austin (Houghton Mifflin). A story of the new feminism, the uttermost democracy and its bearing on love and marriage. It is a war-time story and among its characters are types representing both conservative and radical tendencies. The heroine breaks away from her conservative home influences and makes a new home for herself at No. 26 Jayne Street, in order to be free and to live unhampered among the "advanced thinkers," with one of whom she falls in love. But the story is a tragedy and ends abruptly with chaotic conditions and unsolved problems. It is a powerful but not a happy story, though perhaps true to the experience of many disturbed minds in these days of moral and social turmoil.

The Third Window, by Anne Douglas Sedgwick (Houghton Mifflin). The purpose of this story of England as it is today is to evoke a situation where an irresolute woman's mind hangs poised between her duty toward the living and the dead. The third actor in the tragedy is one of the people who are sensitive to the thoughts of others under conditions of excited attention such as modern forms of necromancy afford—an unacknowledged medium, in fact. She is also a woman with a motive, a dislike and an affection. The manner in which the story is written is highly allusive. It will remind the reader of a portrait group by the famous French painter Carrière—the figures emerging from a background of mist. The story has been widely discussed, as it appeared serially in The Atlantic.

More Out-of-Door Books

Recreation, by Viscount Grey of Fallodon, K. G. (Houghton Mifflin). A choice little volume of forty-three pages containing an address delivered by Viscount Grey before the Harvard Union, Dec. 8, 1919. It is not only a brilliant essay on recreation as "one of the things that makes for happiness in life," but it devotes a number of pages to an account of a holiday spent by the author with President Roosevelt walking through an English countryside to study the birds of England. It is a charming picture of Mr. Roosevelt and another testimony to his fine character, his healthful interests, his remarkable store of information and his delightful personality. On this account the little volume will be added to the ever increasing collection of books about Roosevelt.

Track Athletics Up-to-Date, by Ellery H. Clark (Duffield). The author, a well-known athlete and instructor has provided in this compact little volume a practical handbook in every branch of outdoor field sports. Abundant illustrations of events in action add greatly to the interest and value of the volume.

The Little Playbook, by Katharine Lord (Duffield). Six charming plays written especially for production by children in schools, settlements and clubs. Two are Christmas plays, one is for Thanksgiving time, two garden plays can be given out of doors, one is a pageant play of Shakespeare's time. All of these plays have been proven by actual production.

Our Northern Autumn, by Harriet L. Keeler (Scribners). A popular study of autumn flowers, autumn foliage, fruits, native and cultivated, November days, etc. The volume is beautifully and abundantly illustrated and is in every way a satisfactory handbook for the nature lover.

A Night Raid into Space, by Col. J. S. F. MacKenzie (Lippincott). Interesting studies in astronomy, planned for young people and presented in untechnical language. But their elders also will find much of profit in the pages. It deals with such topics as The Solar System, The Birth of the Earth, The Earth's Rotation Round Her Axis, The Moon, Gravity, The Year, Longitude and Latitude, The Constellations, etc.

Social Studies

The Scientific Spirit and Social Work, by Arthur James Todd (Macmillan). A thorough and very interesting study of tendencies in social reforms, the use of scientific methods, avoidance of sentimentalism and many of the problems of social work. It is interesting to find this author claiming that Jesus "went about doing good scientifically," that he was indeed "the most scientific person that ever trod the globe" and backing up his statement by evidence.

The Old Humanities and the New Sciences, by Sir William Osler, B. T., M. D., F. R. S. (Houghton Mifflin). It was well to republish in this beautiful setting Sir William Osler's remarkable presidential address to the British Classical Association. The selection of a physician as president carried on a custom of the Association but few of the scientific leaders called in could have known so wonderfully the roots of science and philosophy in the classics as Sir William Osler did. The address is a mine of apt allusion and quotation, a bridge between the "humanities" and the sciences. The author's personal qualities, which brought him warm admiration and affection in two continents, are reflected in its pages.

The Joke about Housing, by Charles Harris Whitaker (Marshall Jones). A serious and illuminating study of one of the most important and pressing problems of the country. The author presents the situation as it is, the need, various proposed remedies, the defects in these proposals, and his own recommendation. Especially, he says, "We must find a way to control the use and occupancy of land and make its added use value become a source of benefit to all, rather than a present curse to the majority and a portentous menace to the country as a whole." We cordially commend the volume to all thoughtful citizens.

WITH THE CHILDREN

Ann Mary's Living Flag

By Annie Hamilton Donnell

Ann Mary walked slower and slower, as if there were weights on her stubbed-out little shoes. She was sorry now she had come through Beautiful Street—its real name was Plane Street, but Ann Mary had renamed it. She could not see any reason why it should be called such a homely name; the trees, the houses, the velvety lawns were all beautiful, not "plane" at all.

Ann Mary was on her way home from the exercises at school and had turned down Beautiful Street to see the flags. With the teacher's little patriotic speech fresh in her mind she had thrilled all over her lean little body at sight of the first one. It was a very large flag and swung out splendidly in the breeze.

The thrills grew thrillier at every step, for at every step Ann Mary saw more flags. At some of the great houses there were big ones and little ones, too. One magnificent huge flag hung across the street and underneath it the little shabby figure paused and looked up with a queer, choked feeling in her throat. Ann Mary was not sure whether she wanted to laugh or cry—or to sing The Star-spangled Banner.

All the world seemed flaunting gaily with flags. But the child knew that when she turned into Dreary Street, her own little unbeautiful street, there would be none—not one, to celebrate this day that the teacher said everybody ought to celebrate who was glad to belong to this great country.

"I'm glad to belong—oh, I'm glad!" breathed Ann Mary fervently. A great sorrow filled her soul that no one would know it now because she had no flag to tell them with. It grew to something keener than sorrow.

"I'm ashamed!" cried little lean Ann Mary. "Oh, there must—there must be a flag!"

The procession would start before long and it was going through Ann Mary's street! Not because it was a beautiful street, or would have flags to greet the marchers with—only because it was the shortest way to the beautiful, flag-draped streets. Nothing else could ever make a procession go through Ann Mary's street. Ann Mary turned into it now, herself, and gazed in dismay down its grimy, dreary length. With a sob she sank down on the nearest doorstep and buried her face in her hands.

"Cry-baby, cry-baby, Ann Mary Flagg!" jeered a boy-voice in her ear.

She started violently, but it was not at the jeering—Ann Mary was used to jeering boy voices. It was at the last word. She had forgotten that her name was Flagg! She was a flag and three babies at home were flags!

Ann Mary sat up straight and began to laugh softly. Then there would be flags on Dreary Street after all. But they would not be red and white and blue and wave splendidly.

"Wait!" Ann Mary cried, though there was no one there to wait. The jeering boy had gone on. "Oh, wait! I've thought of something—I've thought of something."

She was on her feet and hurrying down the street toward home. Her short skirts waved, her stubbed-out shoes twinkled in and out. She must hurry, hurry! There was no time to lose. She was racing with the procession. What she meant to do must be done quickly, before the music sounded in the distance and the people came marching up Dreary Street. Could she do it? Was there time?

The tired little Flagg mother was bending over a wash-tub. There seemed to be nothing in the bare little house but wash-tubs and a steamy, soapy smell and the shrill voices of tiny children. Ann Mary burst in excitedly.

"Oh, quick! Where's Nelly's white dress and Jennie's blue one? Where's Nelly and Jennie? Where's the baby? Quick! It'll be here soon."

She went through the bare rooms like a small whirlwind, gathering up babies and clothes. Her eyes were shining, her heart beat like a little patriotic drum in her thin breast. Here was a way—the only way—to show that somebody on Dreary Street was glad to belong to this great country.

"I'm glad there's three," Ann Mary thought, as she slipped the wriggling little bodies into the new dresses. She had never thought of being glad before that there were three babies. Perhaps sometimes she had been a little sorry.

Nelly, she hurried into the white dress and Jennie into the bright blue one. But where was she to get the red one for the tiniest baby? She must think fast. While her flying fingers buttoned buttons her mind worked hard. There must be something red—There was! She whirled away to get it. There were holes—but who would see the holes when it was wrapped round and round the baby? And who would know it was a tablecloth?

In the distance sounded sweet, faint strains of music. It was growing louder. Ann Mary's cheeks burned with excitement. It must not come quite yet—she was not quite ready.

"Where's father's old sign, mother?" she panted. "The one he made to hang out when he mended shoes?"

"Sign—sign? Ann Mary Flagg, you've kneaded bread on it ever since you was born!" laughed the tired mother. She did not cease scrubbing—she could not stop to laugh comfortably.

"Why, 'course!" trilled Ann Mary.

It was floury and doughy on its wrong side, but "C. Flagg" stood out in great letters for him who marched to read on the other side of it. Ann Mary ran with it out to the sagging little gate and hung it on securely. Then she ran back for the babies.

The procession was coming; it was in sight. The music rang out patriotically, grandly. Suppose—Ann Mary's heart almost stopped beating—suppose they did not understand? They must understand. The babies must be waved.

"Tony! Tony!" she called, shouted. It was the jeering boy on the other side of the street. She beckoned wildly. He came leaping across.

"Take Nelly quick—no. Jennie's the smallest. Take Jennie and when I say 'ready,' wave her. Wave her like everything! Mother, mother, come quick and take Nelly!"

The tired mother had come to the door, lured irresistibly by the music and the tramping feet. At Ann Mary's imperious call she came down

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

I promised to use part of our space this week for some of the 150-word letters on "Why I Like My Minister," submitted in our last contest, that ended June 15.

There are not as many letters as I had expected. This does not mean, I hope, that only a few Comrades like their ministers. Perhaps the difficulty was to say, in so few words, all the nice things they would like to say. That was a part of the contest.

A California Comrade, Mabel Catlin, writes: "The reason I like our minister is because he isn't stuck up like some. For example: Some ministers go around with there (shocking, Mr. A.) best clothes on most of the time. Some think that all they have to do is to preach the sermon and the pew will fill itself instead of going around and asking the people of the community to come to church. He has interesting sermons and is a friend of every member of the community. When he is around home he is in his old clothes and is out in his garden most of the time."

Apparently for this Comrade, "Clothes make" not only "the man" but the minister.

From a Missouri Comrade, Dorothy Barrett, comes this: "There are many traits which I admire in my minister. He has various views of interest about many eminent persons and quaint lands of which he speaks in his sermons and lectures. His great intellectual power is derived from his extensive travel in many lands and his knowledge of many people and languages, which he imparts to young and old.

"His sociability is like a cloak in which he is clothed. Two free gifts which he owns are a cheery smile and a hearty handshake. His speeches bubble over with humour." (I like it better without the "u," Mr. A.).

Can you imagine this cheerful and joy-making minister?

And then one more letter this time from an Illinois Comrade, Frances Howard: "One of the things I like best about him is that he does not make any fuss if we have partys (oh! Mr. A.) and things like that in church. Another thing is that he is so funny and jolly. Whenever we have partys (again! Mr. A.) or picnics he is always there. If we race he always cheers for the side that has the least to cheer for them and he always has some funny storys (ouch! Mr. A.) to tell. I don't know how we ever had a good party before he came here.

"This is the last reason but I think it is one of the best. He is always so nice with us girls and boys that we all want to do things for him. Whenever he wants anything done for the church we are always ready to help him."

Fortunate minister, that!

I am sure you will be glad to read that our Comrades' Corner Lunch Fund to help pay for lunches for boys and girls attending Dorchester Academy, McIntosh, Ga., next fall and winter, now amounts to $11.20. It's coming! Five dollars came from the little country Sunday school in Northfield, Io., near Cedar Rapids, of about twenty members. When asked by their superintendent if they would not like to send three or four dollars from the $10 in their treasury, the oldest girl said, "Why not send five?" And five it was and is, and comes with the school's "best wishes and the hope that it may turn into several good nourishing things."

Anything from ten cents up, remember. But the printer is scowling, and you know what that means.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

IN THE CONGREGATIONAL CIRCLE

With the States in Conference

Granite State Lauds World Movement

"The Pilgrim Heritage and the New Era" was the theme of the 111th Annual Conference of the Congregational Churches of New Hampshire, held with First and South, Concord, May 10-13. Much interest was manifest in an institute for ministers which opened on the afternoon of the 10th and continued through the afternoon of the 11th. The faculty for the institute was composed of the following: Dean Ernest R. Groves, New Hampshire College, lecturing on Sociology; Rev. J. Edgar Park, Newton Mass., lecturing on Homiletics; and Rev. Lewis B. Paton, Hartford Seminary, lecturing on Biblical Theology. Such topics as—"Jesus' Teaching about the Nature of Society," "Jesus' Teaching about the Use of Wealth," "Preaching," "Analysis of Social Conditions," and "A Social Program of Progress" were adequately and interestingly covered in the lectures, and thoroughly discussed in the forum period which followed each lecture. A conference on "Practical Pastoral Problems," conducted by Rev. H. A. Jump of First, Manchester, using printed slips containing 22 questions, was heartily entered into and was a decided feature of the institute.

The Conference proper opened on the evening of the 11th, when Dr. A. D. Leavitt of Harvard, Brookline, spoke on the theme, "The Ancient and Modern Church of the Pilgrim." "Making Christianity Effective in the New World of Industry," by Rev. A. E. Holt; "The Interchurch Survey in Carroll County," by Rev. I. A. Flint; "The Congregational World Movement," by Brewer Eddy; "Motion Pictures and the Church," a demonstration by Philip Davis, were some of the important addresses of the day following. The sermon was preached by Rev. B. W. Lockhart of Franklin St., Manchester, the theme being, "The Pilgrim Church," following which the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered by Rev. C. E. Gordon and Rev. J. W. Flagg. On the closing day Rev. E. A. Tuck spoke of "The New Hampshire Sunday Law;" President Hetzel of New Hampshire College spoke on "The Pilgrim Spirit and the Tax-supported College;" and Rev. R. A. Hume of India brought the Conference to a beautiful and impressive close, saying "The one energizing current for twentieth century pilgrims is God."

Some of the important items in the report of the resolution committee, adopted at the closing session, were as follows: "We deplore America's lapse in this hour when the nations of the world rightly look to her for leadership. Particularly do we regret the untold suffering brought upon the people of Armenia by the refusal of leadership and protection." "As there is an expressed purpose to get a beer and wine plank in the political party platforms, national and state, we request the New Hampshire delegations to both political conventions to stand for the policy of prohibition, unimpaired by any alcoholic beer beverages, and the strict enforcement of the law." "We indorse the revised Sunday Law as prepared by the United Legislative Committee." "We are in hearty accord with the action of the Grand Rapids Meeting of the National Council on the subject of Industrial Relations as contained in the report of the Social Service Commission." "We express the hope that before many months all of our churches will have done their full share in support of the Congregational World Movement." "The Interchurch World Movement represents the best co-operative movement yet inaugurated among Protestant Churches. We rejoice in its successes, deplore its failures and hurtful discriminations, and pray that it may be prophetic of a larger co-operation in which the spirit of Christian unity will more largely appear." "We would emphasize the need and value of a thorough and complete program of religious education among our churches, that the youth of our faith may be well fitted for the sacred duties of Christian citizenship, by an instruction in the knowledge of God as revealed through Christ."

A Word from a Chaplain-Pastor

While I was still a chaplain in the army but was looking forward to the time when I should again be a pastor, one day I wrote down a number of things I thought I should like to see and lead in my next church. When I stopped writing, I, too, found I had fourteen points. These goals may interest some one, since they suggest concrete things that churches can have and army work is likely to miss altogether.

1. A young people's choir of thirty persons, men and women, who should enjoy social life among themselves while they serve God in song at the church, hospitals and homes.
2. A Carol Choir of forty, half of them boys between the ages of nine and thirteen and half girls between the ages of thirteen and sixteen, who should sing voluntarily and learn to serve the church in this way.
3. A well-organized church school, with the dignity and backing of the church, and graded with primary, junior, intermediate and senior departments, and organized classes for adults.
4. A Boy Scout Troop supported by the men of the church.
5. A Girl Scout or Camp Fire Group supported by the women of the church.
6. Financial Goals, that should not always keep the church just in debt, but should mean new obligations as "a growing business" should.
7. A Motion Picture Machine and Stereopticon for occasional use, especially to reach the young, through entertainment.
8. Twenty-five per cent. of the resident church membership subscribing to the Missionary Herald or American Missionary, and ten per cent. of the membership subscribing to The Congregationalist, the best church weekly in America.
9. A Church Picnic once a year for all.
10. Each resident church member to be responsible for at least one weekly church task. Anything from taking the calendar to a shut-in to being superintendent of the church school.
11. The equivalent of 25 per cent. of the church membership at the midweek service.
12. Every year a net increase of 10 per cent. of the church membership. Ten members should be able to gather one new member each year.
13. Men for teachers of boys, for the good of the men as well as of the boys.
14. Each church member to make one call on behalf of the church each week. This means the consecration of 15 minutes to one hour to the work of the church each week.

New York Has Notable Gathering

The New York Conference held its meeting with First, Gloversville, May 18–20. This was the 87th meeting since the organization of the State Association. Owing to the illness of the Moderator, Rev. W. A. Trow of Sherburne, Rev. A. L. Lincoln of Brooklyn was elected and served as Moderator. In point of arrangements for its comfort, the Conference was one of the most successful held in recent years. The wheels ran smoothly and without a hitch. First, Gloversville, under the lead of its pastor, Rev. A. P. Manwell, proved a most hospitable host. The plant of this church is well adapted for such a meeting, the chapel, which is really a well-appointed parish house, providing ample accommodation for committee meetings, banquets and rest rooms. In the matter of hospitality, First was helped by friends from the Presbyterian and Methodist churches in the city.

The Conference opened on Tuesday afternoon and after organizing proceeded to the reports of its standing committees. These were followed by the Conference sermon given by Dr. C. E. Jefferson of Broadway Tabernacle, who gave an inspiring message concerning the religion of Jesus in its practical application to human affairs, interpreting thus John's vision of the city of God coming down out of heaven. Dr. Jefferson said in part: "What does God Almighty mean for America to do? In view of the vast tide of materialism and its life it is likely to lose its soul. He means that we shall organize the moral intelligence and good will of humanity to make an end of war. It means that there is an inter-racial fellowship of men which is becoming more and more evident every day. Everything depends upon the power that makes use of that fellowship." The high note of this sermon was an admirable preparation for the celebration of the Sacrament, which followed immediately.

The evening session was devoted to addresses of welcome and a sermon by Dr. J. F. Newton of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City. A striking evidence of the place which the Gloversville church has in the community was afforded in the addresses of welcome, which were given by Hon. T. R. Haviland, Mayor of the city, and E. J. Wilkins, President of the Chamber of Commerce of Gloversville, both of whom are members and active workers in First.

On Wednesday the meeting of the New York State Branch of the Woman's Board of Missions was held in the First Presbyterian Church. The officers of this organization for the greater part were re-elected. Mrs. M. F. Johnson of Brooklyn presided in the absence of Mrs. Hillis, who was ill. Following the reports of the officers, Mrs. R. S. Emrich gave a thrilling address upon "The Interchurch and the Congregational World Movements."

Wednesday afternoon was the occasion of the meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Union of New York State, in the First Presbyterian Church. Mrs. William Spalding of Syracuse presided. The high spots in this meeting were the burning of the note for $17,520 which was given five years ago as a pledge to the building fund of the Schauffler Institute (the cancellation of this note and the completion of this obligation were celebrated at this meeting by burning the note before the delighted eyes of the consecrated women present); and the address by Rev. Paul Leeds of Louisiana, who inspired the meeting with his consecrated personality and words. Mrs. Franklin Warner gave a thoroughly interesting account of the automobile trip which she and her husband took through the mission stations of the southwest, New Mexico and Arizona.

Wednesday morning the Conference was devoted to the report of the Board of Directors. At the afternoon session there was a symposium on church activities. Dr. L. T. Reed spoke upon the great need of recruiting the ministry and also spoke of the Pilgrim Fund, which has more than reached its original goal of $5,000,000 and it is hoped will exceed $6,500,000. Dr. C. E. Burton made an eloquent plea for evangelism, which, he said, is the primary emphasis in church work.

Wednesday evening's meeting was under the auspices of the Home Missionary Department of the Conference. Rev. A. W. Gidart of Swedish Immanuel Church, New York City, spoke effectively of religious work among foreign-speaking people. Dr. H. H. Proctor gave an address concerned with work among the colored people of New York City. This was well calculated to arouse enthusiastic support for that work because of its large vision and the substantial achievements already made during the short time which he has been at work in Brooklyn. Rev. Mr. Moore, the Congregational pastor at Cornell University, represented this new phase of our church work for our students and colleges and universities. Mr. Moore is a pioneer in this particular kind of work, which ought to be more extensively promoted among our college students. Dr. J. P. Huget of Tompkins Ave., Brooklyn, delivered the concluding address, despite illness, during which he said, "The measure of a man is taken by his answer to the unescapable."

Preceding this evening's meeting a young people's banquet was held in First Church parlors. It was a delightful occasion, presided over by Rev. A. E. Roraback of Brooklyn. Short, snappy speeches were made by Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Moore, Mrs. Emrich, Dr. Huget, Mrs. Knapp and Mrs. Robertson.

The last day of the Conference was Thursday. Dr. G. L. Cady delivered an address, in which he stated that the race problem can be solved only by the recognition of human personality. Every one is made in God's likeness.

The Committee on Religious and Moral Education furnished a part of the afternoon's program and Rev. D. Brewer Eddy, Associate Secretary of the American Board, made a frank, fair and judicial statement of the difficulties encountered by the Interchurch Movement.

In the evening, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton of Brooklyn spoke on "The Pilgrims of Yesterday and Today," and Hamilton Holt, Ph. D., delivered an address on "America's Duty." These addresses were concerned with the coming International Congregational Conference in Boston, the Peace Conference and the League of Nations, and were masterful presentations of America's world-wide pleas and call to duty and service. They formed a fitting close to a

Minnesota Churches Report Gains

The meeting of the Minnesota Conference, held at Plymouth, Minneapolis, May 24–27, broke all records in attendance and in the worth of the program given. The theme running all through the program was the Tercentenary Anniversary. The first afternoon six aspects of the Pilgrim life and character were touched upon in addresses by as many individuals and the period was closed with an open forum discussion. The evening was given to the work of the young people, with an address by Mrs. Lydia Lord Davis of Oberlin.

Among the reports made was that of Prof. Warren Upham, State Archæologist, showing that the history of Congregational work in Minnesota which the Conference had asked to have compiled was almost finished and will be published this fall. The committee on Social Service, through its chairman, Rev. R. H. Stafford, and Rev. W. K. Williams of the Business Committee, ask for the creation of an industrial commission to express the interest of Congregationalism in Minnesota in the problems of industry and capital and to make a study of these problems for the purpose of making the churches as helpful as possible in their solution.

An excellent feature of the whole program was the quiet hour conducted each day by Rev. R. H. Stafford of First, Minneapolis. Mr. Stafford's addresses were clear in thought, modern in viewpoint, sincere in aim and made a deep impression. In the moderator's address Dr. J. P. Miller struck a deep spiritual note and made it clear that our day demands a religion of ministry. Rev. Philip Mercer of Detroit gave a suggestive address on the art of church worship in which he made a plea for greater reverence in the conduct of service of worship in our churches.

At the meeting of the Home Missionary Union Tuesday afternoon Mrs. Rose M. Dunlap of St. Paul presided. The annual sermon was given by Harry Blunt of St. Paul who spoke on the Message of the Prophet of Patmos for the day. A feature of the Wednesday program was the industrial conference with an address by Mr. George W. Lawson, State Secretary of the Federation of Labor on The Church and Modern Industry, and one by Rev. Fred Errington on the Church Interpreting the Industrial Problem of the Age. Addresses were made by Rev. W. E. Dudley on the Problem of the Unchurched, by Mrs. Ida Vose Woodbury on Women's Part in Christian Americanization, and by Mrs. Lydia Lord Davis on the New Day. At the annual banquet, over which Rev. Arthur S. Henderson presided, 600 were present. Those responding to toasts were Rev. A. C. Bacon, President Cowling, Mrs. Ida Vose Woodbury, President emeritus of the State University, Cyrus Northrup of Minnesota and Dr. Freeman of St. Mark's Episcopal Church, Minneapolis. The report of Superintendent Lesher showed that the churches of Minnesota had a net gain of nearly 350 last year, that the church membership is the largest in the history of the Conference, that the Sunday school enrollment is much larger than the membership of the churches, that all the organizations of the churches have gained in membership, that there has been increase in offerings in benevolences of about $30,000, and that the Congregational World Movement will go over the top in Minnesota. Dr. Cornelius Patton made a great impression in his address giving an account of conditions in the Orient.

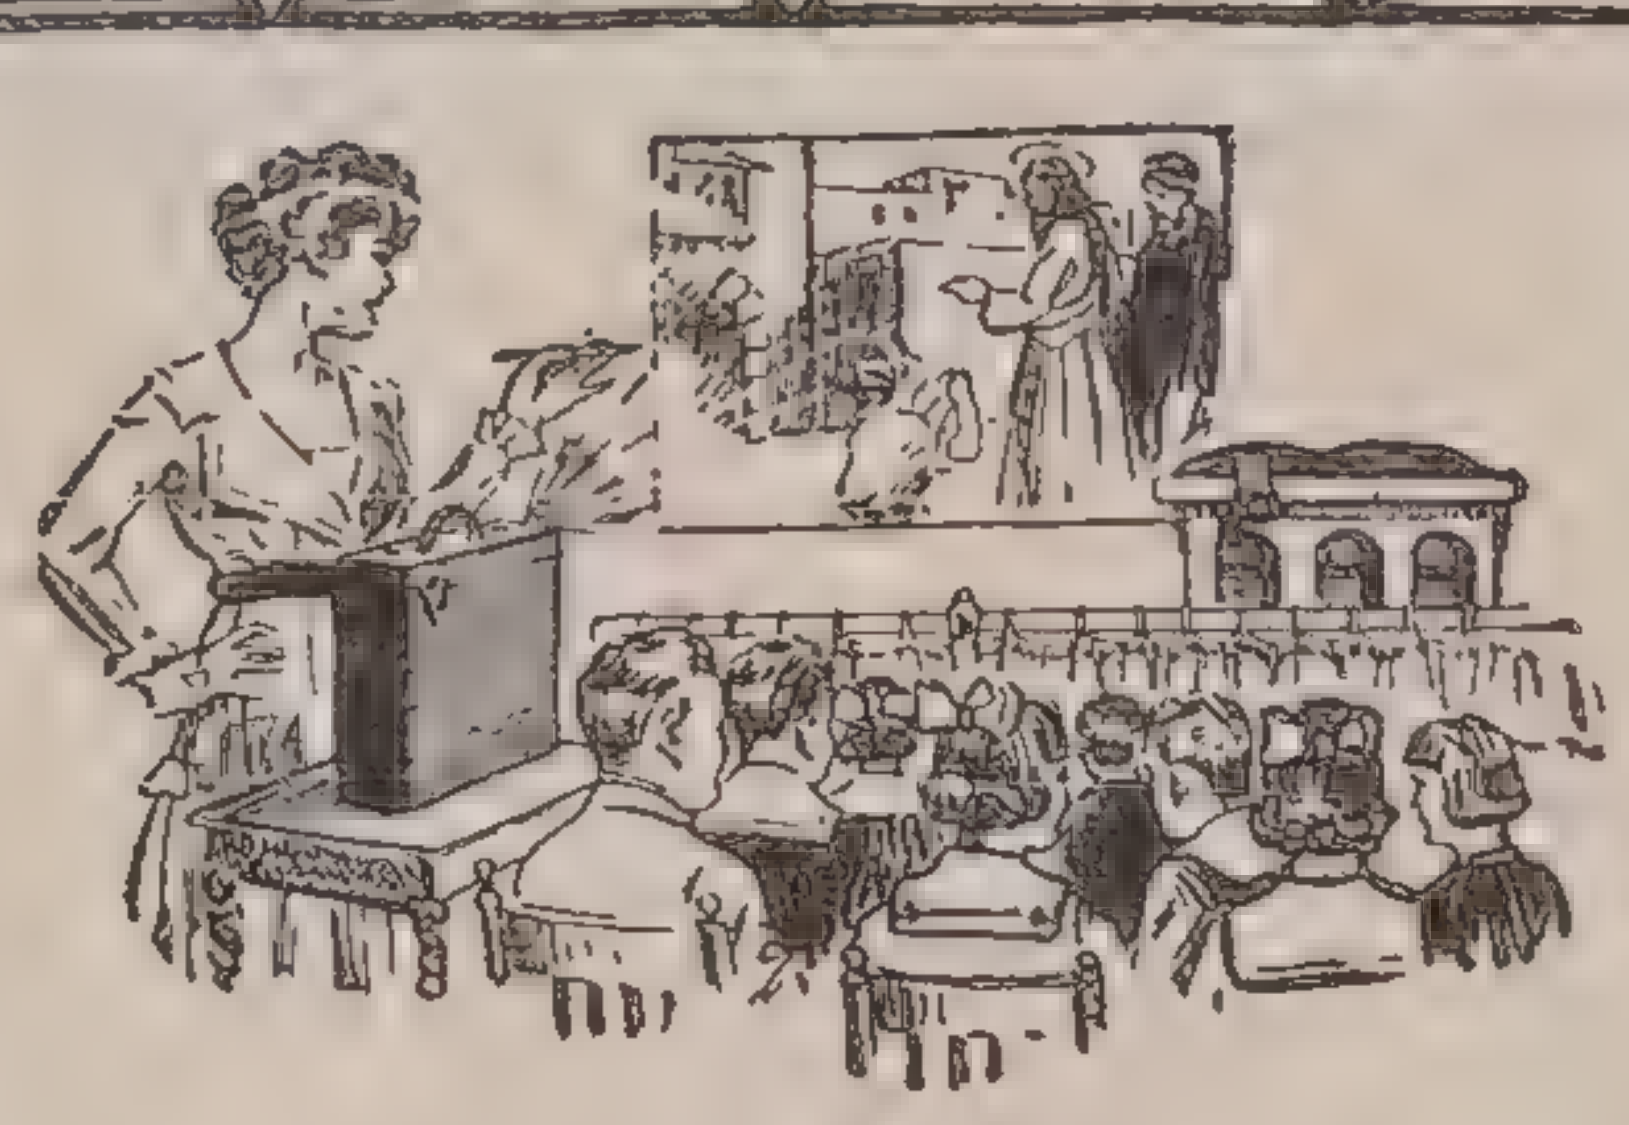
Rev. P. A. Sharpe of Minneapolis was elected Moderator for the coming year and Rev. W. K. Williams preacher. Addresses were made by Rev. J. Richmond Morgan on Recruiting for the Ministry, by Sec. H. C. Herring on The Congregational World Movement, and by President Cowling on Education and the Church. A full afternoon was given to the work of the W. B. M. I., Mrs. L. F. Jepson presiding.

The Tercentenary celebration on the evening of the last day was presided over by Dr. H. P. Dewey and the addresses were made by Dr. Nehemiah Boynton of Brooklyn on the topic, Our Pilgrim Heritage, and by Dr. Herring on The Pilgrim Spirit and the Task Ahead. This the 65th annual meeting of the Conference indicated that it is in fine working condition and that it is going forward aggressively in its task.

Colorado Convenes at Longmont

The 52d annual meeting of the Colorado forces was held in Longmont, where Pastor Markley and his people offered true Western hospitality. The program was inspiring, with messages from the veteran missionary, Rev. J. K. Browne of Turkey, Miriam Woodberry and Dr. W. S. Beard of the Home Missionary Society, P. R. Reynolds of the Education Society, and Miss Miriam Hagopian of Turkey. Dr. Browne especially won all hearts by his gentle courtesy and deeply spiritual message.

The sermon was delivered by Dr. H. N. Dascomb of Plymouth, Denver. Papers on Congregationalism by Rev. G. H. Burgess and Rev.



The De Vry
(projecting good films)
Helps the Church Pull!

The spoken word in Church and Sunday School is to make acts and thoughts live.

But words entering the mind through the ear do not carry the idea intended a fraction as far or as well as action entering the mind through the eye. This is a demonstrable fact!

But remember—a motion-picture is not a picture at all! It is a series of living acts—living thoughts—the living thing itself!"

What power, then, motion-pictures give to the city, suburban and country Church—their S. S. Superintendents and Teachers—their Men's and Boys' Clubs—their Aid and Missionary Societies—their Welfare Workers! If you secure the incomparable De Vry and project the right films, your Church and School possesses this new power.

The De Vry is built like a watch. It's boxed in a suitcase 17 inches square by 7 inches wide. Weighs 20 pounds. Carries anywhere. Any amateur can instantly and with perfect safety project pictures of professional quality. The De Vry, at work, stays in its case. All you do is to insert the plug into an electric light socket—press a button—and a picture up to 12 feet square is projected and up to 80 feet distant.

We invite Church and S. S. Officers, and especially S. S. Teachers, to write us about the De Vry, or films, or any phase of the motion-picture art. Teachers: write us individually and then lay the information we give before your associates.

If you fill out, sign and mail the coupon below, and write us a letter as to other details wanted, your inquiries will have our instant attention.

We have a new booklet just off the press. Why not write for that too?

W. O. Rogers showed the interest in the Tercentenary, while part of the closing session was given to Tercentenary addresses from the floor.

The reports of Dr. W. J. Minchin, Home Missionary Superintendent, and Dr. Frank J. Estabrook, Secretary of the Department of Education, were received with hearty approval. It was voted that the Superintendent's report should be read from the pulpits on June 20. The educational side of the work was also represented in an address by Rev. L. J. B. Tabor, director of religious education in Plymouth, Denver.

A greeting and report from the German churches in the state was read by Rev. Carl Stahl, and all were encouraged to know that this branch of Colorado Congregationalism is meeting its share of the Emergency Fund with enthusiasm.

Forward steps were taken in establishing closer relationship with Colorado College, and in providing part of the support for a religious work director at the State University. The per capita tax was raised four cents to meet increased needs.

Mr. Ray Kiteley, Mayor of Longmont, who gave the opening address of welcome, was elected moderator for next year. W. O. R.

SOUTH DAKOTA

Many Adults Received at Sioux Falls

As a result of a two weeks' series of special meetings, coupled with intensive personal work on the part of the pastor, SIOUX FALLS recently received 107 new members into membership, 63 of these on confession. Thirty were business and professional men of the community and 17 came from the church school and young people's department, making a total adult increase of 90.

The attendance at the Sunday services is increasing steadily week by week. It is estimated that 1,200 different people attend the morning and evening service on a normal Sunday. The present membership of the church is 680, 251 having been received during the present pastorate of two years. The trustees have just announced the completion of the drive to clear up the church debt, so that the entire church is now free from indebtedness. This church went over the top for the Congregational World Movement. Its quota of $39,400 for five years has been considerably oversubscribed. Rev. L. W. Fifield is pastor.

NORTH DAKOTA

Mayville Solves Church Unity Problem

Without much noise or publicity MAYVILLE, one of the leading towns of North Dakota, solved for itself the church problem. A few years ago the town had three Protestant churches; it now has one American Church, which has a larger membership than there were in the three before. Mayville is in the center of the rich Red River Valley and is the home of the oldest Normal School of the state. The American people of the community now work and worship together in one church.

Many of the old residents of the town, who had not been previously members of any church, have cast in their lot with this new organization. Special work is being done for the Normal School students. This includes a well-organized teacher training class. Commendations have come from many parts of the state where these trained Sunday school teachers have gone to teach.

The pastor, Rev. L. A. Lippitt, was given leave of absence for work overseas during the war. Since his return, his salary has been raised $400. The church is now one of the leading organizations of the state.

KANSAS

Mr. Sanderson Leaves Lawrence Church

PLYMOUTH, LAWRENCE, loses its talented and forceful pastor, Dr. R. W. Sanderson, to the Executive Secretaryship of the Wichita, Kan., Federation of Churches. Mr. Sanderson received a most unanimous call to this new and important project and commenced his labors May 16.

A Year Book recently published by Plymouth shows that under the ministry of Dr. Sanderson all the departments of the church have had a happy growth. In the last year more than $9,000 was received for the General Fund and nearly $3,000 for benevolences. In addition to this Plymouth is taking its generous share of the Emergency and Pilgrim Funds. With its many departments of work and its ministry to the life of the University, Plymouth is a working church with its doors open seven days in the week.

In addition to his duties as pastor and leader, Mr. Sanderson has entered into active work in the university life and has also been Moderator of the Kansas Conference. For a brief time he was Acting Superintendent of the state. It is due to his great ability as an organizer and his devotion to the details of the work of the denomination that the Congregational World Movement received so auspicious a start in the state. Mr. Sanderson finds no task too strenuous for his whole-hearted purpose and his call to this new work is a just tribute to his fitness for great responsibilities. F. G.

Great Bend Organizes Missionary Society

In addition to two Ladies' Societies in GREAT BEND, a missionary society was recently organized and is manifesting a lively and hearty interest. The young people of high school age are becoming increasingly active in the Young People's Society. They also have charge of the music at the evening service. Ten persons were received into church membership at Easter time, eight of these on confession. Rev. Frank Peyton is pastor.

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight-year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Eight ministers joined the Fund during the week of June 13 to 19.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

church. Deacon Calkins and Mr. Godfrey Miller are the only living charter members of the church. Mr. Calkins is 87 years old and still hale and hearty, taking an active part in the church activities. Rev. C. E. McKinley of Galesburg, Ill., Rev. W. A. McKinley of Minneapolis and Rev. M. D. Reed gave themselves to the Gospel ministry through the services of this church.

The anniversary sermon was preached by Dr. P. A. Johnson of Grinnell. Two former ministers of the church, Rev. J. H. Wilkins of Baxter and Rev. C. E. Cushman of Iowa Falls were also present. The church received into its fellowship on Easter morning 24 members, making the membership now 252. Rev. W. N. Boaz is pastor.

NEW YORK

Successful Experiment for Sunday Evenings

LEWIS AVE., BROOKLYN, Rev. F. I. Hanscom, pastor, reports a successful experiment along the line of Sunday evening services. During Lent, Lewis Ave. and Grace Presbyterian Churches joined forces on Sunday evenings, the service being held one week in Lewis Ave. Church, with Dr. Carson of Grace Church preaching and on the next Sunday in Grace Church, with Mr. Hanscom as preacher. The churches also joined in a three-hour service on the afternoon of Good Friday. The arrangement proved so satisfactory to both congregations that it will be continued on the first Sunday evening of each month. B. A.

New Organ for First, Pulaski

FIRST, PULASKI, during the past year renovated the manse at a cost of $1,500 and the church basement at a cost of $500. A handsome memorial window has been presented to First. A three-manual pipe organ is being installed at a cost of $6,000, of which $5,200 has already been secured. The Pilgrim Fund was oversubscribed.

On May 1 the salary of the pastor, Rev. F. H. Ferris, was advanced $500, this having been made possible by a 25 per cent. increase in subscriptions for the ensuing year. Twenty-two new members, 20 on confession, have been received into the church since the first of the year.

CONNECTICUT

Used Literature of Commission on Evangelism

During the Lenten season, Rev. T. B. Lathrop, pastor of FIRST, BRANFORD, preached a series of sermons on "Christian Deeds and Doctrines," on themes suggested by the "Fellowship of Prayer," issued by the National Council Commission on Evangelism. The mid-week services based on these same topics proved to be profitable and well attended. Each meeting was led by a different society of the church, a feature which added to the interest of the services. During March a series of union meetings were held Sunday evenings with the Baptist church. The pastor had a Lenten class of instruction for young people. On Easter Sunday 21 were received into the church, 14 by confession of faith. Six heads of families were in those received.

MASSACHUSETTS

Evangelist at East Douglas

A successful series of evangelistic meetings was recently concluded at SECOND, EAST DOUGLAS, under the leadership of the singing evangelist, Rev. George W. Cooper of Providence, R. I. The Protestant churches of East Douglas, Douglas, South Douglas, Manchaug and South Sutton, eight in number, representing three denominations, united in the campaign and were benefited through the meetings. Weeks of preparation preceded the campaign, in which the people of the participating churches held union prayer meetings, praying constantly and unitedly for God's blessing. A chorus composed of singers from the churches represented, led in the music, assisted by an able pianist and cornetist. Visiting delegations from the Congregational and Methodist churches of Uxbridge and the Presbyterian Church of Whitinsville, attended the meetings. There were about 90 conversions, chiefly among adult women and young people, and in addition to these, the churches themselves received a blessing which will follow them through the coming years.

Children's Hour at First, Marblehead

FIRST, MARBLEHEAD, Rev. L. C. Greeley, pastor, has arranged a new service for Sunday afternoons called "The Children's Hour." It is proving a very popular service, consisting of illustrated Bible talks by Mr. Greeley, plenty of spirited singing, often a story-telling period, missionary dialogues with foreign costumes, and other attractive features. These meetings are especially intended for children between the ages of eight and fifteen and supplement the work of the Sunday school, giving large numbers of the young folk an instructive and happy afternoon.

The church at its annual meeting recorded a highly prosperous year. The offerings for benevolences were more than double the amounts of previous years and the offerings for the current parish expenses showed similar gains. An active men's club of about 100 members and a flourishing woman's missionary organization with a membership of over 100, are valuable adjuncts to the life of this forward-looking and progressive church. Nearly a third of the total membership of the church has been added during the present pastorate.

Over Top for World Movement

PILGRIM, LEOMINSTER, has oversubscribed its quota for the Congregational World Movement nearly 25 per cent.

The church has suffered a great loss in the death of its organist, Mrs. Ada Cogswell Wilcox, one of the most efficient organists in New England. Pilgrim has voted to rebuild the organ, which has done service since 1872, at an approximate cost of $3,500. Eleven persons have recently united with the church, four of them heads of families, all of them upon confession of faith.

Harvard Summer School of Theology

The Faculty of Divinity in Harvard University, which maintained a three weeks' summer school of theology each year from 1899 to 1910, is announcing this year a resumption of its summer session. The school will run from July 6–23 inclusive, with a total of 45 lectures on religious and social problems, all by lecturers who are experts in their several fields.

There will be two sets of historical lectures, one of eight lectures on the Aspects of Early Christianity, and another of five lectures dealing with the Pilgrim Fathers. There will be a set of six lectures on Modern Philosophical and Theological Tendencies; a set of ten lectures on Problems of Social Reconstruction; and a set of fifteen lectures on the Minister's Work. Among the lecturers who are announced are the following: Mr. John Graham Brooks, an authority on social problems; Prof. T. N. Carver, Harvard University; Rev. Henry S. Coffin, D. D., of New York; Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, D. D., the well-known essayist; Dr. A. T. Davison, organist of Harvard University, and authority on church music; Dean H. W. Holmes of the Graduate School of Education, Harvard University; Dean W. W. Fenn, Prof. F. G. Peabody and Prof. Kirsopp Lake of Harvard Divinity School; Pres. G. E. Horr of Newton Theological Institution; Dean J. W. Platner of Andover Seminary; Mr. John F. Moors, President of the Associated Charities in Boston; and Prof. R. D. Perry and Prof. G. G. Wilson of Harvard University.

The tuition fee for the school will be $15. The university has set aside one of the new freshman dormitories—Standish Hall on the Charles River Parkway—to provide housing accommodations for the school, so that those attending will be lodged and fed in comfortable and attractive quarters. Lodging is provided at cost, the charge ranging from $28.75 to $38.25, according to the location of the room.

This Summer School of Theology offers an exceptional opportunity for ministers who are in New England in July to spend three weeks amid delightful and interesting surroundings, where they can secure a high degree of intellectual stimulus and refreshment for a very modest expenditure.

For information apply to the Secretary of the Harvard Divinity School, Divinity Ave., Cambridge, Mass.

Miss Mabel E. Patten

Miss Mabel E. Patten, Educational Assistant in the Boston office of the Congregational Education Society, passed to her reward in the morning of June 15.

Miss Patten was the daughter of S. H. and Helen W. Patten, and was born in Bedford, N. H., Sept. 8, 1874. Practically all her life was spent in Woburn, where for sixteen years she taught in the public schools, becoming educational assistant to Dr. Stephen A. Norton in First Church from 1911 to 1917, when she took up her work with the Education Society.

She had endeared herself to a wide circle of friends all over the country and particularly in Woburn, where she had to a remarkable degree made herself a part of the religious life of the community. Because of her practical experience in religious education, her service with the Education Society was of rare value, and the rapidly increasing number of church workers who sought her counsel through personal interview and correspondence gave testimony to her insight and ability.

The funeral service was held on Wednesday at the Norton home in Woburn and was conducted by Dr. Norton.

Miss Patten is survived by her mother, brother, three nephews and three nieces.

Labor and the Church

Rev. Otis Cary, American Board Missionary to Japan, on a recent visit to Los Angeles had an experience that interprets the thought of some of the labor agitators who are stirring up the present unrest. Dr. Cary writes: "It was in a sidewalk meeting that the speaker accused the churches and ministers as being under capitalistic control, made much of young Rockefeller's prominence in the Interchurch Movement, and read from a paper Roger Babson's remarks on religion as what was needed for the protection of business interests. Some of the listeners interjected remarks on the other side, and I finally added a word, which led the agitator to turn on me, and for a few minutes we two had the floor. I do not think any of the people suspected me of being a minister, though I stood up for such as being among the laborers' best friends. It was interesting to see in those two groups of workingmen that there were several who resented attacks on Christianity."

Special Offer to Congregational Ministers

Let us send you without charge, postage paid, enough of either one of the pamphlets "Is the Tithe a Debt?" by Dan B. Brummitt, "Proportionate Giving," by Robert E. Speer, or "How to Tithe and Why," by "Layman," to furnish one copy to all the families in your congregation.

With the shipment we will send you (1) a special offer by which at very slight expense you can educate your people in practical stewardship; (2) samples of ten or more pamphlets by the use of which their education can be accomplished; (3) a sample Tithing Account Book and copy of "Adventures in Tithing," which we furnish gratis to all who sign tithing pledges; (4) literature containing helpful material for sermons and talks on stewardship and tithing.

This offer, which is made with the approval and co-operation of the Congregational Tithers League, will stand until Aug. 1, 1920. Please mention The Congregationalist.

An Interesting Delegate

Beyond question the delegates who will have traveled the longest distance to the Council are Rev. and Mrs. Ernest A. Bridger, from Auckland, New Zealand, who arrived a few days ago via San Francisco. Mr. Bridger, a native of Chichester in old England, and lineally connected with Pilgrim families of the olden time, has been since 1910 pastor of the Green Lane Congregational Church in Auckland, in whose Association of nearly forty churches is found that Congregational church nearest the South Pole. In 1914, when the war broke out, Mr. Bridger chanced to be in London, and at once started for Egypt where he met the New Zealand regiment of which he had been chaplain for two years. He was ordered back to New Zealand to aid in recruiting and helped dispatch division after division of the Maori, whose record as soldiers in the later months was so noteworthy.

Since the close of the war he has continued his duties in the army, but has been granted a two years' leave of absence without pay to take charge of raising a memorial fund for those killed in the war. As this is gathered its first use will be to erect a memorial church in Auckland, which it is hoped to make a center for the social and spiritual life of those who go back from military to civic life; but in addition to provide funds for better salaries for the ministers who follow these soldiers, as they come back from England with their English wives and strike out for home-making into "the bush," as the interior is called, to conquer the densely wooded hills and mountains and utilize for agriculture and grazing the wonderful richness of the land.

Mr. Bridger gives the highest praise to the character of these new settlers, many of them with university degrees; but emphasizes the hopelessness of seeking to influence them religiously, with their present reactions from war, unless strong and forceful preachers can be given adequate financial support. He describes the situation as similar to that in our own land, where adequately equipped men, adequately supported, must be the only hope of solving our moral problems.

Mr. and Mrs. Bridger, who go on to England in about a month, will return to their distant home later in the year, bringing, it is to be hoped, well-filled sheaves in the shape of support for their great work. J. L. S.

the walk and received the little white figure thrust into her arms.

"I'll wave the baby. Don't you see, they're a flag. Red, white an' blue—me first with the baby, because he's red; then you, mother, with Nelly; then Tony with Jennie because she's blue. We'll stand in a row right behind the gate. When I say 'ready,' we'll all wave. Maybe"—Ann Mary's voice thrilled—"maybe they'll cheer, like they do at other flags."

Nearer and nearer—very near now. The band was playing a patriotic tune, but in rather a spiritless way, as if it were not quite worth while here in Dreary Street—wait till they came out on Beautiful Street and then listen! The marching men were not marching quite in time. So they all came on toward Ann Mary and her little living flag.

"Ready!" breathed Ann Mary and grasped the red-swathed baby firmly. With all the strength of her lean little arms she waved him; mother waved—Tony waved. The sign, "C. Flagg" stood out plainly and blackly and those who marched read.

Some one understood and passed the word on. Understanding flew from rank to rank—they all understood. They knew it was a flag! Ann Mary read it in all their faces and, trembling and still waving, waited. Would they—oh, would they—

They did.

"Halt!" commanded a great voice.

The ranks stood still before Ann Mary's flag. Caps came off and waved tumultuously. Cheer after cheer rang out splendidly. It seemed to Ann Mary, waving the baby in her tired arms, as though the pride and joy in her swelling little heart would break it. Dreary Street turned to Beautiful Street before her shining eyes. She stood up very straight indeed in spite of her aching back.

Then the band burst out jubilantly and the procession marched on. The music was not spiritless now and every man marched in time. Ann Mary caught the tableclothed baby to her with a happy cry: "O baby, you've been waved for your country. You've been part of a flag, baby—you've been cheered!"

Father: "Now, my son, I'm going to give you some good advice. Some day you'll wish you had taken it. It's the same advice I wish I had taken when my father gave it to me."—Life.

Why

EVERY CONGREGATIONALIST
SHOULD READ

The Congregationalist
and Advance

Because it is the only representative periodical of the Congregational denomination and therefore the only means of keeping you in touch with the activities in our churches, and with the big Forward Movements.

Because it is a means of binding its readers more closely together through common knowledge and interests, thus making for unity and strength in our denomination.

Because it educates our young people to think broadly and sanely and stimulates them to more active Christian service in their own church work.

Because it is forward looking and gives a Christian interpretation to the current events of the day as well as reveals the ideals and thoughts of our great Christian leaders.

Because it fills a need in every home that cannot be supplied by the daily newspaper or secular magazine.

Because a wholesome religious journal is essential to the development of the highest and best in the home and church life.

Almost

A Half Century

of Business Success in the Midwest

C. F. PETTYJOHN, Pres.

THE LATE
J. L. PETTYJOHN, Founder

THE firm of J. L. Pettyjohn & Company was established in 1874 by the late Mr. J. L. Pettyjohn at Olathe, Kansas. Mr. Pettyjohn was born and raised near Savannah, Missouri, on a farm, moving to Olathe, Kansas, in 1861.

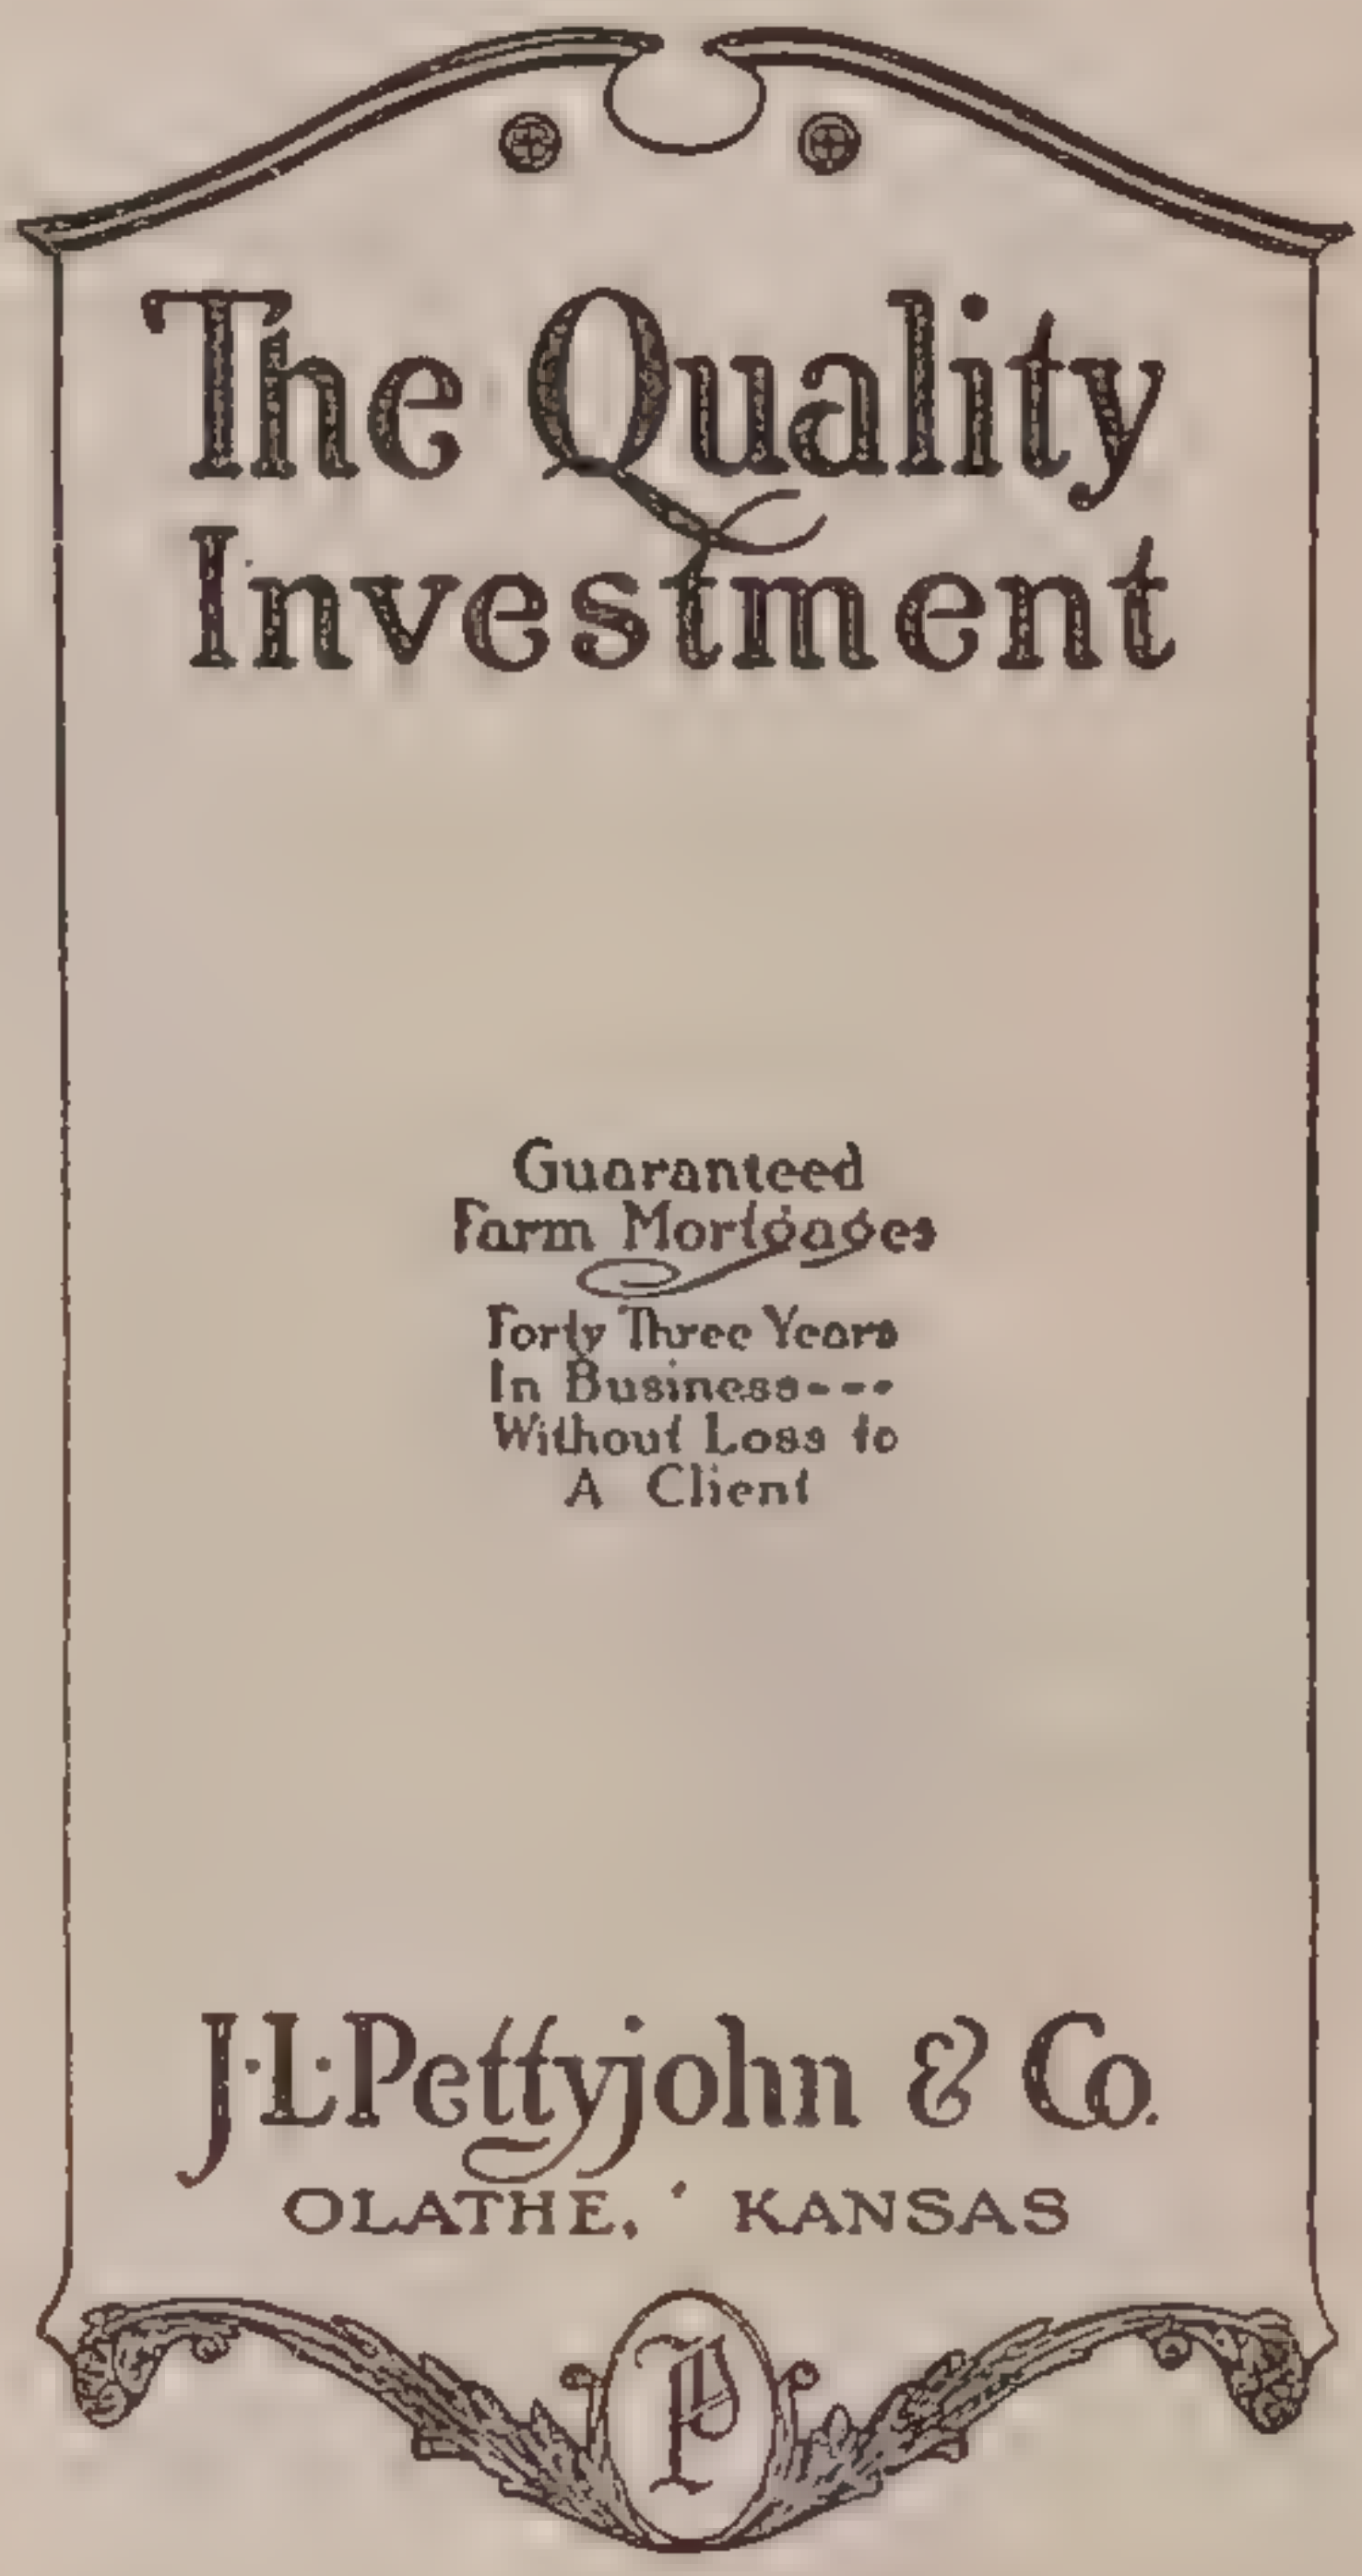
The business since developed grew from the determination of Mr. Pettyjohn, though he began without any capital, to make a place in the business world for himself. The policy of the business as laid down by him at that time was that he would never sell a security of any kind without his personal guarantee. That policy has been adhered to since the foundation of the business. He wanted his financial backing as well as his moral backing behind all matters of his business.

The company had no connection in any way with Eastern money at the time of its foundation, and the growth has been one that has been gradual and largely due to the policies outlined at the very outset of the business.

Business has been confined to Eastern Kansas and Northwestern and Central Missouri. This is one of the most productive farming sections of the country, where the farmers have been able to raise diversified crops, and it is also one of the best regions for grain and stock raising purposes.

J. L. Pettyjohn & Company is at present headed by C. F. Pettyjohn, son of the great founder of the organization, who for the past two years has directed its policies. Mr. Pettyjohn grew up at Olathe, Kansas, and for a period of three years, after leaving school, was in Oklahoma in the banking and cattle business. He returned in 1900 to form a partnership with his father, and Mr. C. F. Pettyjohn has largely taken over the marketing of the mortgages as his department.

Mr. J. W. Thomas, the head examiner, has been with the firm between fifteen and twenty years. Mr. Thomas was raised on a farm, had a college education, and has proven himself to be an expert in his line.

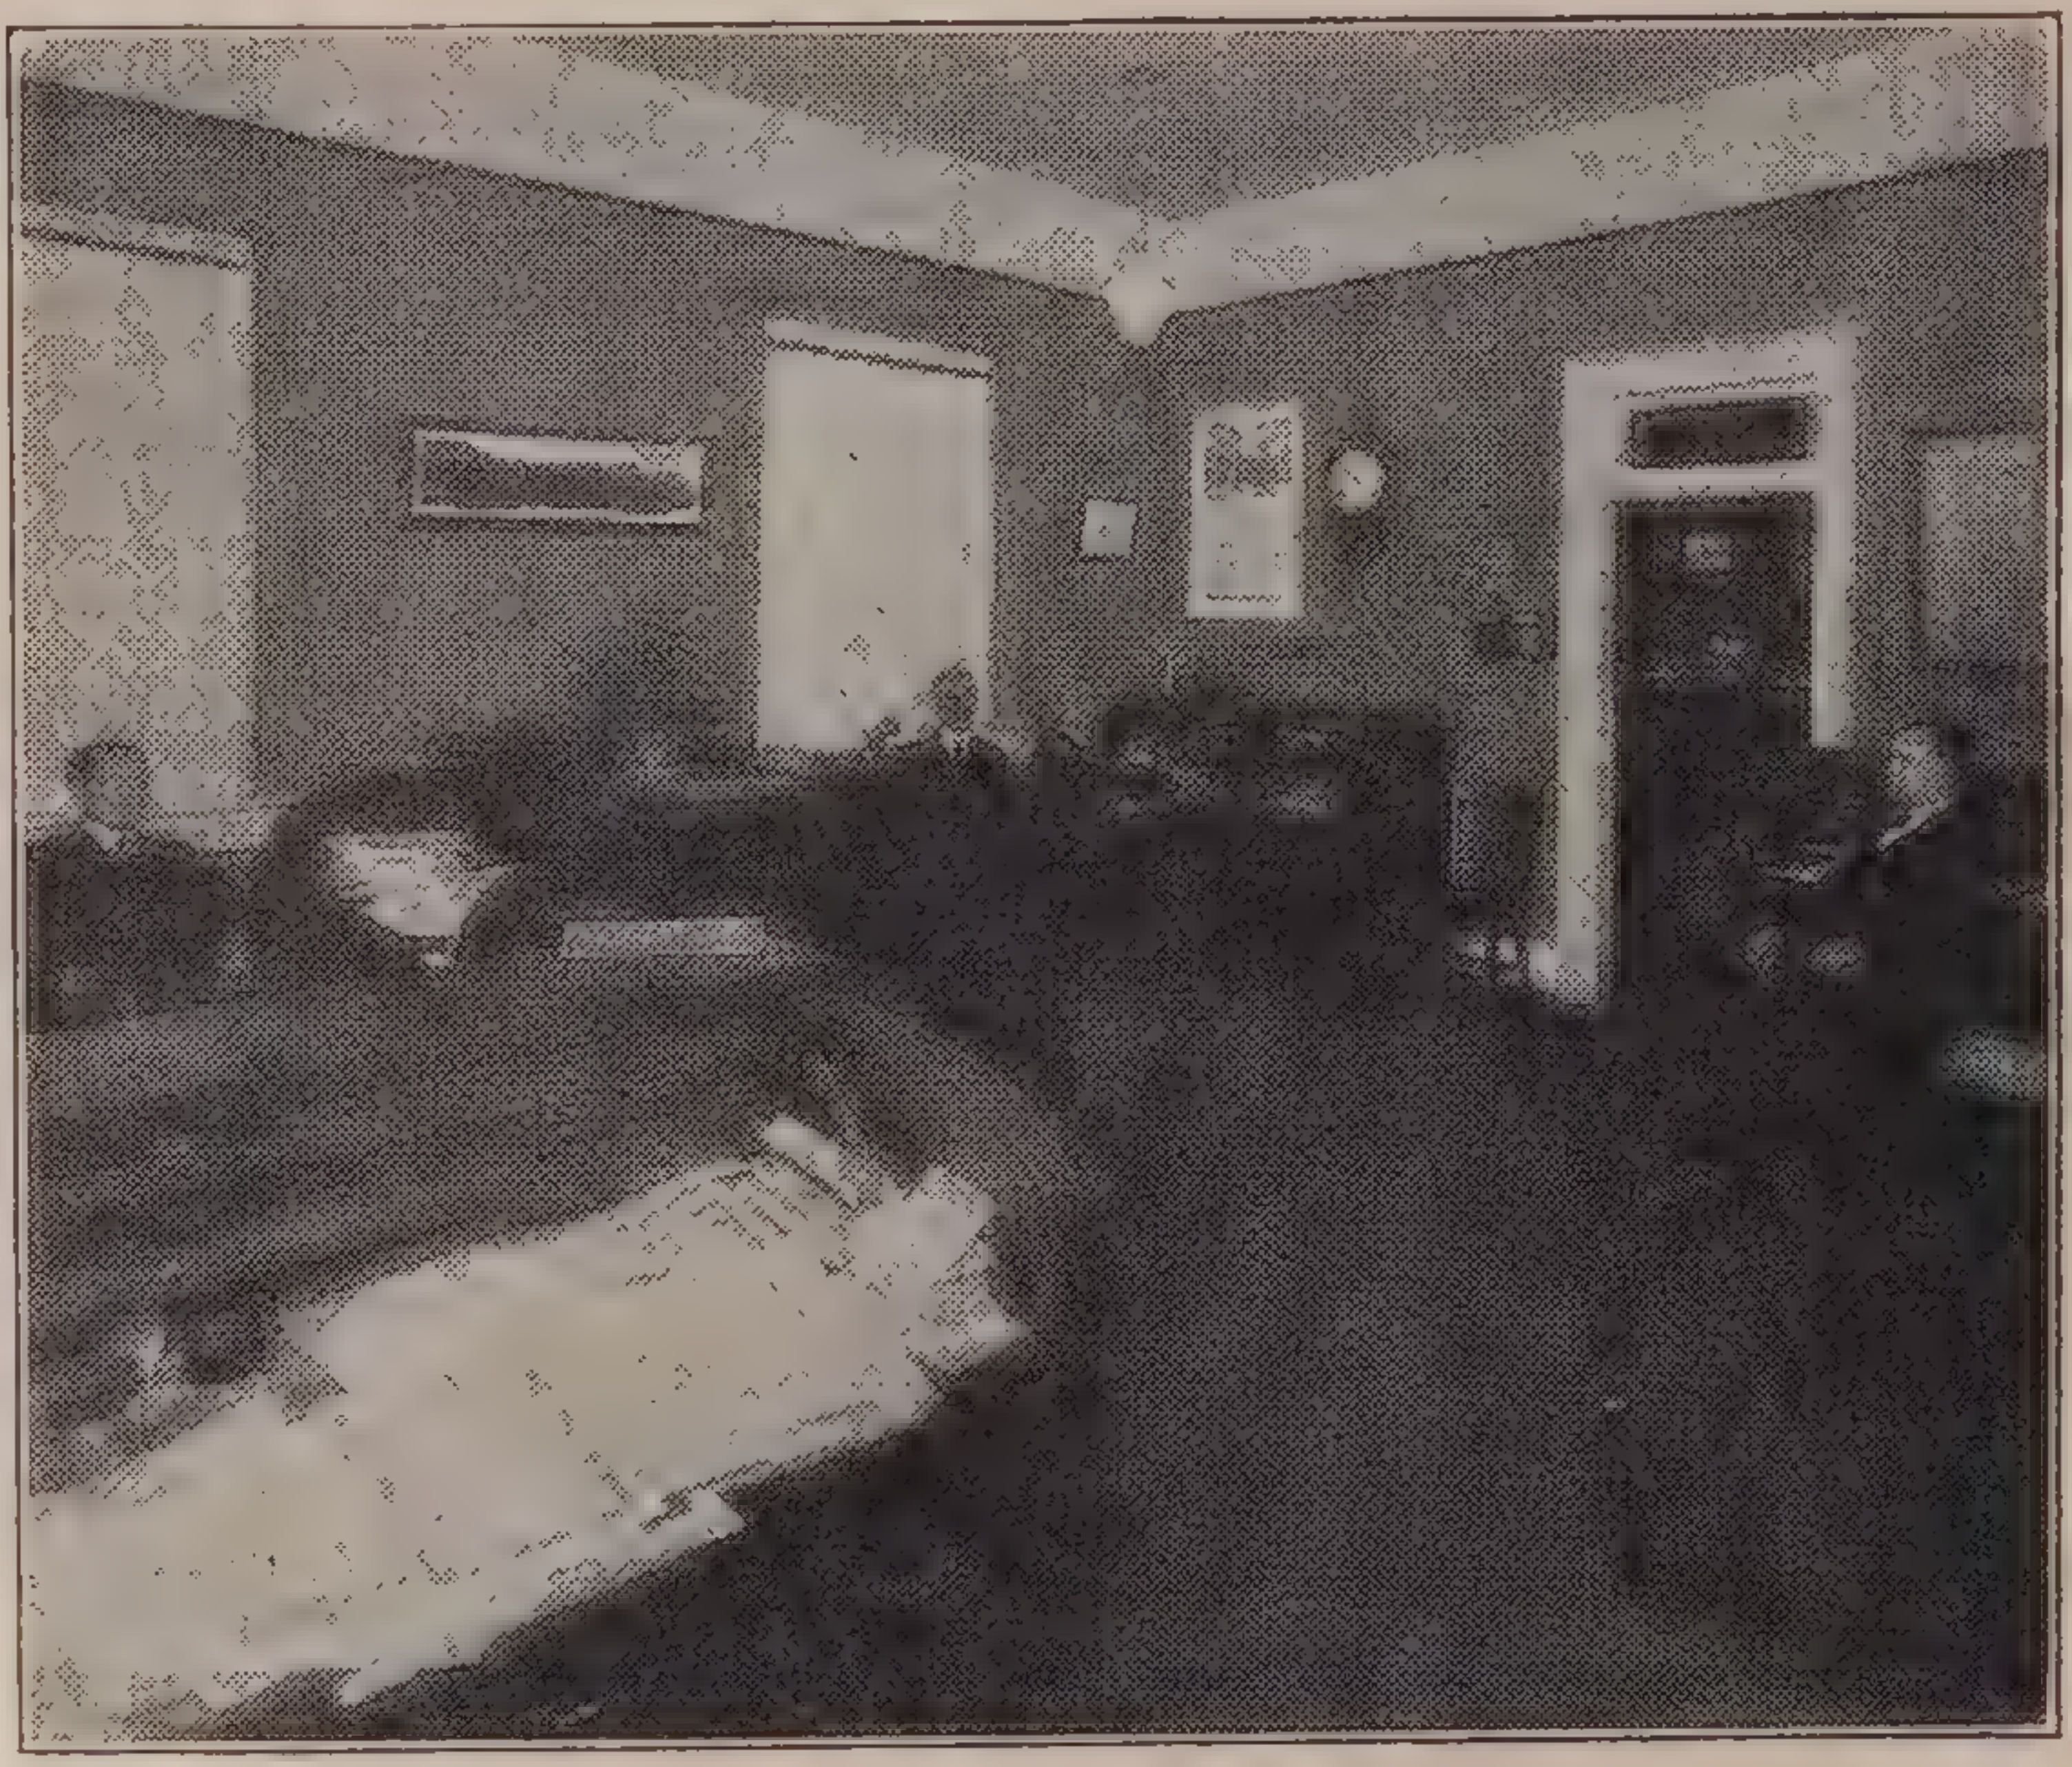


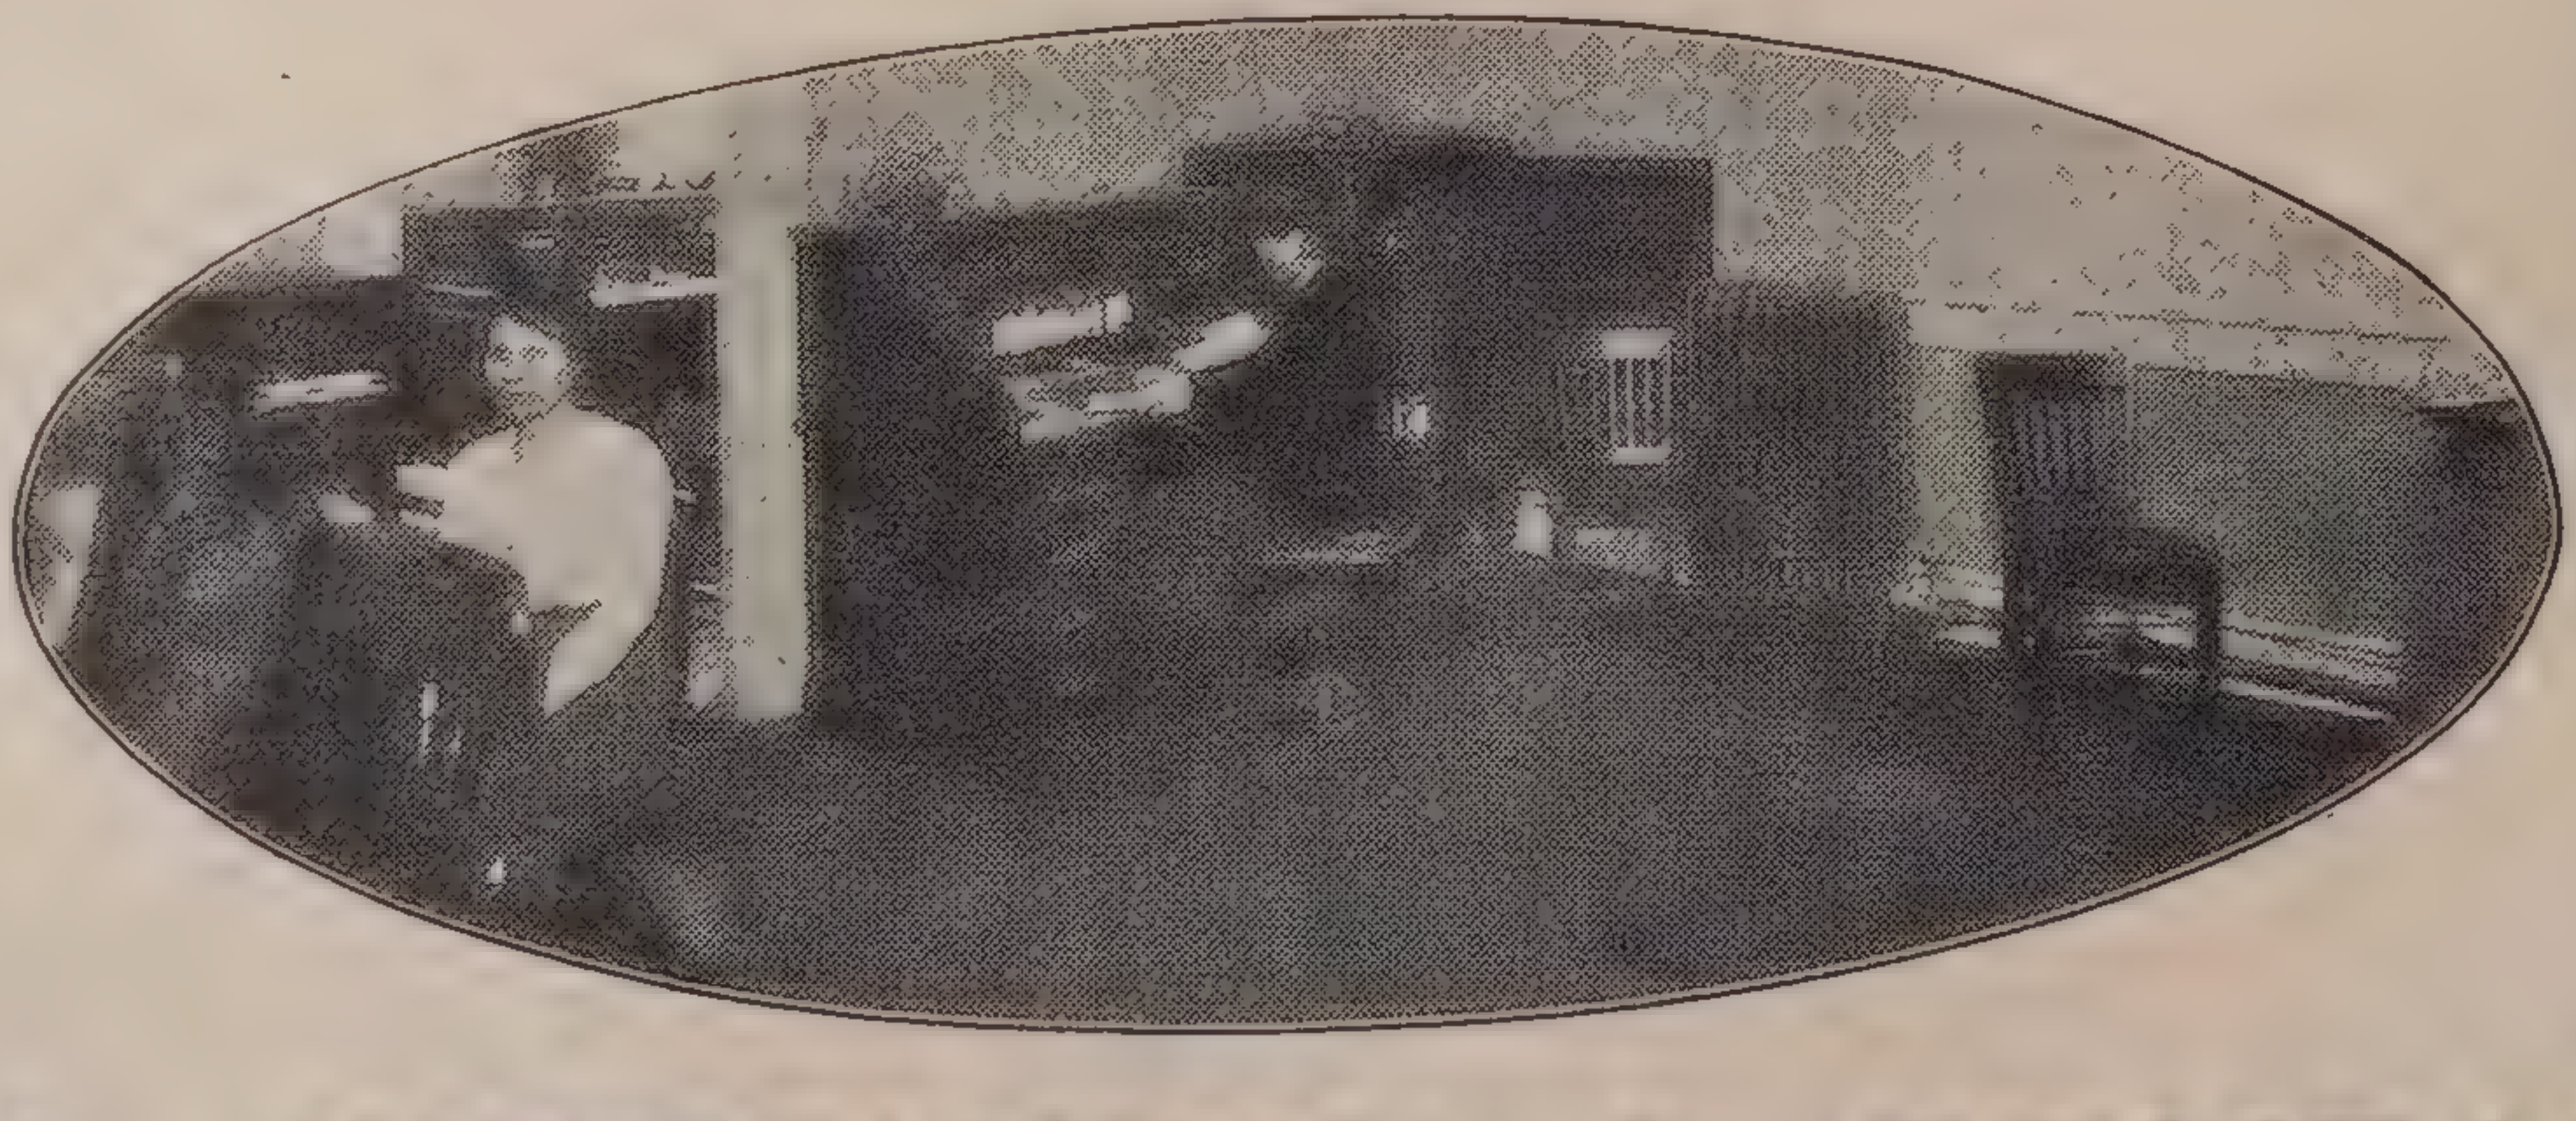
The Quality Investment

Guaranteed Farm Mortgages

Forty Three Years In Business--- Without Loss to A Client

J·L·Pettyjohn & Co.
OLATHE, KANSAS





Mr. Ray L. Shuey, who joined the force since the war, was a teacher in high school and spent twenty-six months in the army, twenty-one months overseas. Mr. Shuey was raised on a farm and will be a very valuable asset to the force.

Mr. Roscoe Smith, who has charge of the insurance department, has been with the firm for some fifteen years.

Miss Hendrickson, our chief bookkeeper, has had charge of this department for some seventeen years.

It is self-evident that the heads of these departments have had long years of experience and are very efficient. Because of their faithfulness and loyalty a great deal is due to them for the success of the firm.

The business has been brought from nothing to a considerable size. We sold to one firm last year a million dollars' worth of loans, besides the other numerous connections and dealings with individuals. The business has grown up into the millions of dollars each year. We pride ourselves with the fact that, during our 46 years, the business has never lost one cent for a customer. This is one of the big outstanding facts to prove the solidity of the original foundation laid by J. L. Pettyjohn, adherence to sound business ethics, and most careful operation from every angle.

Our clientele has grown up during these many years through our satisfactory relations with individuals, life insurance companies, trust funds and investment houses. We have individual investors who have been on our books for over forty years.

If you are interested in farm mortgages as an investment, we will gladly furnish you references and specific information. We would be happy to count you as one of our customers.

The Talk of the Sanctum

Who's Who in This Week's Issue

HERBERT ATCHINSON JUMP, who gives us an account of the opening of the International Council in Boston, is pastor of the First Congregational Church in Manchester, N. H. Former pastorates of Mr. Jump's have been in Redlands and Oakland, Cal., and in New Britain, Ct.

OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT is Mr. Arthur Porritt, editor of the London Christian World. He is now in this country. His characterizations of some of the British Delegates, which have recently appeared in our columns, have aroused much interest.

FRANCIS E. CLARK is "Father Endeavor" Clark of the Christian Endeavor Society and a well-known figure in religious circles. He sounds a ringing note for recruiting younger leaders for the ministry and other Christian work.

DOREMUS SCUDDER is a Congregational clergyman, formerly a missionary in Japan, after that pastor of Central Union Church in Honolulu. In 1916 Dr. Scudder returned to Japan to become minister of the Tokyo Union Church. During the later years of the war he was in Red Cross work in Vladivostok, and has just accepted the call of the Boston Federation of Churches to become its secretary.

The International Council

The next week's issue of The Congregationalist will be larger than usual and will cover in detail the great International Congregational Council at Boston. The Opening Sessions only are reported this week.

In the Circulation Department—

There are various conceptions regarding the real character and functions of a Circulation Department; some folks think of it as handling entirely the business of a given publication; others regard it as mechanical in character with its chief function that of increasing the circulation and getting money from subscribers. But we want our readers to think of The Congregationalist Circulation Department as a sympathetic and human part of our organization. It is truly said that the life of any business is found in its correspondence. And it is the happy privilege of our department to be the channel through which a large part of our correspondence is handled. Because of the nature of our publication we come into more intimate and friendly relationship with our readers. It is always a delight to receive your open frank criticisms and your heartening words of appreciation of the paper which we are all endeavoring to make increasingly better. We want to know you and welcome always your letters of confidence and friendliness. May you feel that we are ready to serve you at all times.

From Our Mail Bag

"For years I have considered the paper one of the best of religious papers printed. I find it not pleasant to ask that it be stopped at least for the present."

"Allow me to express my appreciation of the high standard which you have set and which is being so constantly maintained in the character of the paper."

"You are certainly right in assuming that I want your helpful and inspiring paper for another year. I find it altogether indispensable."

The Congregationalist and Advance

Backward or Forward—Which?

CURIOUSLY interblended is the world of politics and the world of religion. What happens in one speedily finds its reflection in the other. If autocracy in the state puts iron fetters upon freedom of thought and expression, the church tends to develop on parallel lines. If in the state democracy is in the saddle, encouraging and sheltering variations of opinion, the form of church life is correspondingly more fluid and diversified.

Whatever the form of government, whenever a revolution or reaction takes place, something similar is bound to happen in the church. Just now reactionary tendencies are at work both in the state and in the church. Three years ago the stage was set in the interests of internationalism. Great powers associated in military and naval undertakings were speaking frequently of "our gallant Allies." Hope beat high in many hearts that one compensation for the offering of blood and treasure would be such a drawing together of the nations as mankind had never known. But today a discredited nationalism is trying to re-establish itself in all lands. It meets, to be sure, with opposition more or less vigorous from liberally minded citizens. On the other hand, ambitious politicians and eager money-makers discern the personal advantages that may come from this recrudescence of nationalistic feeling. "America first!" shouts the hyper-patriot. "I love my country and I am too old to change," says the seasoned party campaigner. "If we do not take care of our own nation, who will?"

WITHIN the church similar influences are at work to produce suspicion of the soundness of certain religious bodies, to divide brethren in the same family or to find all the flaws possible in every plan for co-operation and unity. Denominational pride is aroused by appeals to "what our fathers stood for" and by the recital of a long series of achievements in the past. Denominational ambition is stimulated by the assertion that no community is properly churched unless "our kind of a church" is there. We hear no more stirring incidents about the way in which Protestant chaplains, Catholic padres and Hebrew rabbis fraternized in camp and on the battlefield, giving the cup of cold water to the wounded man without stopping to ascertain his denominational preferences and standing together in common grief at the edge of the grave when the bodies of brave men were being lowered to their last resting place.

INTERNATIONALISM in jeopardy, interdenominationalism in jeopardy—that is the situation today. The reaction is in full swing, both in state and church. We cannot look upon it, however, as anything but temporary. It is a part of the effects of the moral shell-shock from which President Lowell of Harvard says the world is suffering. We are victims of fear and cowardice. We are afraid that something untoward is going to happen to our nation and our denomination, and we foolishly think that by keeping free from all entangling alliances we can save our own skins.

But we are as shortsighted as we are cowardly. These two principles are in the world to stay. They may be for a time ignored, but they are so intricately bound up with the purposes of God in Jesus Christ for the human race that they are bound in time to emerge more clear and commanding because of their temporary obscuration and rejection.

THE nations cannot go on much longer each scheming for its own advantage, each making its own defenses as strong as possible, each breathlessly striving to be first in the markets of the world. Some form of association which means fair and genuine and thorough-going co-operation must come to pass. Indeed, thirty-five nations are already working together. The United States lines up with Honduras, Haiti and one or two little states in staying out of the League. But this anomalous state of things cannot last forever. Such isolation is as much out of place as is the old buncombe Fourth of July oratory of a generation ago. America has a serious and responsible part to take in world affairs and it will take it in time.

It will not be otherwise with interdenominationalism. The Interchurch World Movement may be reconstructed or even set one side. Dr. Newman Smyth's vision of an Episcopal-Congregational concordat may not be realized. The World Conference of Faith and Order, if it ever comes, may prove to be only a talk-feast. The plan for organic union started by the Presbyterians and semi-officially indorsed by other strong bodies, may not prove the exact path to unity. But something is going to happen in the course of the next twenty-five years that will bring relief to over-churched communities, that will better deploy Christian forces, that will bring more young men into the ministry, that will provide more adequate religious education for Protestant boys and girls, that will raise up sufficient sinews of war for the missionary adventurers at home and abroad. True churches of Christ are not going to remain forever apart, eying one another suspiciously, competing for the same outsider, with no common program, no proper understanding of each other's aims and methods.

MEANWHILE those of us who believe that God has something better for our world than a stiff nationalism and a stiff denominationalism must not lose heart. We must educate or re-educate our patriots to see that love of country can exist with love of party. We must educate or re-educate our fellow Christians to see that all that is best in the history and present usefulness of any denomination can be helpfully related to the common witness bearing and service of all Christian churches. It may be a laborious task, but no harder than it was to persuade the states of the Union to federate or to persuade the Church to make a venture with foreign missions. At any rate, this is the task of the moment from which not even the heats of summer or the heats of politics ought to divert earnest men and women.

International Congregationalism on Parade

Nearly three hundred years span the interval between the visit of Dr. Samuel Fuller of the Plymouth Colony to the Puritan settlement at Salem and the fourth International Congregational Council which is in the midst of its sessions as we go to press. But in that friendly visit of the physician of the Mayflower which strengthened the ties between the infant colonies were the germs of the splendid fellowship which has been finding expression these last eight days in speech and song and prayer. The noble countenances of Andrew Fairbairn, R. W. Dale, Silvester Horne and of Henry M. Dexter, Leonard Bacon and Samuel B. Capen which looked down from the front of the galleries upon the two thousand delegates assembled in Mechanics Hall from all over the world were reminders that we, too, are in a truly apostolic succession and that what these great English and American leaders of the last generation did to illuminate the Congregational faith and to solidify the Congregational units must be conserved and amplified by the generation now on the stage.

Congregationalists are built for fellowship. It has taken them nearly three hundred years to achieve it on a large scale and it is by no means yet made perfect, but the slow growth conduces all the more to stability and power. Congregationalists need one another and want one another, and when they are bound together in the local, national or international group, the sense of brotherhood and interdependence is the stronger because it is a voluntary union, conserving all that the free spirit of Congregationalism demands as the right of every individual congregation under the leadership of Christ.

Thus brought together through the working of common impulses and of the desire to know and love and serve each other better, international Congregationalism has a healthy look to the eyes of every beholder.

It does not become us to boast of superior brains, culture or piety. But any one who took the measure of the Council and who thought of the work these earnest men and women are doing in the church and the school, in the home and the state, found himself saying over and over again, "Yes, it is a goodly fellowship." Within the fellowship are men of distinction, whose books and platform utterances have a wide influence, as well as less famous, but no less devoted delegates who have carried the torch of learning and religion into the dark places of the earth, who in obscure and ill rewarded fields have given their best to the betterment of their communities. A hint of the wonderful results was given in the Congregational World Exhibit.

With little ecclesiastical machinery, with no sectarian pride, with no unseemly squabbles for the ecclesiastical loaves and fishes, Congregationalism has and is pursuing its way, contented and glad to make its own contribution to the uplifting of the world and to make that contribution every decade more distinctive and more weighty.

The Boston Council has been showing us how close we are to one another. Thought in the field of theology and sociology ranges from ultra-conservatism to advanced liberalism, but we have no feuds. Full of reverence this Tercentenary year for our historic past we are not so rooted in it that we cannot, as Moderator Barton said in his response to the delegates, "Move forward and step lively." Indeed the genius of Congregationalism is its forward-looking spirit. We are not only ready for the larger truth, which John Robinson bade us ever to expect and for the wider ecclesiastical unity and for the more Christian, social and international order, but we would have the present generation of Congregationalists in the United States and in Canada, in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and other lands, help to usher in the better day. The Council just closing will send its attendants back over land and sea to bear their witness and to do their work more effectively while the day lasts.

Is Home Life Christian?

How far is it still true in America that the influence of the home is Christian? It used to be so. Not always wisely, but with full intention, the home teaching was directed toward making Christians of the children and the conduct of the older members of the family more or less was controlled by the thought of setting an example of proper Christian living. Is it so today in as large a proportion of American homes as it was half a century ago?

At least it must in all honesty be said that some of the outward observances of Christian belief have been crowded out of busy days in that general sacrifice of leisure which we call life. Governor Bradford relates how the exploring party of the Pilgrims, in that cold December when they were not even as yet assured of a place to settle, were alarmed in their camp at midnight by savage yells which seemed to threaten an attack. Next morning the threats were renewed and they woke before dawn to meet the peril. First came prayer, then breakfast, then arrangements to meet the attack. How many of their descendants nowadays would think prayer had the right of way in such a program of the morning? How many have kept up the practice of family prayer even in the unthreatened days of our settled life? At how many tables is united acknowledgement of God's merciful kindness voiced by the head of the house?

Of course it may be said that these outward observances are not of the substance of the religious life. And that is true enough. But by what are they replaced as an element in the thought of the family and especially of the children? Does anything take the place of that catechizing which was a direct attempt to fulfill the duty of a parent to his child in the matter of religious teaching? Do our Christian parents in any way give their children to understand that they are directly interested in their growth into the Christian life? How are we fulfilling in our homes that idea of Christian nurture which Dr. Bushnell made so effective a challenge to New England Christians? We should like more light on these questions from the Christian parents and observers who follow the Congregational way.

In an interesting article on another page Clara D. Pierson tells about a home which was so steeped in the Christian atmosphere that those who knew it loved to return because they felt the presence and the power of Christ. That is the substance of the whole matter. If Christian parents are so entirely Christian that they live continually in fellowship with Christ, the manner of formal witness does not so much matter. But will there not be, naturally and almost inevitably, some form of habitual outward expression for that inward spirit? And what, under the conditions of our life of today, is the best and most effective form for that expression?

Greece in America's Place

What America has refused in the way of duty and opportunity in Asia Minor is now offered to and accepted by Greece. Premier Venezelos insisted not only that Smyrna should not be given back to Turkey as the price of peace with the Turkish Nationalists, but also that the Greek troops should be given, if not a mandate, at least an unhampered opportunity of dealing with the Nationalist armies. Greece has begun a campaign which will test both the warlike quality of her soldiers and the qualities of their leadership. The British government has denied that the Greeks have British backing; but it is true that British troops are in Constantinople and British warships are in conflict with the Turks on the shores of the Sea of Marmora and are on guard all through the straits and at points in the Black Sea.

This is war, of course; war which might have been avoided if the Allies had agreed upon a firm and consistent course with the Turks when they were conquered as a result of General Allenby's victory at Samaria, or if America had at once embraced its opportunity in Armenia. But the Allies have not been agreed—they are not agreed today. France has apparently reached the conclusion that Cilicia is not worth the cost of a campaign. Italy is altogether against coercing the Turk. America has refused responsibility. The British mean to keep the straits clear, but nothing more. The Greek army, in the field and ready, was the one instrument prepared for the hand of the Allies, and they have simply removed the former veto on its advance without taking open responsibility for the results.

Two questions must be settled by the course of events in the future, the answer to either of which might have a decisive effect on the fate of Anatolia and Armenia. One concerns the fighting spirit and the military resources of Turkish nationalism. The Turk is a brave fighter and he undoubtedly hates the Greek. But we do not know how far his weariness of war can be overcome or with what resources he is able to meet a modern and well-equipped army such as that of Greece claims to be. Will his fatalism work for a last attempt to stand at bay, in his own mountains? Does the Turkish peasant really care enough for Smyrna and Thrace to endure the hardships of a campaign?

The other question concerns Russia, which must sooner or later be dealt with both in regard to the control of Constantinople and the Straits, which for centuries her leaders have regarded as a chief Russian aim; and as to the lordship, political or moral, over Armenian territory much of which was hers before the outbreak of the war. Russian forces are already on the borders of Armenia on their way to make trouble for Great Britain in India and Persia. The results of that advance are as yet incalculable.

Some of the Armenian leaders have expressed the opinion that, America being unattainable, Greece is the next best helper of their people. But with the return of active war we must look for further drivings-out and massacres even if, as the Greek commanders hope, the campaign for the coercion of the Turks into acceptance of the treaty terms which are offered them proves to be a matter of only a few weeks. But even a few weeks of modern war may be charged with unimaginable miseries for the people and unsuspected dangers for the nations. We are a long way yet, we fear, from a real settlement of the question either of the Near East or of Armenia. In the meantime we must hold up the hands of our representatives the missionaries and missionary teachers and work as we can for light in this darkness.

The Parable of the Late Arrival

There liveth in a certain city a man whose name is John Smith, and he hath been for many years an Honest and Inconspicuous Citizen. And it came to pass after many years that his name began to appear Among Those Present; and it seemed unto him Mighty Good to get into the outer edges of the Limelight, and he began to yearn for a place a little nearer unto the Center of the Stage.

Now there was a great Public Banquet at the leading Hotel, and all the Prominent Citizens shook their Dress Suits out from the Moth Balls and were present. And John Smith had a place at the Further End of the Speakers' Table.

And after the Hoi Polloi were seated, then did the Occupants of the Speakers' Table file in and take their seats, while the Band played, It Looketh unto me like a Big Night Tonight. And John Smith felt good clean down into his Boots to think that a Part of that Chautauqua Salute was for him.

Now there was one Vacant Seat at the Speakers' Table, and they all knew whose it was. For G. Fred Jones did habitually arrive late. And when he came in about twelve minutes after all the others were seated, then did the Band play, Hail to the Chief. And the Presiding Officer walked over and said, So good of thee to come; we feared that thou hadst been detained.

Now John Smith believed all this, and he said: "I am wise to this little Game. It is he who cometh late that getteth the Glad Hand, whereas he who cometh in with the Bunch is unnoticed."

Now there came another Banquet and John Smith had a seat a little further from the end and a little nearer to the center of the Speakers' Table, and he arrived fifteen minutes late. And he said: Now for the Big Noise when I enter.

And behold, as he drew nigh, he heard the sound of Music, for the Band was playing, Hail, Hail, the Gang's All Here, and he slipped in wholly unobserved.

When he sought for his seat, behold it had been given unto another, for the Presiding Officer said: We thought thou wert out of Town. Now behold, there are some good seats yonder by the Door. Go thou away back and be thou seated.

And he went away back and sat down. And he did not enjoy the Banquet a little bit, neither did his food that he ate that night agree with him and his applause of the Speeches lacked something of Heartiness.

And he said within himself: Behold, I have several times made of myself a Fool, but this is the worst in all my sweet young life. For I perceive that he who setteth his foot upon the First Round of the Ladder of Publick Recognition, is a Fool if he thinketh that he hath already attained. For he who hath arrived can work those little stunts that increase his Popularity, whereas if a man more obscure doth attempt one of them, he only increaseth his obscurity.

And I considered this Truthful Tale, and I said: Little Fishes Should Keep nigh unto the Shore. Nevertheless there is yet hope for John Smith, for he is capable of learning Wisdom from his own Folly, and that is the only real way in Which Wise Men such as I have attained Wisdom. For we all started with a Large Endowment of Folly, and it departeth very slowly from even the Wisest of Men.

Those college students and teachers who are planning to spend their vacation in helping the farmers are in for an instructive experience and can feel that they are doing a public service.

The man who says that it will take a whole generation to get rid of the prohibition laws thinks too meanly of the coming Americans. In a case of this kind the next generation means nothing less than never.

It has been good to have the delegates to the International Council with us and we hope that individually if not as members of a Council many of them may come again. And we wish them Godspeed as they go to their places in the work of Christ's kingdom.

Was it a sudden access of local pride at outstripping the new census reports of San Francisco in population which brought on the earthquake in Los Angeles? Or did the Los Angeles people feel too much the lime light turned just now on its northern rival and shiver at being thrown for a moment in the shade? We are all sorry for the people who suffered in person or in property.

Among many well-deserved honorary degrees bestowed this year by the colleges we note with special approval the conferring of a mastership of arts by Williams College upon Herbert H. Fletcher of the Boston Transcript. Too often a daily newspaper man is so submerged in his routine work that his fidelity and ability are totally unrecognized by the outside world. Mr. Fletcher is a most conscientious and high minded journalist. He has contributed much to the forces that have given the Transcript such a distinctive place in American journalism and he is especially responsible for the admirably conducted department in the Saturday night Transcript known as "The Churchman Afield."

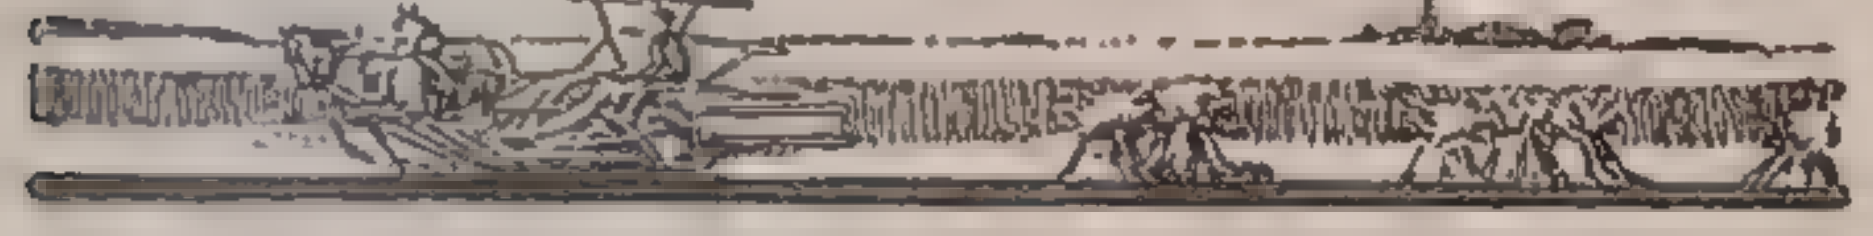
Here are two of numerous gems from addresses to graduating classes which we are more than glad to pass on to our readers. One is a paragraph from the counsel which Dr. A. Z. Conrad of Boston gave to the students at the American International College in Springfield. We have seen this year nothing more pungent and practical than these ten rules which he urged the young men to observe:

> Do your own thinking; fight your own battles; pay your own debts; correct your own mistakes; keep your own secrets; follow your own ideals; be your own self; answer your own prayer, and mind your own business.

The other is from the address of Prof. F. J. Woodbridge to the graduating class at Smith College:

> As a working maxim, philosophy as a habit of mind may be expressed by saying, start with what you've got, work with what you have, and go on from where you are in the direction of the best which beckons you on.

FROM·OUR·WESTERN·WINDOW



The Republican Convention Two Weeks After

The tumult and the shouting have died away; the captains and the kings of politics have departed, and the dust has once more settled down over the Windy City and the excessive heat of convention week has been followed by overcoat weather. It is a little difficult to keep one's poise when one is in the convention city when the convention is in session. The pulling of wires is so much in evidence, the grossness and crassness of politics at its worst is so easily seen, that one is inclined to become disgusted with it. Probably the Republican convention just held was as good and as high grade as any the party has ever held. A great advance over any of the others was found in the fact that there was very little "booze" used in the convention. To those of us who have known Chicago for the last twenty-five years it is difficult for us to think of the city entertaining a national political convention without having at hand 8,000 saloons with which to make it more possible for the delegates to endure the strain and stress of things.

Two weeks ago a number of our leaders presented their views of the convention and they wrote these articles while we were still in the heat of the situation. I have been interested in the aftermath and have talked to people all the way from Chicago to Wichita, Kan., and from there to Boston, to find out how they view the work of the convention after two weeks. The discussion that I have had with various men always centers first of all around the personalities who were in the limelight in the convention and perhaps we may best begin with a word about them.

General Wood was first and foremost in the early days of the convention. His friends spent a lot of money to make him the choice of the presidential primary. So far as I am able to discover, no one except a few editorial writers of the yellow press believes that any of this money was used for graft. It is now clearly seen that a presidential primary cannot be conducted without the use of a great deal of money. If the candidate did nothing but to thoroughly circularize a constituency, he would spend about as much money as General Wood's friends spent for him. I think it is safe to say that the General has come out of the conflict with the respect of thinking people and it is pretty well understood that Senator Johnson sprung the investigation of campaign expenses at just the strategic moment when it would do the most harm to General Wood and to Governor Lowden.

The little stir about the improper use of money in Missouri hurt Governor Lowden a great deal at the time, but in the judgment of leading business and professional men of the State of Illinois the Governor is not a boodler and he did not intend that one cent of money should be spent improperly in the primary election. There are two things to be said for Governor Lowden at the present time. He has given Illinois a good, clean, economical business administration; he voted for a dry enforcement law that had teeth in it and he vetoed a boxing bill that was very pernicious. It is well within the bounds of the truth to say that his administration of the State of Illinois has not only been high grade in every particular but that he has been a real representative of all of the people.

It ought also to be said that if Governor Lowden had never done anything more than to take a fall out of "Big Bill Thompson," as he did when the patriotism of Chicago was in question when we were at war and as he has just done in regard to state control of the Republican party, he is worth all that he has cost the United States of America and a thousand times more. Some of us admire the Governor for the enemies that he has made; we haven't forgotten, nor are we going to forget, that he was a patriot when some other leaders were traitors to their country. It looks at this writing as if he might still be the strategic man to redeem the State of Illinois from Thompsonism.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

Is not this truth almost self-evident, that men can hardly meet at stated intervals to think together on holy things and squarely to face God, without effect on their characters?

Hiram Johnson was in evidence at the convention. He stood for the selfish policy of keeping America from taking any hand in world affairs and he became the supreme representative for the time being of the enmity that is so freely expressed these days for Great Britain. He was the recipient of the friendship and the aid of William Randolph Hearst, who was on the ground trying to control the convention. All of Senator Johnson's greatness in fighting the Southern Pacific Railway and the battles of Labor was completely overshadowed at the Chicago convention, by his attitude concerning the League of Nations; his was a pitiful figure.

Yes, William Randolph Hearst was also at the convention and his papers carried great headlines implying that leading candidates before the convention had been guilty of boodle and graft. One could not help but remember Mr. Hearst's attitude toward our entrance into the World War, when one read his heated claims to be the acme of patriotism and Americanism. There are not a few people these days who say "Let us forget all about the attitude that people took during the World War." To my notion it is a good deal better to say that we will never forget what Mr. Hearst and his ilk did until they change their ways. Any man that accepts the friendship of William Randolph Hearst and his papers ought never to be considered for the Presidency of the United States of America.

"Big Bill" was there sweating with Hearst, trying to make Johnson the nominee. Not only did Lowden defeat Thompson at that time in the attempts of the latter to seize the leadership of the Republican party of Illinois, but the Mayor has had two or three other severe setbacks in the last two weeks. The Supreme Court the other day decided that the Primary Law, under which Thompson had grabbed his political honors, is unconstitutional, and soon after that Judge Scanlan held the Mayor's School Board in contempt of Court, and sentenced six of the men on the Board to pay fines and serve a jail sentence and several of the women to pay heavy fines. This is the outcome of the action that the Board took last year, ousting Superintendent Chadsey. Judge Scanlan in rendering his decision, took occasion to say that Superintendent Mortenson, who profited by the ousting of Mr. Chadsey, was the meanest one of the lot. The fact is that the city under Thompson's administration is apparently going to the dogs. It is bankrupt and is having great difficulty in borrowing money from the banks and at the same time it is throwing away hundreds of thousands of dollars on experts and hopeless law cases without rendering the city much service. Crime is rampant; rival labor agitators no longer seek the darkness for an opportunity to shoot up their rivals—ten o'clock in the forenoon is the zero hour for that crowd and they keep it with impunity. Yet this sort of a mayor came near dominating the Republican party in the State of Illinois.

As one of the correspondents reported last week, Hoover didn't have a look-in at the Convention, although it was quite plain that a multitude of thoughtful people the country over wanted him to be nominated. What about Harding? The folks to whom I have talked have suggested some things against him. The almost universal opinion is that he is too reactionary—that he is too prone to believe in safety and regularity always. Nobody wanted a "Red" or a Radical nominated, but most people did want a forward-looking man, and to their notion Harding scarcely qualifies—they would have been better satisfied if Coolidge had been given first place on the ticket.

It is only fair to say that while many people have the objection noted above to Mr. Harding, most of them believe that, if elected, he will give us a good, straight-forward business administration. A level-headed, progressive business man to whom I talked expressed himself about as follows:

> I will vote for Harding because he isn't a superman—we have been too long governed by supermen, Roosevelt and Wilson. Then to my mind it is anything to be relieved of Wilsonianism. I have no use for an administration that plays fast and loose with George Creel and George D. Herron on the one hand, and deports innocent aliens on the other, nor do I care for a man that will hold Debs in the Federal Penitentiary for saying practically the same things that he himself said when he was running for the presidency the second time. I am tired of the wobbling and the lack of policy of the Wilson administration and I despise the President on account of his egotism. The fact is the President is more to blame for the present stalemate in the League of Nations and the Peace Treaty than is the Senate, and that is saying a good deal.

I judge that there are a great many people in the country who hold the same attitude as the business man just quoted. R. W. G.

O Lord, who hast led our nation in the past, choose now for us a leader who shall help in showing us the ways of justice, righteousness and peace. SENATOR AND MRS WARREN G. HARDING AT THEIR WASHINGTON HOME

This photograph was taken just after the Senator from Ohio became the presidential nominee of the Republican Party at the Chicago Convention. Senator Harding was born on a farm at Blooming Grove, O., the eldest of eight children. He has been farmer, teacher, and for most of his life, the proprietor of a newspaper in Marion, O. His wife, who was Miss Florence Kling of Marion, has always been of the greatest assistance to her husband in his political career. Their delightful comradeship and the loyal and gracious personality of Mrs. Harding bring an element of pleasing human interest into the campaign. Happily the vice-presidential nominee, Governor Coolidge, and Mrs. Coolidge are a similar couple. It is good to know that the home life of both of the candidates is worthy of the best traditions of America.

International Council in Notable Sessions

By Rev. Herbert Atchinson Jump

EDITORIAL NOTE.—The Council will be reported at length in the next issue of THE CONGREGATIONALIST. We go to press with this issue during the early sessions, and only attempt, through Mr. Jump's article, to indicate now the spirit of the Council and the most significant events of the first day.

With three gavels to arm and equip the moderator, with a bona fide baronet and a knight besides to confer aristocratic dignity upon its membership, with a battery of two grand pianos and a duet of trumpeters to steer the abounding melody of its song, with special greetings both from Lloyd George and the Lord Mayor of London, and with ebony-hued delegates from British Guiana as well as divers representatives from a half-dozen more familiar lands, the Fourth International Council of the Congregational Churches of the world began last week Tuesday its sessions in the capacious Boston barn known as Mechanics Hall. It furnishes the ecclesiastical celebration of the Tercentenary of the Landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth. The official recognition of the event by city and commonwealth will come next December and next summer.

The day before I had strolled up to view the site of the significant gathering and learn my way through the acre or two of space that was to house the audiences, the exhibits, the committee rooms, the reception halls, the cafeteria and all the enginery of a proposition for which already 3,500 delegates had been accredited. Of a workman in overalls I asked, "How many people will your main hall seat?" "I dunno," he answered, "but it'll hold a confounded sight of folks." It needed to be big, for two thousand souls were on hand, a memorable and receptive audience, when Rev. Charles F. Carter of Hartford, representing the Committee of Arrangements in the absence of its chairman, Dr. W. Douglas Mackenzie, who was detained by illness, called the body to order and conducted the election of a moderator.

SECRETARY BARTON PRESIDES

The statistics of the meeting were not as stupendous as those of another great convention that was gathering simultaneously three thousand miles away in San Francisco to choose the Democratic nominee for the White House. But perhaps the brain power per person and the moral earnestness in the mass were quite as notable. At any rate, Dr. James L. Barton of the American Board, after he had been elected president—for that is the official title of the International Council moderator—declared in a graceful speech of acceptance that he had attained "the greatest honor in the world that any Congregationalist might hope to achieve." Before him sat delegates from Canada, a dozen from Australia and New Zealand, more than a hundred from the British Isles, and a scattering but important representation from Japan, China, South Africa, India and British Guiana, besides more than a thousand from all parts of our own land. All had most intelligent faces and singing voices or at least singing hearts, and soon under the graceful precentorship of Prof. H. Augustine Smith of Boston University, the high mood of the hour was sounded in the hymn by Isaac Watts:

> Eternal are thy mercies, Lord,
> Eternal truth attends thy word.
> Thy praise shall sound from shore to shore
> Till suns shall rise and set no more.

There is always an interesting psychology about an international meeting. At such times we are all more or less racially self-conscious. A harmless and legitimate curiosity moves us to notice ceaselessly "how the other fellow does it." Members of the reception committee in the Congregational House and Mechanics Hall had already heard about "grousing" and other terms used by the English brethren that are not commonly included in the Yankee brand of the Queen's—or is it the King's English? But as the first session progressed we were treated to other Anglicisms, as doubtless we entertained them greatly with our not at all hidden Americanisms. We heard the prompt and staccato "hear, hears" of these brethren when they liked what was said. We listened to the equally prompt and unafraid undertone of protest or objurgation that rumbled its accompaniment to the speaker when they didn't like what was said. Also we noticed that Dr. J. D. Jones of Bournemouth, the Council preacher, was the only member of the vast throng who sought his knees during Dr. A. Z. Conrad's opening prayer.

Raymond Robin-isms

Force against ideas has always been powerless.

The only thing that ever overcame a false idea is a true idea.

Henry Ford in his workshop is one of the great producing economic forces of the world.

Whenever the rights of men come into irreconcilable conflict with the rights of capital, capital must give way. That is the answer, and it doesn't mean revolution.

We are not going into the new slavery of Socialism or Bolshevism. We are going forward in freedom under the Constitution, and we shall stand and bid distant generations hail in the freedom of the human spirit in all relations of life.

It rapidly transpired, however, that the little differences noticed by both the English and American delegates were like Burns' rank that is but the guinea's stamp; the real "gowd" was a deep, almost sacred sense of brotherly unity that swept like an ocean tide through all hearts as we thought of the Pilgrims whose memory fused us for these seven privileged days into a magnificent fellowship of hope and service.

HALL NOT BUILT FOR ORATORS

Before the program had progressed very far, we were all reminded of the answer of the sexton who had been showing a visitor about a new church. He had been asked, "And are you troubled at all with the acoustics?" "Not at all, sir, not now," he answered. "We had difficulty at first, but we used a lot of insect powder, and now you can't find an acoustic about the whole place." This was tragically true of the auditorium where we are doomed to hear a few but merely to see a great many more speeches during the next week. As its name implies, the hall was built for mechanics, not for orators. Five reverend gentlemen, for example, with English accents, were asked to conduct a devotional service. It proved to be for all save a few favored persons on the front seats a series of anonymous and inaudible orisons, reported by the representatives of the press to have been most beautifully and chastely devout utterances. But inasmuch as the Almighty is known to be a prayer-hearing God this was not so serious. When we came to the addresses, however, the situation was more ominous. Only occasionally could a speaker be heard with any distinctness though he lavishly added perspiration to his inspiration.

Nevertheless three gavels were presented to Dr. Barton, the president of the Council. One came from Plymouth, with a chip of the Rock and several slivers of wood from historic Plymouth houses as its constituents; one came from Leyden, Holland, and was made of a stone from John Robinson's church; and the third had been sent on from the Pacific Coast, made of twenty-two pieces of wood connected with the history of the Hudson Bay Company and the pioneer settlements of the Northwest.

WELCOMES AND RESPONSES

Pres. Henry Churchill King, moderator of the National Council, voiced a welcome that was twice interrupted by applause. First, when he referred to the "four thousand miles of undefended frontier that separates us from a great British dominion"; and secondly, when he assured the English delegates with solemn emphasis that "the attitude of the United States Senate on the League of Nations is no fair index of the attitude of the American people." Arthur H. Wellman of Boston, chairman of the local committee, said that he was the Indian chosen to say "welcome" to the modern Mayflower-ites. Mayor Peters, whose city government had been fervently prayed for by one of the British delegates, did not deign to appear at all with his announced greetings.

Responses were delightfully made by Sir Arthur Haworth of Manchester, England, a baronet and former chairman of the Congregational Union, whose ruddy countenance and stocky build marked him as the unmistakable Briton that he is; and by Principal A. E. Garvie of New College, London, a genial civilized Viking in appearance, whose mother was a Pole and whose father was a Scot, and who himself therefore very appropriately stands as a Christian internationalist. Sir Arthur captured his audience instantly by his humorous story of the judges who met to draw up an address to the Queen. The document began, "Conscious of our many imperfections, etc." "You mean," suggested one of the conferees, "conscious of each other's many imperfections." But despite imperfections on both sides, the Baronet continued, the two great branches of the English-speaking race must stand and labor and aspire together.

Principal Garvie is the present chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. He alluded approvingly to the fact that had already been noticed, viz., that the British delegation contained so large a number of young men. In summoning the sons of the Pilgrims to bear stoutly their witness for God he parodied a familiar proverb: "Though the politician proposes, it is the Christian conscience of the world that disposes," and finally serves as the mouthpiece of the Eternal.

Social Gospel Key-Note

Preliminaries over the formal program began. Significantly the key-note speech was not historical nor theological; it was a stirring utterance of the Christian social gospel needed for these times. The speaker was Owen Lovejoy of Child Labor fame, himself a heroic prophet as was one of his surname in Civil War days. In a gray summer suit, with a face brown as a berry as though he had just returned from a canoe trip, a clean-cut athletic young business man, he stood behind a pulpit that was carved with the motto, "Be just and fear not," and in his address he obeyed the command of the pulpit. He gave us a beautiful welding of technical sociological thought with the spiritual insight of a loyal Christian disciple. He claimed our allegiance for three principles in the social message of Jesus, simplicity of life, the subordination of the institution to the spirit, and the law of sacrifice, not as a substitutionary device of turtle doves or lambs or scapegoats, but as a devotement of service.

I held my breath as he boldly and yet winsomely eliminated completely one of the cherished assumptions of traditional theology; "Jesus never taught any substitutionary idea of sacrifice; he always talked about self-sacrifice." Surely this will stir up a sensation, I said to myself. I must hunt round and get the reaction from some of the conservative delegates. Chancing upon one of the swarthy Congregationalists from British Guiana I said to myself, Here is my man. "How did you like the address?" I innocently inquired. Of course there would be qualifications or antagonism in his answer. But no, his eye gleamed with pleasure and his face opened into a reassuring smile as he ejaculated, "It was splendid. It is just the gospel we need down in South America. He hit the nail on the head." I laughingly confessed the nature of the reply I had expected, whereupon he nonchalantly remarked, "Oh, there isn't anybody left now who still believes in that old theology, is there?" As I walked out into the afternoon sunshine, I said to myself, "Good for British Guiana. Verily the world moves." And I recollected some pregnant and precious words by pastor John Robinson about light.

The evening's program introduced a fine chorus of two hundred voices led by A. Vincent Bennett, and it rendered delicately Woodman's setting of Nixon Waterman's poem, "The Voyage of the Mayflower." This chorus will contribute to the pleasure of the delegates from time to time during the week as a carefully chosen program of music interprets the Pilgrim motif. Then followed two addresses on "The World in 1620 and in 1920," by Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, for thirty years pastor of Stamford Hill Church, London, and Raymond Robins of Chicago.

The veteran preacher of London reminded us several times that he was a Welshman. That meant less to our American delegates than it did to the Englishmen in the congregation, many of whom apparently had little love for Lloyd George and inferentially little interest in the exaltation of Lloyd George's racial stock. Dr. Gibbon's thesis was that in 1620 geography came to the help of history and made possible in the new world a forward step of the soul that was just then impossible in the old world. In amplifying it he revealed a subtle strain of poetic feeling, a something fugitive but alluring, as foreign to the American temper of downrightness as the vivid accent of Wales.

Morgan Gibbon-isms

We all praise the fathers for the work they did—but what say you to the work they bequeathed us?

Roger Williams untied the Gordian knot that tethered the human mind to the post of superstition; he gave the eagle the franchise of the skies, to kindle her undazzled eyes at the full midday sun, to purge and unscale her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance.

If the will of God is revealed in the needs of men, look at the world today, it is a book written within and without, and the word that seems on every page is Peace—peace on earth, good will among men.

Geography that in 1620 called for universal freedom now calls for universal peace and the intensive cultivation of the human race.

Every man that fell for liberty stands, trumpet at lip, calling the world to crown his sacrifice with the Great Peace. The call is to the churches of the Lord Jesus Christ; this is for them the issue of issues today. The call is to America and Britain, the two mighty peoples that have the power of life and death in their hands.

The possibilities of good and evil that lie folded like seeds side by side in their attitude to and their feelings for each other are incalculable; whoever at this hour shall succeed in driving a wedge between these two, so as to divert them from the work that comes to them out of their own past history, shall achieve a master stroke of wickedness that shall secure the devil a new lease on earth and win applause through all the sounding halls of hell. May God avert the omen.

When Providence is baking a new loaf she puts a Welshman into the Anglo-Saxon to make it rise.

It is the sort of thing one feels in the Celtic folk-lore. It never is far absent in Welsh preachers. I traveled through Wales last summer. It was in spots a desolate and a forbidding land. Yet even on a grim pass the peasant's cottage would show you unexpected and glowing roses in its kitchen garden. Dr. Gibbon's speech, rugged in earnestness like Llanberis itself, had its glowing flowers—metaphor, epigram, allusion. He knew all about "the embattled farmer" and about "Captain, my Captain." He dared to quote Latin several times, and his American auditors who were honest looked dazed, but the more villainous hypocrites among us tried to act as though we understood.

In pleading for a world-peace that should not again be disturbed by war, he borrowed the idea from Rupert Brooke's famous sonnet. The latest and divinest contribution that geography has made to history is the internationalization of death, as "little patches of America lie scattered all over Europe, and when God's trumpet sounds, up out of every soldier's grave will rise a figure that will call us to make peace forever sure."

Raymond Robins in a speech straight from the shoulder, warm with a vast and brave social passion, illustrated from his experiences as a Klondike miner and special envoy to Russia, begged us to clean up our social order of its injustice before radicalism had succeeded in undermining the faith of the people in that social order. "There is no economic necessity in producing steel that justifies the right to disinherit human souls." "We are living today in a time of moral sag. Large dividends seem to have a softening effect upon the social conscience. But if we take Kaiserism into our land to solve our problems, we have not won the war; we have lost it."

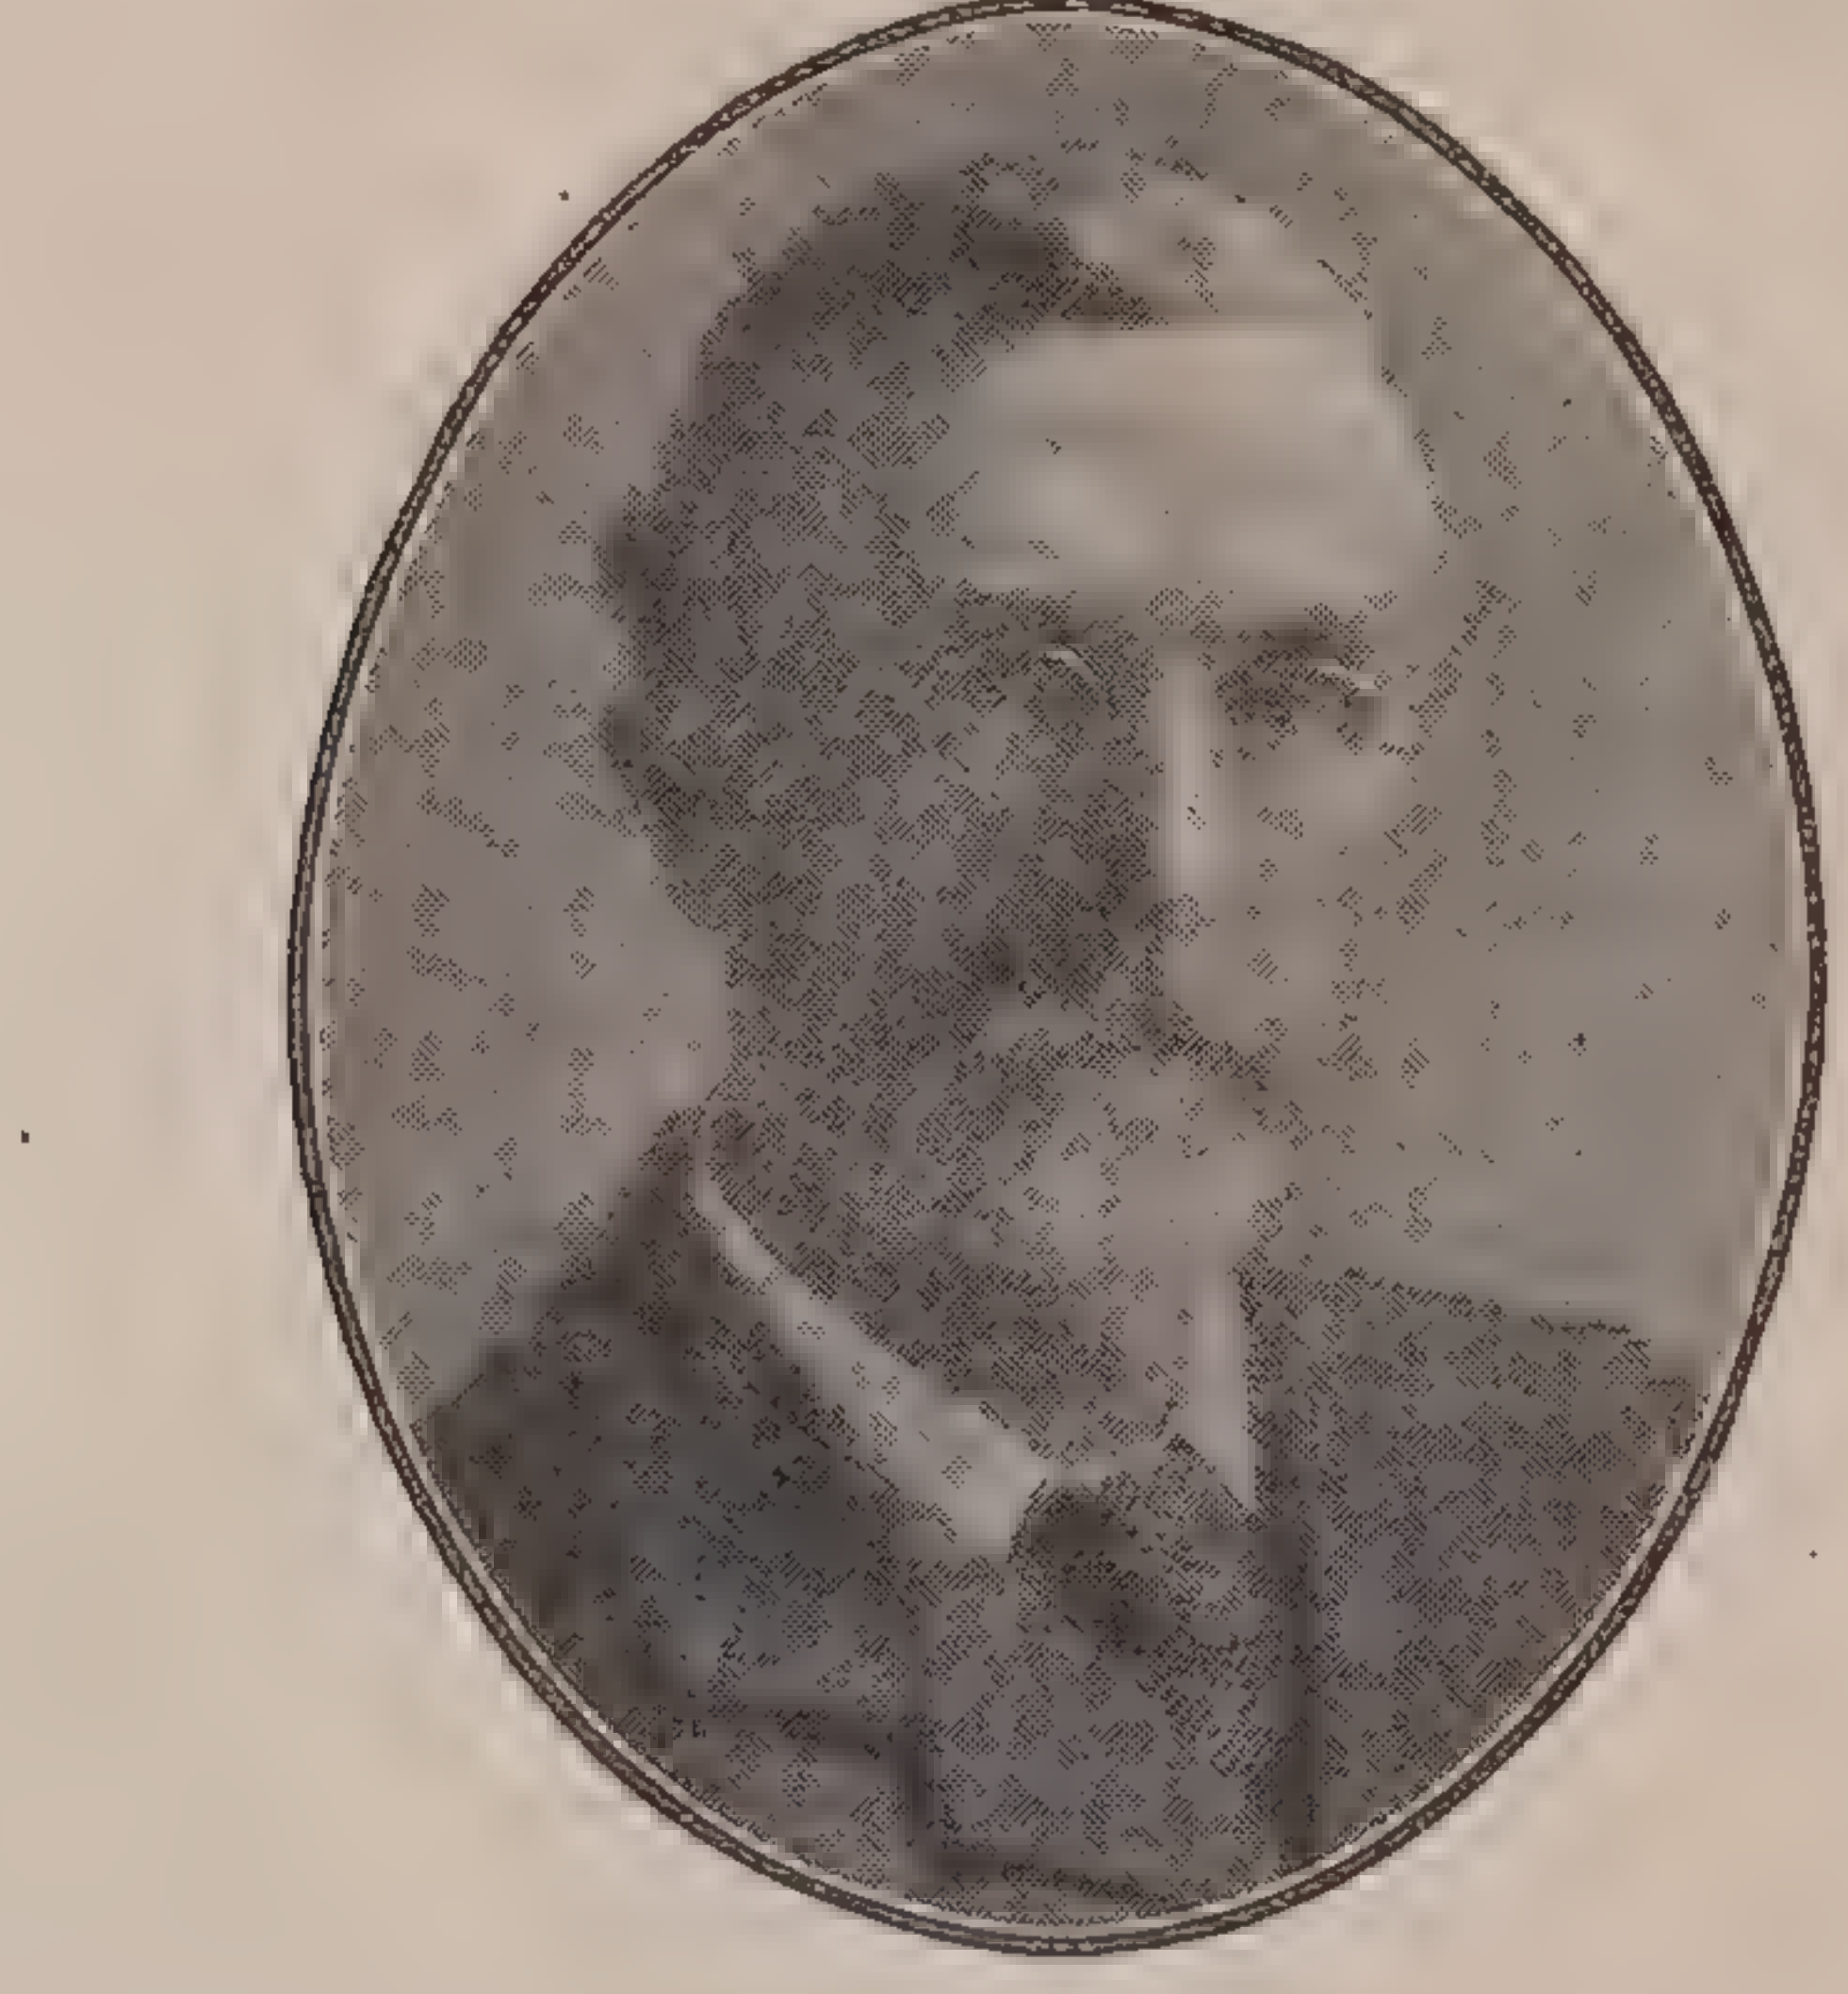
When I came out onto the street about ten o'clock at the close of the first day's experience of a sublime fellowship, I bought a newspaper and read the headlines from the San Francisco Convention; "Steam Roller at Work." If ever the day comes when the principles of the Pilgrim Fathers actually control national life, every sort of steam roller will be consigned to the junk heap. And may that free day hasten its coming!

A Trio of English Leaders

Dr. J. D. Jones

"J. D." as we all familiarly call the Archbishop of Congregationalism in England (he is arch-moderator of our new panel of moderators and if we had had the courage to use the scriptural word we should have called them Bishops and Dr. Jones Archbishop) is too momentous a personality to be biographed in a paragraph. Happily he is almost as familiar a figure in Boston as in London. By a sort of divine right "J. D." dominates Congregationalism from Berwick to Penzance. He has won his authority, not snatched it. For twenty years he has served the denomination with a single eye to its advancement and no concern for his own glory. His wonderful ministry at Bournemouth, from which have sprung a half a dozen strong churches radiating from his own central church, constitutes a remarkable record. But this great ministry is a comparatively small part of his service to Congregationalism. Literally he has moulded its policy for twenty years. He virtually raised its £250,000 Central Fund to guarantee a minimum stipend for all ministers of accredited churches. He created the moderator plan and bore down opposition by sheer persuasiveness. He has been chairman of the Union and is now its honorary secretary. A gifted preacher, tenaciously evangelical, but sufficiently responsive to the spirit of the age to restate evangelism in the terms of today, and with an evangelistic fervor burning like a bright flame within him he stands second only to Dr. Jowett as the popular preacher of Congregationalism. Brotherly, modest, and straight, without an atom of side, he has won a place in the affections of Congregationalists and acquired a power that would be positively dangerous were it not that he is constitutionally incapable of misusing it.

REV. J. D. JONES



REV. R. F. HORTON

REV. J. MORGAN GIBBON

Dr. R. F. Horton

Dr. Horton has friends all over the world, but nowhere (outside England) more abundantly than in America. There are several Dr. Hortons—Dr. Horton the scholar, the saint, the Higher Critic, the salvationist, the author, the seer, the poet, the preacher, the orator and (though this Dr. Horton is not often visible) the satirist. And there is yet another Dr. Horton who is best described in the words of an Oxford man whom I once heard say that he did not think there were many real Christians in the world, but he knew at least two, Dr. Charles Gore and Dr. Robert Forman Horton. He has done many great things in his lifetime. One of the first dissenters to be admitted at Oxford University he demonstrated to that academic world that the free churches could breed scholars. Horton, "fellow of New College," commanded respect. He established and has ministered for forty years to a wonderful Congregational Church at Hampstead, a wealthy aristocratic suburb, which, till he stormed its heights, looked disdainfully upon all dissenters as Philistines. Lyndhurst Road might still claim to be the premier church in English Congregationalism. Dr. Horton was a pioneer, greatly daring and for a time severely criticized, of the Higher Critical interpretation of the Bible. He has defended heretics, conducted evangelistic missions, championed foreign missions, established an Institutional Church, lectured to artisans and done a whole catalog of splendid things. But his greatest contribution to his age has been his own transparently sincere character. Latterly after a long and trying period of physical depression he has renewed his youth and shown a mental vivacity and vitality that has rejoiced the heart of his innumerable friends and admirers.

Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon

Thirty years ago when I first came to London I was taken over by a friend at Holloway to Stamford Hill to hear a wonderful Welsh preacher who had just settled there as Congregational minister. We could not get into the church, but we heard the preacher (without getting a glimpse of him) from the vestry. The preacher was the Rev. J. Morgan Gibbons. He is still, after all these years, at Stamford Hill and, after all these years, there are the same crowded eager congregations listening to his burning eloquence and marveling at his intellectual brilliance. I use the word brilliance deliberately. It really fits Mr. Gibbon. He is an intellectual with his intellectualism illumined by Welsh fervor. One might, if critically disposed, suggest that Mr. Gibbon's intellectualism has occasionally a metallic quality with a hard ring and an acid flavor. He has a flair of his own, a gift of irony and a power of sarcasm that gives an east-windy tang to his preaching. But he can win as well as sting men into the Kingdom and there are deeps of tenderness to be plumbed in Mr. Morgan Gibbon and wells of sympathy that never run dry. His passion is for righteousness. The ethical note never goes unstruck. Mr. Gibbon comes, like Mr. Lloyd George, from Wales, with the poetic glamour of the Welsh hills in his blood. But he has drilled his mind by hard systematic study and relentless mental discipline. The poetry survives and shines through the braininess. This explains his perennial freshness—amazing perhaps in a man who has always preached to crowds. Incidentally one should add that he is the father of Perceval Gibbon, the novelist, and that one of his daughters has just published a notable novel, "Jan."

Bound for Boston

The English Delegates and Their Voyage

By Our London Correspondent

For us, the seventy-eight delegates who sailed from England by the Adriatic, the fourth International Congregational Council virtually started when the ocean liner left the quay at Southampton. The Pilgrims of 1620 were ever in our mind. Did they not set sail from Southampton in the Mayflower, a cockleshell of a craft compared with our White Star leviathan? Three hundred years after their adventurous trip across the Atlantic we were following in their tracks impelled by the common impulse to commemorate their bold venture of faith on the spots made historic by their landing and their settlement in New England. The very liberty they breathed is in our nostrils: the freedom of faith they sought is our prized heritage.

Our thoughts turned often as theirs must have done to our loved ones left behind us in England. But our hearts were in Boston before England was out of sight. We watched with eager interest, not untouched with compassionate sympathy, a pathetic scene at Cherbourg when five hundred emigrants from Southern Europe—war victims most of them, men, women and children—boarded the Adriatic. We saw them step from a French tug on to the gangway of our ship and we felt the thrill they were experiencing in stepping out of the bondage of the old world into the freedom of the new world. To us those few feet of gangway symbolized a bridge from death into life, from fear into hope. We saw a husband and wife separated a few feet from the gangway by the doctor's refusal to pass the woman. The two youngest of the five children were sent back to their mother and we watched, in almost tear-dimmed eyes, the tragedy of the parting. It was a scene that stayed with us, haunting us all the way across the ocean.

Though we mingled with our fellow voyagers on the Adriatic we, the English delegates, were a self-contained party with our own social life and our own round of ship's sports. But the errand upon which we were embarking was with us constantly. We were perplexed by the American political situation and baffled as to how our message could be best delivered at this juncture. We met twice formally, and many times in informal groups, to discuss the Irish question in the light of the anti-British American-Irish propaganda and to clear our minds as to how best we could present the ideal of a League of Nations to American hearers. While we wished to be loyal Englishmen we wished above all things to avoid saying a word that might jar on American feelings or appear to butt in on questions that have become party politics issues at the forthcoming presidential elections.

These conferences helped us to clarify our own views. When Marconi news came that Lloyd George had offered Ireland Dominion Home Rule and that De Valera would accept the offer we felt that that was a solution we could all indorse. Again on the League of Nations we felt that only a League of Nations (not necessarily the League framed in Paris which has a League of Conquering Nations complexion, after all) can save the world from another war that would, perhaps, wipe out civilization and even Christianity.

One of the sacred memories of our voyage will be our recollection of a service of song held in the saloon on the Sunday evening. It was arranged by the Pilgrim delegates and conducted by Dr. R. F. Horton. We came very close to each other and to our fellow passengers

I AM A CONGREGATIONALIST—

Because
I believe in liberty of the individual conscience in interpreting the life and message of Jesus Christ.

Because
I believe in a continuous revelation of God; that in this world there is no such thing as finality in belief, or creed or action.

Because
I believe that only in Liberty can we have unity or sincerity or fidelity.

Because
I believe that Democracy in spirit and form of government is as essential to the life of the Christian Church as to the life of the nation.

Because
I believe in Christ's missionary obligation to carry the Gospel to the ends of the earth.

Because
I believe in the fellowship of all Christians, in inclusiveness rather than in exclusiveness.

Because
I believe that the goal of the Christian Church is both personal and social righteousness.

Because
I believe in the value of all Knowledge, that the Truth shall make men free.

Because
I believe that the Congregational Church which grew out of a demand for individual liberty of conscience; which was itself the father of democratic government in America; which has pursued the Truth and promoted education for three hundred years; which believes in Liberty, in Democracy and in Progress; most nearly fulfills my ideals of a Christian Church today.

as we sang the great familiar hymns, common to the whole Church Catholic. And our fellow passengers seemed to catch inspiration from the hymns too. They all knew the words and the tunes, and one saw a hand here and a hand there raised to rub a tear from the eye as we sang "Lord of our Life," "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," "Our God Our Help." Dr. Horton's address on love was peculiarly felicitous especially when he dwelt on love between nations and among peoples of divers nations living in the same land. The international note fitted into the mood of the hour.

A storm and two days of fog robbed the last days of the voyage of some of their joys. The Adriatic was delayed and by reaching New York late deprived us of the welcome we were led to expect from American Congregationalists. But if we felt any sense of forlornness in New York, Boston has given us ample compensation by the cheery reception we have received. I write before the Council opens, but I write in a mood of high expectancy. A. P.

"A Constructive Christian Program for Sunday"

By Rev. Austin Rice, D.D.

Can a constructive Christian program be arranged for Sunday? Within the limits of time and strength open to the average man and church what can be done to make the Lord's Day both more useful and more attractive?

The churches must plan for something positive. To leave the day merely negative would be to fail. "Don't" is never the chief word for the follower of Jesus.

First. The churches ought to put a united evangelistic program across in more of our towns and smaller cities. Many of our churches are near the public parks. It is a shame for us to object to Sunday sports on these parks unless we are ready to furnish a definite gospel message with good music and bright singing. People do relish these. If they feel kindly toward the Salvation Army, they will feel kindly toward a warm-hearted church which goes out of its way to meet them, and to bring them the cheer of the Gospel. Such programs would need to be arranged with care and with much variety. A great deal more could be done with community singing and with worthy instrumental music. Could not the combined church choirs or Sunday school orchestras aid in such services? Both by civic services in the parks themselves, and by more evangelistic religious services on the church lawns we could reach many who would hear and enjoy the Gospel message, who seldom enter a church door.

Second. The church needs a crusade for social righteousness. How the soap-box agitator puts our church men to shame. He is humble enough and he is intense enough in his convictions to address a crowd, where the crowd actually is, though it be on a street corner or on the common. We have something much better. Shall we be willing to let it remain cooped up within the four walls of a meeting-house? Surely we ought to go out with an active and intelligent passion for moral betterment.

One form of such service which is increasing in popularity is the open Sunday forum. But should efforts be limited to this? "Where cross the crowded ways of life" there ought to be stationed the Christian business man, the Christian "Y" worker and the minister. We have been altogether too complacent and sleepy. Personally I believe we shall win back the common people and the working people to the church, not by laxity in the principles of Sunday recreation or by a compromise on the use of beer, but by a warm individual friendly and neighborly interest, and by a crusade for level, constructive social justice.

Third. When it comes to amusement and recreation, the problem will vary with the community. I doubt if the church has the duty of trying to rival Revere Beach or Coney Island. I doubt if in mere pleasure or excitement she can compete with Sunday baseball and football. It may be questioned whether it is her duty to put much of her energy into supervision of that type of recreation, and whether the people who wish that type of diversion will accept it at all from our churches.

Fourth. Turning now to more individual suggestions. Our suburban towns and smaller cities contain many strangers. People are slow to become acquainted. They feel lost, even in a small city, much more so in the great centers. This lonesomeness presses down upon young people who live in boarding houses or small apartments. The church members owe a duty to such strangers. To find weekday time is difficult. Sunday afternoon or evening might well be used far more than it is by Christian people as a favorable opportunity for enlarging the circle of neighborly friendship. Mr. Samuel B. Capen used to render a most pleasing and grateful service in this way.

All our cities have many aged people, shut-ins and invalids who sorely miss the touch of young life. In some places there are special homes for the aged. They would be more refreshed than any one imagines by music and visits from the young people. Could not "Good Cheer" groups be formed from our Endeavor Societies and Sunday school classes for this use of Sunday afternoons? If the really sweetest and most lasting joys of life are those which come from unselfish service, then ought we not to suggest and plan with our young people the happiest uses of the Lord's day? As Christians we know that the finest, most durable joys are not gained in "making and spending" for self, nor in mere entertainments and excitement, though these have their value in the right place. But the only way this lesson can be learned is by actual practice. Does the church initiate and organize such work, with its young people, as it might?

The time is near at hand, if it is not already here, when Christians will see that the only way to preserve the home and the nation is by a nobler use of the Lord's Day. It is indeed a question whether we shall not need to use the Sunday afternoons, as the Catholic churches do in many places, for further Sunday school instruction. To drill and inspire youth will require not less but greater time and energy. And it is along these lines, we believe, that the church will contribute constructively to the building of Christian character among our young people, and for the grounding of the nation in righteousness. Wakefield, Mass.

Leaders, Where and How to Get Them

Reaching the Young People in the Churches

By Francis E. Clark, D.D.

The honored Secretary of the National Congregational Council, Dr. Hubert C. Herring, in an eloquent address, recently deplored the lack of leaders in the Christian church, declared that the churches were dying for lack of them and that the fathers and elders must arouse themselves to the gravity of the situation.

All of this is very true.

This trenchant address leads me to ask if the remedy for a leaderless church is not close at hand, if pastors and theological teachers of all denominations would but avail themselves of it. This remedy lies in the encouragement and cultivation of the leadership spirit in the young people's societies of the churches.

In the olden days parents and teachers, ministers, college and even academy educators, were ever on the lookout for "pious and promising" young men who might be worthy candidates for the ministry. It was made a subject of prayer at family devotions. It was one of the chief objects of the petitions on the Day of Prayer for Colleges, universally observed among the churches. College presidents and many professors considered it their duty and privilege to turn the thoughts of Christian students toward the ministry, the missionary field, or some other form of Christian leadership. My own college president, Asa D. Smith of Dartmouth, invited me to his office more than once to talk and pray about entering the ministry, and his solicitude had much to do with my choice of a calling.

In these days, however, family prayers are, I fear, a rarity, and even when observed, the scanty three or five minutes at the breakfast table do not lend themselves to impressive petitions concerning the life work of the children. The Day of Prayer for Colleges is now observed by few churches, and the Week of Prayer in January, one of whose subjects usually was that God would send out more laborers into the white harvest fields, is also dishonored in the breach rather than honored in the observance. As for the modern college president, except in a few of the smaller denominational colleges, it would excite a smile in many quarters to speak of his talking and praying with his students about entering the ministry or other definite Christian service.

But is there no place where this question can be considered and pressed home upon the young people today? I venture to say that there is a most appropriate and natural place, and that is in the young people's societies. Some experiences among them leads me to write with a degree of confidence.

Means for Developing Leadership

Speaking for the Christian Endeavor and kindred societies, their very genius and methods naturally develop Christian leadership in those who have it in them to become leaders. The young Christian almost invariably first breaks the ice of diffidence and timidity by saying a few words in the young people's prayer meeting—a sine qua non of the Christian Endeavor movement. It may be a very stumbling, hesitating word or prayer, perhaps only a verse of Scripture, but it declares that he is on the Lord's side and it shows the young Christian himself that he is not tongue-tied, that he can speak his simple word for the Master. That is often the beginning of leadership.

Literally hundreds, and I believe thousands of ministers and missionaries, in all denominations and in all parts of the world, have told me that they got their first start, their first urge toward their life calling, in such a prayer meeting.

But that is only the beginning. The bright boy and girl, with natural aptitude for leadership, finds much else in the society to develop his latent powers. The evengelistic Lookout Committee, the committee that prepares for and organizes the prayer meeting, the Social Committee, which promotes an easy and natural approach to others, the Missionary Committee, whose members all have their minds turned toward the needs of the non-Christian world, and half a score of other committees, all develop certain phases of leadership.

DR. FRANCIS E. CLARK

The Christian Endeavor unions—local, county, state and national—of which there are some 2,000, have each a dozen or more officers and committees affording a constant opportunity to some forty or fifty thousand young people to exercise their gifts of organization and leadership in a larger, interdenominational field. As these officers and committees are usually changed every year, and sometimes oftener, a very large number of possible leaders have a chance to develop their powers in the course of a few years. Some of the state and local unions have very large conventions, numbering often from two to three or four thousand in attendance. These manifestly require a considerable degree of skill in organization and leadership to insure success.

As I see multitudes of these young leaders, I am impressed with their resourcefulness, their energy, consecration and ready tact, qualities which often find little opportunity for exercise in later years.

Aroused to Interest in Religious Work

The following well-known laymen will pardon me, I am sure, if I mention their names, since they have all publicly declared that they got their earliest impulse for their religious work in the Christian Endeavor Societies or local unions:

John Willis Baer, recently moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly.

The late John B. Sleman, originator of the Laymen's Missionary Movement.

Andrew J. Stevenson, founder of the Brotherhood Movement.

Marshall A. Hudson, founder of the Baraca Movement.

Fred B. Smith, leader in the Men and Religion Movement, Interchurch Movement and other important religious enterprises.

William T. Ellis, famous religious journalist.

Fred W. Sweney, Comptroller of the Northern Pacific, and religious leader.

William E. Sweet, prominent Y. M. C. A. leader.

Fred L. Ball, successful business man and religious leader.

I might add many other equally well-known names to this goodly list.

Dr. S. B. Capen, of honored memory, told me shortly before his death that the large majority of missionaries who applied for a commission for the foreign field declared when relating their experience, that they had been influenced in a greater or less degree by their young people's society in making their life choice.

At Impressionable Age

Now, with these facts in mind (and they might be greatly multiplied) is it not worth while to give much more attention than in the past to the societies as practical schools of Christian leadership? The young people's society appeals especially to those who are of exactly the right age for this purpose. As Uncle Sam asked for those between twenty-one and thirty-one when he mobilized his army, so the young people's society is largely made up of those who are making, or soon will make, their life-work decision. They are neither too young nor too old. They are mature enough to consider their future life work, but not so old as to have chosen it irrevocably.

Already nearly 5,000 "Life Work Recruits" have been enrolled by the United Society of Christian Endeavor—young people who have promised, trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, to try to shape their life plans so as to give their whole time to Christian work. Many of these, very likely, will never get into the ministry or into full-time religious work of any kind but at least they have faced themselves with the question of their duty along these lines, and will seek to decide the matter conscientiously. Here is a great company of potential religious leaders for pastors and others to consider and encourage in their purpose, should it seem wise to do so.

I approach my next question with humility and some hesitation. But "may I not" ask our denominational authorities if there is not a field for them here to cultivate more assiduously and intensively than has been done? Scores of paid laborers work for the Sunday schools of the denomination, and are doing noble service. Not one man is set apart especially to cultivate the more than three thousand Congregational Christian Endeavor societies as such. It would be most unfortunate if their members were made to feel that they were pilgrims and strangers in our fold, even, perhaps, denominational orphans.

I believe that a determined and sympathetic effort would in the years to come win a multitude of the young men of these societies to places of large influence in the ministry and the laity of our denomination. This has been the happy result in other denominations which would seem to have less reason to make such an effort than our own, and I am glad to know that the leaders of our own Congregational educational forces are ever looking more earnestly in this direction. At all the State Christian Endeavor conventions, which are everywhere growing in numbers and importance, there is an opportunity for denominational conferences if the denominational leaders desire it, and in many, special denominational sessions are always provided for.

Again, if our theological seminaries looked to the Endeavor societies for recruits, I believe hey would find them, but the impression has one abroad that, with a number of notable xceptions, the professors are not interested in uch societies. Many young theologues graduate with a distinct prejudice against the Endeavor Society which, justly or unjustly, they ay they gained from their professors, whose researches in theology, psychology and pedagogics have seldom or never led them to a Chrisian Endeavor Society. So it has been left to uch schools as the Gordon College of Boston, he Moody School of Chicago, Dr. White's Bible School of New York and others like them, to ttract to their halls such young people, many of them college graduates. This they are doing n large and ever-increasing numbers.

I recently attended a State Christian Endeavor Convention of more than a thousand delegates, many of them at the age of decision, not a few of them actual "Life Work Recruits." In the city of the convention is a famous theological seminary. Not a professor came near the meetings, and the one who was invited to address the young people on their life work declined to do so. Doubtless he had some good reason for refusing, but it would seem that such a convention offered a splendid opportunity to reach and impress scores of promising young men with the claims of the Gospel ministry.

I am not writing in the spirit of criticism, but with a deep and intense longing that the denomination which I love should make the most of a great opportunity that is knocking at its doors.

I received a short time ago a telegram from a state Christian Endeavor Convention, saying, "A registration of five thousand and eighty-three. Record delegations from all parts of the state. Over one hundred Life Work Decisions."

I have recently attended conventions in three important states, all of them the largest and most vital ever held in their respective states. In one of them over four thousand paid registered delegates were present. In all of the conventions were many Congregationalists, and in all of them were hundreds—in the aggregate, thousands—of young men and women at the cross-roads, who will soon decide into what life path they will set their feet. The denominations and the theological schools that recognize this will reap a harvest of leaders who themselves will reap other rich harvest fields for the Master.

War's Aftermath in Britain

Unsettled Conditions Continue

By Our London Correspondent

I can imagine that an American visitor landng on our shores now might be alarmed at the aftermath of war. He would find a sullen working-class aggrieved over the discovery that high wages buy no more than low wages did before the war, and disgruntled over the shortage of houses, which is almost the thorniest problem we have to face: he would find a reentful middle class groaning over soaring prices, while professional incomes have not increased sufficiently to balance incomings and outgoings. He would find the capitalist class howling against the new high taxation on excess profits and he would find the aristocratic classes selling their land and their mansions o the war-made wealthy and curtailing their tandard of living to meet the exigencies of the imes. All this dislocation of English life breeds riction and ill-temper. And as Prof. Gilbert Murray has said the English people are seeking edatives in tobacco and bad language. We are moking more than we ever smoked. Ninety-nine out of every hundred men smoke and I hould not care to make even a guess at the percentage of women smokers.

All this unrest is framed by the ghastly condition of Europe, from which we are not far enough removed to escape the backwash. We see France bankrupted by the war and relying on German indemnities (which grow more and more illusory) to resuscitate her finances. The condition of Europe East of the Rhine staggers magination and there are thoughtful Englishmen who, having seen the chaos and welkin of misery over there, express their belief that bolshevism, anarchy and famine will obliterate civilization and plunge Eastern Europe back nto barbarism.

A little while ago Dr. J. D. Jones, breakfastng with Mr. Lloyd George and discussing conditions in Europe and at home, remarked that, f things do not improve, "it will become my job not yours—we shall have to try Christianty." Mr. Lloyd George eagerly agreed—What s needed, said the Prime Minister, is a new Mad Mullah, a blend of John Wesley and General Booth, to draw the peoples back to God.

My comment, when I heard of this conversation, was only that a blend of St. Paul and St. Vitus would be equal to such a task today. Mr. Lloyd George was expressing what vast numbers of English people are feeling just now, and this intuitive sense that only a spiritual revival can lift us out of the slough of materialsm and misery may be the first whisperings of the Spirit of God moving over our country. We are much nearer, I am convinced, to the atmosphere that generates true religious revival than we were in those war days when people imagined that a revival born in the trenches would burst upon England. What signs there are of any fresh religious responsiveness among the people lead one to conclude that it will come as a "Back to Jesus" Movement—a return to the Gospel as Jesus taught it, recovery of the Synoptic "good tidings"—with a deep ethical and moral undercurrent.

Fresh Impetus to Missions

History has repeated itself. The great European war has given a fresh impetus to foreign missionary work and to missionary giving. Before his death Dr. Wardlaw Thompson made exhaustive researches as to the influence of war on missions and came to the conclusions that war has always been a friend of the missionary cause whatever other good causes it may retard. He showed that our Protestant missions had their birth during the Napoleonic wars, that after the Crimea, the Indian Mutiny, the North and South war in America, and the Boer War, the incomes of our missionary societies received a definite traceable filip. It has happened again after the European war. Seven years ago our Missionary income was only about $10,000,000 a year. This year it has attained the record figure of $15,000,000—a gain of a million dollars in this last year alone. The London Missionary Society has added nearly $150,000 to its income and is hopeful that next year it will receive a million dollars from its constituency.

Of course, all the missionary societies are still in straits owing to high prices and those societies working in India and China are severely hampered by advance silver exchange. But the response to the calls for sacrificial giving to avert big deficiencies is a hopeful sign to those close observers who think that generosity in giving to missionary causes is a sound, if rough and ready, index to the spiritual life of the churches. This is another good portent.

Tangled Politics

Our politics just now are a tangled thicket. The confusion of parties is baffling to the last degree. Mr. Asquith's return to the House of Commons has certainly not, as was expected, revivified the Independent Liberal Party. He has shown no fight. Meanwhile Mr. Lloyd George, a Prime Minister without a party of his own, has been angling for an organization. His proposal that the Coalition Liberals should make permanent common cause with the Conservatives to fight Labor was virtually vetoed by some of the Liberal members in his own Government. But the very suggestion has led to an open feud between Independent Liberals and Coalition Liberals, so bitter that the very existence of organized Liberalism is endangered. The labor party, torn by divisions between the Moderates and the Extremists, is losing the popular favor that it seemed to be gaining so rapidly. It is hampered, too, for want of money and it cannot fill its party coffers, as the old parties do, by promising honors and titles to its big contributors.

The old Tory party is dead and some of the younger conservatives are almost Radicals (in ours, not your connotation of that word) on social and economic questions. A dove sent out from the political ark now would find no resting place for its foot and still less would it be likely to find an olive branch to bring home. At the moment, though the government is unpopular, it is almost certain that if he forced a General Election Mr. Lloyd George would return to power, though he might not get a majority of the votes cast in the polling booths. Unfortunately Mr. Lloyd George is in a permanently overtired condition. He virtually carries on his shoulders not merely the government of the British Islands, but the government of Europe as well: and this Atlas burden is too much for human shoulders. A breakdown of Mr. Lloyd George would mean a complete breakup of parties and a realignment of political forces and personalities. Another coalition government would almost certainly follow.

Church Unity Halts

I was very hopeful when I wrote my last letter that a unity conference then recently held at Oxford had found a formula which would advance the cause of reunion by promoting unity of spirit among the churches. But almost before the ink was dry on the manifesto some of the High Church Episcopal dignitaries began to whittle away its significance by qualifications of terms that wholly altered their spirit. The crux of the question is the validity of sacraments administered by ministers who are not episcopally ordained. The High Churchmen make this a cardinal point and, though many Free Churchmen are averse from making a fetish of forms of Church Government, they are fearful of the priestism that emerges from overemphasis on Episcopal ordination. Dr. Reaveley Glover put it very bluntly when writing as a Baptist he said that Baptists were not going to cut themselves off from the great world-wide body of Baptists just to make a truce with a small church on a small island of Britain.

While this virtual collapse of the Oxford eirenicon was being discussed (it is to be considered by the Lambeth Conference this summer, though the life has gone out of the proposal) Free Churchmen were shocked to discover through a speech of our Educative Minister, Mr. Fisher, that the Anglican Church is trying to reopen the old vexed controversy over sectarian teaching in our elementary schools. The proposal is that, in return for abandoning control of their bankrupt Church schools, the right of entry should be given to denominationalists so that they may give sectarian teaching in school hours at public cost. A very few Nonconformists are prepared to make the concession; but the vast bulk of Free Churchmen are up in arms against it. In political quarters it is believed that the idea will fizzle out. But Nonconformists are resentful that at the moment when Episcopalians are talking unity there should have been some manœuvering that looks like an attempt to steal a march under cover of a flag of truce. The ill-timed action has, I fear, sadly queered the pitch for the unity movement—though we are never likely, perhaps, to revert to the hostilities between the churches that blotted Christian charity before the war. We search for grounds of agreement not disagreement now. And that is a glorious gain. A. P.

The Evangelism of a Home

Simple but Sincere Living Affects Many Lives

By Clara D. Pierson

A recent article in a secular magazine records the report made by a Japanese commission, which was sent to the United States by the Mikado to note the effect of the Christian religion as exemplified in the life of the nation. To sum it up in a sentence, the commission reported that Christianity appeared to play a negligible part in the daily life of America.

This official statement, while suave in language, is scathing in its significance and likely to be tragic in its consequences. As balm to the writer's mind came the recollection of a certain Christian home, far away and long ago, the professed and practical religion of which amounted to the finest type of evangelism, and which, although the occupants of that home have long since gone to their reward, is still exercising a potent influence for good through the lives of those who were privileged to dwell for longer or shorter periods within its walls.

At the last National Council three people, from Maine, Massachusetts and Michigan, respectively, were discussing that home, and the testimony of the three coincided as to its having been a place of spiritual quickening. Because of that, it may well be that a sketch of it is worthy of publication, since there was nothing exemplified there which may not equally well be exemplified in any home in our land.

The outward aspect of the dwelling was quaint and modest. It was an old, old frame house, the central brick structure of which had included five fireplaces and a huge bake-oven. It had been used, deserted, and allowed to become quite dilapidated when the more modern dwelling on the hillside farm burned one cold night, and the owners, looking out from the temporary shelter of a neighbor's house, decided to rehabilitate and occupy it. This was done in most economical fashion, chiefly by tearing out the central masonry, which contained almost enough brick for the walls of a small modern dwelling, erecting several properly distributed chimneys and slightly shifting a few partitions.

The "new" outer door of the kitchen was then over one hundred years old, and the plumbing was limited to piping the water of a certain spring to the wooden sink in the kitchen, where it gurgled and splashed cheerfully all day and all night. Two luxuries of construction, and only two, did the owners permit themselves, a frugal little three or four-foot porch along the east side of the big sitting-room, and two French windows giving access to it, through the openings of which, in summer, one could enjoy the pure mountain breezes, and through the wavy glass of which, in winter, one could gaze at the hills opposite and down twenty miles through the valley.

In this home, fifteen miles from a railroad, there was indeed plain living as well as high thinking, yet the latch-string was always out, and guests drove up, singly or in companies, with or without warning, always certain of a warm welcome and a share in what the larder held. City men came and brought their sons and daughters to meet the household, which they so highly esteemed; old neighbors who had reluctantly followed their restless children to the West (some even as far as Michigan), decrepit friends of the days when the master and the mistress of the home had been factory hands; theological students, turning away from holiday outings elsewhere for a short time apart; and a certain elderly and somewhat melancholy saint, who, quite regularly, twice a year, made a tottering trip, which he always referred to, tearfully, as his "earthly farewell," and who concluded his stay with a lengthy and impassioned prayer.

What was the magnet that drew so diverse a company? Not a lavish farm table, surely. The writer recalls a day when a Boston clergyman dropped in at eleven fifty-five, and the menu for dinner included little but creamed codfish and boiled potatoes. The dear, serene home-maker, in response to a panic-stricken "What shall we do about dinner?" uttered behind the closed kitchen door, replied calmly, "Oh, there are plenty of potatoes cooked, and we'll just add a little more cream to the codfish." . . . They did not come for a chance to lie softly and sleep late. Guests there slept on straw ticks and arose with their farmer hosts at five o'clock—sometimes at four. And when the spare rooms would not accommodate all the guests, the younger men were expected to bunk in the hayloft of the rather primitive barn. . . . There was no maid. Guests lent a hand at all work as a matter of course.

No, it was the attraction of fine personalities which drew people, and these personalities were attractive because of the reality of their religious life. The farmer was a man of capacity, but his struggling boyhood and youth had had in them no leisure for schooling or culture. He was of somewhat uncouth physique and of nervous temperament. Even those who loved him had to admit that his enthusiastic hymn-singing was absurd, musically considered. His prayers were fervent, spiritual and extremely ungrammatical. He had been known to pray that certain occurrences in the village might give an "impetuous" to the work of the church. Yes, even the most devout sometimes felt their lips twitch during his petitions.

But his religion was never absurd. It always commanded respect, and that of his saintly, gentle, practically shut-in wife inspired in all who knew her a desire and intention to become more Christlike, to follow more closely the One whom she had followed all her life.

True Worship

It was no mere form of worship when, soon after daybreak, on the busiest mornings of the year, when implements were to be looked after, cows milked and all the farm chores to be gotten out of the way before the day's work in the fields began, time was taken for an unhurried service of Scripture reading, song and prayer in the sunshiny sitting-room with its "windows open to Jerusalem." Grace at the table was never followed by grumbling, nor was it ever curtailed for the sake of hunger or the exigencies of the harvest. And not only the material bounties, but also the beauties of nature, were received as gifts from the hand of God, to be appreciated and mentioned on even the most crowded days.

In that household to know one's duty was to do it, and duty was clearly perceived, as it usually is when people are sincere. When the Civil War came, it was a matter of course that the husband should enlist, although over draft age, and that the wife should struggle along on the farm with what help a little adopted son could give her. When the soldier returned, injured, and was a semi-invalid for years, they took the town's poor to board, as was the custom in those pre-institutional days. And it was there that reason was restored to a woman long demented, a miracle apparently wrought by the gentle care of the house-mother and the tranquil atmosphere of a Christian home. Lesser transformations appeared in certain cantankerous men who worked by the day in the fields, and were, for short and strenuous seasons, members of the family, where they "roared as gently as any sucking dove" and were not only "disguised as gentlemen" but were in reality gentler and better for their presence there. Then, as now, the golden rule had its bearings in the problem of hired help.

Christian Community Spirit

And what was it but the community spirit of the early Christians which sent the cherished soapstone stove forth on its warmth-giving mission? The farmer returned in the chilly twilight of a winter afternoon from an errand of mercy to the dwelling of one hopelessly ill, where the family were worn from long vigils, and the fire in the sick room sometimes failed at night for lack of fresh wood. He told his wife about it as he warmed his hands by their soapstone stove. Their eyes met. There was no need of question and answer, no thought of "trying to decide on their duty." "We'll let the fire go out tonight," she said, "and you can take it over and set it up in the sick room early in the morning. We can get along by bringing in the old sheet-iron stove." So, every morning for the rest of that long and dreary winter, they arose in a cold house, but the sick woman rested warmly.

The farmer's pocket Bible still exists, an inscription on the fly-leaf, signed by his commanding officer, converting it into a pass to be used on Sundays, when its owner went out to help in organizing little Sunday schools in the vicinity of his winter quarters. And in the Middle West there is treasured an old slave-whip of braided rawhide, which the farmer brought back with him from the war, a gruesome reminder of that bondage which he sacrificed his health to abolish. But the dear old home life remains only in the memories of those who loved it, and to whom it was indeed an evangel. Said one city clergyman, "My spiritual life began there, where I lived for two years as a little boy." And other evidence came from the lips of a grandmother of the Middle

West. "I was the child of good parents, church members, but it was there that, as a girl of fifteen, I learned how real and vital religion may be."

Surely it is a testimony to the evangelism of a simple home that when, some years ago, the writer made a pilgrimage to that modest house near the brow of a Massachusetts hill, and found it in the possession of foreigners, the dearly loved sitting-room filled with four double beds, in which the youngest and sleepiest of the tow-headed brood still lingered to round out their morning naps, the windows toward Jerusalem darkened, she still felt that the place whereon she stood was holy ground. May the influence of its former patriotic and consecrated owners descend in some mysterious fashion upon the growing Americans within its walls, and may we, who shared in its hospitality long ago, pass on to those who enter our homes something of that which we received there.

A Touch from the Far East

By Doremus Scudder

In no part of the globe outside of Russia is history being made so fast as in the Far East. The rest of the world, while not exactly marking time, is catching its breath for the next lunge forward. We Americans are not proverbial for our keenness of perception in our foreign relations and when it comes to the problems of the Pacific our ignorance and blundering policy are colossal. With the possible exception of Mr. Taft's administration the Far Eastern policy of our Presidents has paralleled their want of knowledge of the situation. Hence when our government should be vitally influencing for good the whole of that vast population which we class under the name of the Far East, it is while not a negligible factor a tragically inoperative one. It is the business of Americans to know what is going on in the western half of the Pacific world because we form the dominating part of the eastern half and because the two halves make up the whole of what is destined to prove the stage of future history's most thrilling and important drama.

The center of movement in Eastern Asia at this moment is Japan. Unless we know what is transpiring there we shall never be able to act our part in this great play. It is the fashion in our country today to condemn unsparingly if not actively to hate Japan, and both of these emotions are cherished unintelligently. What is needed is sympathetic understanding of this really great and struggling people. Because the sober truth is that Japan is passing through a life and death struggle.

The most evident fact about that empire today is her dominant militarism. She came by this cult naturally. The world, we Americans among others, taught her to worship force. Commodore Perry with warships and not some merchant captain with trading vessels opened her to civilization. Europe and ourselves compelled her to learn war and to believe that only by being physically strong could she hope to survive. She looked the world over and rightly concluded that Germany was the apostle of military might, set herself to study in the school of this master, and graduated with high honors. Starting with an autocratic form of government Japan's militarism, thus learned by compulsion at the hands of the world, naturally became thorough-going. Is it not too much to ask her to discard in a moment this painfully acquired accomplishment?

The most impressive thing about this fascinating and at times exasperating neighbor of ours is that just now she is in the throes of a tremendous fight to rid herself of militarism. It is a big contract, however. The militarists of the Empire foresaw the inevitable and took steps to render their power invulnerable by placing the military above and out of the reach of the civil power. In Japan's make-up both of these head in the Emperor. He and not the people is the source of their authority. Sometime before the war the militarists had him decree their independence of civil control. They constitute a government superior to that over which the Premier presides. They maintain their foreign representatives. Those representatives of the General Staff and not the Consuls appointed by the Foreign Office dominate, wherever they are found side by side. This dual system renders reform extremely difficult.

Yet reform is on the way in Japan. The will of the world is being inexorably forced upon her. First through her own people. The spirit of democracy is rife throughout the Empire. Young men especially are burning with zeal for popular rights. The nation is demanding manhood suffrage and it is only a question of time before it will be granted. The modern industrial movement has invaded the country which is being rocked with strikes. H. C. L. bulks even more largely there than here. The reaction against domestic service is almost as pronounced in Tokyo as in New York. The nation is seething with social agitation.

The militarists have given the country too large a bite of aggressive foreign policy. Practically only one of the greater newspapers supports the militarist policy in Siberia. They see that when the Soviet Government once wins foreign recognition which is inevitable, Japan's hold upon Eastern Siberia will prove untenable. The Chinese boycott is fast rousing such an unconquerable spirit of nationalism in the Great Republic that the Shantung question may take care of itself within a few short years. While the solemn tragedy and moral grandeur of Korea's plea for independence—the most pathetic and idealistic movement in political history—are making an appeal to the conscience of Japan that promises to be irresistible.

Professor Yoshino of the Imperial University, one of Japan's foremost Christians, and one of the most honored leaders of her democratic movement said recently:

> There is a growing number of young men, mostly students, who have acquired the world tendency. . . . This is apparent in national questions. Take, for instance, the labor movement. Students are going down and living with the laboring people in order that they may study the question at first hand. . . . If the question were put to the students (of college and university grade in Japan) as to whether or not we should withdraw from Siberia, ninety in one hundred would stand for withdrawal. If the question of giving Korea independence or complete autonomy were submitted, ninety in one hundred would say give her independence or autonomy. If it were put to the students, "Shall we withdraw from Shantung and give it back to China?" ninety in one hundred would say, "Yes."

There is a great appeal to Christian America in this struggle for democracy through which Japan is passing. She needs from us unequivocal condemnation of the policy of her militarists in Korea, China and Siberia, because she is very responsive to the dictum of a Christian international conscience. She also needs even more keenly our deepest sympathy with her in her fight for political and industrial democracy. We ought to show our true friendship by removing from our statute books all invidious distinctions aimed at her people, by adopting just and brotherly immigration and naturalization laws bearing equitably upon all aliens, and by closer co-operation with her in helping China develop, a co-operation devoid of such insult to our sister republic as that which pleads the special interest of any one nation in another and which seeks to bind the larger and stronger powers in assisting the Asian Republic to realize her possibilities.

A Knockabout Paper — No. 3

By George Lawrence Parker

The disease of church discouragement has today a first cousin in national discouragement. And that is the theme for this "Knockabout."

Take this matter of National Prohibition. I have not frequented "the haunts of men," smoking cars and hotel lobbies for a year and a half without getting some excellent testimony. Undoubtedly America's attempt at national prohibition is the greatest national moral adventure since Israel crossed from Egypt or the Pilgrims came to Plymouth. Here are some of my findings.

The American people are now too busy to do anything but accept the law and carry it out. Merchants are too much engaged in keeping their own trades alive to give time and strength to resurrecting that of other men, even though pleasure might follow. Humpty-Dumpty has fallen. He is likely to "take the count" before he gets strength to rise again.

In the second place, on higher moral grounds, men are surprised at the improvement created by the absence of liquor. Dozens of working men have told me of the increase in their bank accounts and in home comforts since the open saloon got out of his path. This is an unanswerable argument. Even hotel-keepers have said to me, "We had to keep the stuff, but now we are glad to be rid of it." Merchants tell me of selling more and better food than formerly. All of our present extravagance is not extravagance. Some of it is the direct effect of our arresting the highwayman who used to rob us! Some plain men know this better than all the theorists.

Now, as to evading the law. We may expect some of that for a few years. I found a town in Kentucky—alas, for my native state—where the judge who confiscated the liquor in court had it poured into a clean new sink; and under that sink ran a pipe into a barrel beneath his private office. And yet in that same town a new generation of boys are growing up who know not the enticements of the open saloon.

Again—Drunkenness used to be a crime. Now it is a double crime. If a man is intoxicated now he is in that condition in opposition to the law of his land. He is a traitor as much as if one of our boys had told the enemy our war plans. The judgment upon the drinker is rightly now of this severer kind. Men are not simply victims of a wrong but kindly hospitality; they are deliberate defiers of the law. And most of our millions of folks won't stand for this treason.

Again—I have found this verdict among traveling men as to the "poor saloon-keeper" out of a job! "The liquor business began to die twenty-five years ago. Most of us don't get that long a warning on a decreasing trade." And again—"Nobody was sorry for the stage-coach men when trolleys and autos and railroads came in. The government did not repay the town criers when newspapers came. Why then all of this pother about providing for the saloon-keeper?" And once more the argument is unanswerable.

So I find that men in the rough and tumble world are concluding that Prohibition came by the choice of the people. And this American people are too busy dethroning kings and tyrants to give their time to restoring this one.

It is not a day for national despair after all. But a day for great national hope.

Here endeth the third "Knockabout."

IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

David Spares Saul's Life

International Sunday School Lesson for July 18. 1 Sam. 26:7-17, 21.

1. Saul in David's Power. It is night. Make the scene vivid. The camp of the king is at rest. Abner was in command. He ought to have been awake and on guard. But he, too, was asleep. The king lay on the ground, sound asleep. He had stuck his spear in the earth near his head as a sign of the royal presence and so that he would be able to seize it at the first alarm. He knew that he must be prepared to meet his enemies. David and Abishai took the whole situation in at a glance. They knew that they could kill more than one of the sleepers and escape into the darkness without being captured. Abishai was ready to do the deed of blood. Note how he tells David that he will kill Saul with the king's own spear and not be forced to strike but once. We can almost see the big muscles swell in Abishai's arm as he whispers his threat to David.

2. God's Anointed. Every prompting of selfish prudence would have urged David to tell Abishai to go on and finish the bloody work as soon as possible. He could have put Saul out of this world by a stroke, headed a revolution in his own favor, have seized the kingdom. But note how his religious convictions assumed the decisive place in his mind. Saul was his personal enemy; but he was also the king, chosen by God, according to the popular idea; therefore his person was sacred. Thus the religious convictions of David enter into the reckoning and control what might otherwise have been a selfish and cruel decision. What we note is that religious conviction played a definite and decisive part in the decisions of David.

Take time to discuss this principle in the modern world. There are surely many issues that call for decision in which selfish interests seem to be on one side and the great religious principles on the other. In business and politics and all the larger national issues we discover this evident conflict between the counsels of selfishness and the high challenge of religion. What are the Christian men and women of America going to do in such cases? To decide according to personal advantage and selfish interest is to defy the power of Christian principles. Yet to follow the higher Christian ideals would be to exercise mercy, to defend the weak, to deal with others on the basis of the law of love. How would this apply to our hatred of our enemies? To the race problem in America? To a mandate for Armenia?

3. Taunting of Abner. This scene is so thoroughly human and natural that we enjoy it. Make it clear. It is still dark and David goes across to the opposite hill. Then he begins to shout to Abner, the big captain who had been set to guard the king. We can hear him: "O Abner, Abner, wake up! Hear, Abner! Are you deaf or asleep?" In due time Abner rouses himself. Sleep is in all his tones as he asks, "Who is making all this racket calling to the king?" His responsibility for the safety of Saul is implied in his question. Nobody had called the king; but Abner's conscience made him hear the taunt that way. And now it is David's time to have fun with the big sleepy captain. Not a sentence is wasted. "You are a brave one! No man is like you in all the armies of Israel!" And when Abner has had time to get thoroughly awake and fully angry, David turns the light on the situation fully. "Why did you not watch the king? Some one has been at the very side of the king. Where is his spear? Where is his canteen? What kind of a guard are you? O Abner; shame on you." It is not difficult to see what the effect of this must have been on the hot temper of Captain Abner. He was angry and humiliated and ready for blood. Perhaps it was not magnanimous; but it was certainly most natural and deserved.

4. The Repentant King. Now Saul is awake. He knows the voice of David. The young shepherd had sung to the king too often for him to fail to identify the tones, even when they were full of the taunting glee which he was using against Abner.

We do not attempt to follow the text fully from v. 17 to v. 21. It is apparent that the generous action of David was seen in a moment by Saul and that he responded with an equally magnanimous spirit. Saul did three things: he expressed his gratitude, confessed his folly and sin, promised protection to David. It is the sign of a fine spirit to be grateful for a kindness; it is the mark of a courageous soul to admit wrong-doing; it is the act of a true man to guarantee the protection and peace of one who might have been treated as an enemy. The history does not assure us on the point of the permanence of the king's repentance or guarantees; but the spirit that each shows in this particular event is worthy of all admiration. Which is the greater test of soul, to ask forgiveness or to grant it? Is it easier to admit that one has played the fool or that one has done positive wrong?

Young People's Work: The Erection of a Program

In setting forth a program for young people's work a certain background is assumed; this background may be set forth in a few brief sentences:

That the problem of youth grows out of the fact that they are people in the making and that while they are growing up there comes a constant necessity for adjustment to rapidly changing times and conditions; that the adult life of our day has few if any real well-worked-out experiences to throw into the discussion; that life is as new and perplexing to adult life as to youth; that sympathy is needed and dependent upon the heart of youth itself for any real solution of the problem; that the first thing is the cultivation of friendliness on the part of the church, friendliness being construed not as doing things but an attitude of mind, a right feeling toward young people—making them feel that they "belong;" further, that any program for young people grows out of the facts revealed in a survey of the church, the community and the public school life of young people; that any program must of necessity be built around local needs and in view of the probable responses in church and community to the program when it is set up. It is further suggested that if faith and patience are lacking for such an inquiry into the basic and fundamental background for such a program as we are contemplating, then it may be assumed that what we want is not a real solution of the problem but temporary antidotes for our embarrassment.

With this background in mind what kind of a program will be required to meet the situation?

1. Whatever is lacking in the cultural life of young people in any given community must find its recognition in the program of the church. It may not be possible to meet that need any other way. Doubtless it would be better in the long run to work for the changing of conditions in the community, but in the meantime something must be done for those who are now with us, and who may leave us before we get those conditions changed. If the conditions in the public school, or general atmosphere, are such that no real sense of history or world consciousness is found to exist in the minds of young people, then without criticism or open break with the public school, certain items may be written into the local program for young people that will supply this lack in their social training, e. g.—reading and study classes in art and history, mission study classes and the like—anything that will cultivate the sense of world consciousness and human solidarity. Such a class may meet during the winter evenings and get good results from a study arranged to meet the most pressing need in the culture of heart and mind. Such a class met for the study of Italian art and poetry and the whole life of the community was freshened and awakened. Another class met for the discussion of doubts and difficulties of young people. This class met on Sunday afternoons in the parsonage and the pastor was able to lead the discussion on a basis of frankness and reverence so that the majority were led to accept the divine will and later join the church. Five years after the class had scattered young men came to him and said that they owed it to the discussions of that afternoon hour that their whole viewpoint upon life was influenced by Christian standards. Hence the first suggestion is that it would be a Program of Fulfillment—to fill the lack in the lives of young people due to the failure of other community organizations to meet the need.

2. The recreational life of young people is more than a passing phase, more than a temporary period between sweet unconscious childhood and an adult state of hard work and dreary monotony; not because young people will have amusements, but because they must. The "must" here has reference to necessity and not thoughtless frivolity. It is when we forget to play—when we have no inclination to play—that we begin to face the fact of old age and impotence. The church must teach the true value of play and further, must be willing to direct the play of children and young people. When young people are allowed to play with what comes handiest it is then that the devil sees that something is handy! In a conference

Worldliness and Other-Worldliness

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for July 11–17

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Readings. 2 Pet. 1:1-15. 1 Cor. 7:29-31.

The Uses of the World. That is a significant marginal reading which says of Christians that they are to use the world "as not using it to the full." There is a law of reserve even in innocent things for those who are on a journey and keep in mind the place to which they go. A difference between a worldly and an unworldly man, in the Christian sense of it, is that the full heart of the first is in the inn and the scenes along the road; while the second enjoys and uses as he goes, but does not ask to stay. Christian joy is traveler's joy at best. We have lost a good deal in relaxing attention toward this pilgrimage attitude which was so marked in the New Testament days and in the days of our fathers. These are travel days. And these are travel friendships and relations, to be renewed and perfected when we meet at home. All that we need as we go on is to be employed and enjoyed, but not to the full; lest our hearts be weakened and absorbed in them. They are, in other words, means to an end rather than ends in themselves. The real test of enjoyments and possessions is the question of what they are worth to us when we are going somewhere.

The Peril of Identifying Ourselves with the World. This word worldliness has somewhat gone out of fashion with our generation, partly because we do not wish to pass judgment on the ways of others, and partly because we have never succeeded in redefining what it means in terms of our own age as old definitions slipped away from us. But is not the right definition just here? A worldly man is one who is entirely absorbed in the things which the world contains and gives. He could not possibly feel at home in any other surroundings and circumstances than those which his present life provides. So far as time and means allow he uses the world to the full. If there were to come one of those great stellar collisions of which the astronomers have recently told us so much, everything on which his heart is set would be among the elements which melt with fervent heat. That is, I am sure, the reason why talk about heaven seems so dreary to so many people. They have not the first elements of an investment or interest there. They have invested all they have and are in this inn of pilgrimage which we call the world. All their eggs are in one basket. They are completely identified with this world.

The Limitations of Other-worldliness. There is danger on the other side, danger of living wholly in the imagination and missing the uses and innocent enjoyments of the present. We cannot, if we would, live apart from our fellow men or abstain wholly from the responsibilities of our world citizenship. It is a problem in priority, you see, which each must settle for himself in regard to special interests and indulgences. We must remember always that our citizenship is in a wider sphere than earth that we may use earth's opportunities intelligently and joyfully, but not to the full.

CHRIST IN OUR GENERATION

But ye are a chosen generation . . . that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light.—1 Pet. 2:9.

Christ would still seek the lost, but he must do it now on our feet; he would still minister, but he must do it with our hands; he would still warn, and comfort, and encourage, and instruct, but he must do it with our lips. If we refuse to perform these offices for him, what right have we to call ourselves members of his body in vital union with him?—Josiah Strong.

And this wise world of ours understands Christ quite sufficiently to recognize his image in his true disciples. It still demands the one infallible proof. It scrutinizes us who profess and call ourselves Christians, and it says, "Except I see the print of the nails I will not believe."—W. Robertson Nicoll.

Make channels for the streams of love,
  Where they may broadly run;
And love has overflowing streams
  To fill them every one.

But if at any time we cease
  Such channels to provide,
The very founts of love for us
  Will soon be parched and dried.

For we must share if we would keep
  That blessing from above;
Ceasing to give, we cease to have—
  Such is the law of love.

The sufferings need a herald. A gospel requires an evangelist. The monarch must repeat himself through his ambassadors. The spirit of Calvary is to be reincarnate; the sacrificial succession is to be maintained through the ages, and we are to fill up that which is behind in the sufferings of Christ.—J. H. Jowett.

When the professed followers of the path marked out by the Founder of the Christian religion plainly do not themselves rate the being in that path as their supreme and only essential good, they, naturally enough, cannot persuade others to estimate its value more highly.—George Trumbull Ladd.

If men cannot believe in the Christians whom they have seen, why should they believe in Christ whom they have not seen?—Maltbie D. Babcock.

O thou who by thy life and death and the witness of the Spirit in our hearts has given us testimony of the love of God our Father, so that we cannot help but believe; so companion and pervade our thoughts and wishes that we may never bear false witness to thy love. Help all who are called by thy name to show forth thy praise in faithful obedience to thy great commandments. And bring in the revelation of thy kingdom so that thy light may shine through those who claim to be its citizens for the lighting of the world. Amen.—Isaac Ogden Rankin.

The Ways to Happiness

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for July 18-24

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Why People Are Unhappy: the Cure. Ps. 32:10, 11; John 15:9-14.

Light from the Bible Passages

Unhappiness in many cases has a direct connection with sinfulness. Misery and wickedness eventually go hand-in-hand. On the other hand contentment and gladness are the possession of those who place their trust in the Lord and find the source of happiness in him. Those who are upright in heart have every reason for joy. Such is the word from the Psalm.

John emphasizes the principle that a life is really happy in proportion to its nearness to Christ. Consciousness of the Father's love for us, as well as the Master's, adds greatly to our happiness. Much depends also on our nearness to one another (v. 12). Friendships make for happiness, most markedly in the case of friendship with Christ.

We must be very careful of our definition of happiness. It must be something worthy of the Christian. There are many imitations about us. Be sure that it is a much finer thing than fun or pleasure.

How much does our happiness depend on ourselves? If our unhappiness comes through others or through things beyond our control, what should be our attitude?

How largely does sin figure in the world's unhappiness?

Consider the Beatitudes in connection with the subject. "Happy" may be substituted for "blessed."

Thoughts for Members

"Real happiness is cheap enough, yet how dearly we pay for its counterfeit."

"The greatest happiness comes from the greatest activity."

Happy the man, and happy he alone,
He, who can call today his own;
He who secure in Him, can say,
Tomorrow do thy worst, for I have lived today.
—Dryden.

Who is the happiest of men?
He who values the merits of others,
And in their pleasure takes joy, even as though
  'twere his own.—Goethe.

Have you ever had your day suddenly turn sunshiny because of a cheerful word? Have you ever wondered if this could be the same world, because some one had been unexpectedly kind to you? You can make today the same for somebody. It is only a question of a little imagination, a little time and a little trouble. Think now, "What can I do today to make some one happy?"—old persons, children, servants—even a bone for the dog, or sugar for the bird. Why not?—Maltbie D. Babcock.

A Moment of Prayer

O God, we thank thee for thy goodness unto us, that continually brings light into what would otherwise be days of darkness. Teach us to be bringers of such happiness into the lives of others, for the Master's sake. Amen.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

The War and Afterward

Now It Can Be Told, by Philip Gibbs (Harpers). There are many pages of description in this large volume which cannot be surpassed for vivid and dramatic power in the literature of the war. During the great conflict such true accounts of the horrors and blunders of great battles could not have been told. Not that the story is all tragic, due space is given to so much of the brighter side as existed. But the chief lesson of the book is on the wickedness, insanity and futility of war. The revelation of after the war conditions in England is disturbing. The discussion in the last chapter, For What Men Died, contains serious warnings for America as well as for England. The old order cannot continue. Reactionary politics simply invites disaster.

The Irish Case, by P. Whitwell Wilson (Revell). Mr. Wilson has long been special correspondent of the London Daily News. He knows the whole history of the Irish situation and in this book presents the facts to which newspapers are not giving wide publicity. He shows up the so-called Irish republic and gives figures to prove that Sinn Fein represents but a small minority. "Two out of three of the men actually doing the work of Ireland today have not accepted De Valera's authority." He also tells the shameful story of Sinn Fein alliance with Germany in the war.

The Spirit of Selective Service, by Major-General E. H. Crowder (Century). The public has realized that whoever else among high officials may have blundered, General Crowder did not. In this volume he tells the thrilling story of the American system of selective service and shows how splendidly the people, as a whole, responded to the draft, nearly two hundred thousand lending their service in administering the system. The main part of the volume is devoted to the review of what was actually accomplished. The last hundred pages discuss the possibility of "infusing into the national tasks of peace that co-operative enthusiasm that made possible the accomplishments of war." In a chapter on A Plan of Action, he suggests the co-operation of state and federal governmental agencies in such matters as education, the national health, divorce, industrial problems, etc. This is doubtless the most important part of the volume and worth careful consideration. We commend the book to our readers. It should be in every library.

"That Damn Y," by Katherine Mayo (Houghton Mifflin). A complete and convincing defense of the Y. M. C. A. service overseas. The author, asked to make a thorough investigation of the way the "Y" was using American money and report to the public, consented only on condition of absolute liberty to report facts "without regard to whose feelings they might hit." The chapter on The Post Exchange is one of the illuminating chapters putting blame where it belongs, and not on the "Y." At the outset there was delay on this side in sending supplies. But that was not peculiar to the "Y." One thing is worth noting, criticism of the "Y" never came from G. H. Q., from the men who knew the bigness of the task and the obstacles to be overcome. The story told in this book is of a tremendous undertaking. This is a large volume, 432 pages, and tells only a part of the story, but it is enough. It is impossible to review here the vast amount of information in the book. But no one should listen to wholesale condemnation of the "Y," nor be guilty of passing it on—till he has read this book. Then he will not wish to criticize, he will know that, in spite of faults, the service of the Y. M. C. A. was incomparable.

Luck on the Wing, by Elmer Haslett (Dutton). Most of the aviation war books have been written by fighting pilots. Haslett was an aerial observation officer, whose business it was to be the eyes of the artillery, to spy over enemy country and in general to undertake the most dangerous work of the war. It was not his business to shoot down enemy planes, therefore he could not become an "ace." But no branch of the service required more courage, or skill, or is more worthy of our admiration. Haslett did indeed fight at times with excellent success. His account of his experiences is unsurpassed as a thrilling, vivid and delightfully humorous narrative of one aspect of the war. His plane was shot down in German territory and he was taken prisoner but he never lost heart. For his services he received the U. S. Army Distinguished Service Cross, the French Croix de Guerre and other honors. General Mitchell says that "he had the proud record of successfully executing every mission which he undertook during his entire service," with the exception of the last flight, when he was shot down by superior enemy forces.

PHILIP GIBBS

A Private of the Guards, by Stephen Graham (Macmillan). The author was a writer of books before he was private in the guards, the famous Scots Guards. He has written of the minor experiences of the men in a way that is uncanny but illuminating. His chapters on War the Brutalizer and As Touching the Dead, show the seamy, sordid side developed by army life with brutal frankness. Again when he analyzes the effect and methods of discipline it is with great psychological insight. His revelation about what the average private thought and talked about is frank—and illuminating, if depressing. But besides "those vile camping grounds, those disgusting trenches and blood-frays, the bullying, the bludgeoning of the heart"—the brutal aspects of it, its cruelty and sordidness, the petty tyranny and the impurity—besides all this—he has made us see and feel "The Finest Thing in the Army," sometimes called camaraderie, the sense of comradeship, sometimes devotion to duty, sometimes valor. "It is most truly Christianity, for does not Christianity mean the suffering of One that All may have life?" Stephen Graham has the great human touch which transfers real life into real literature.

On Religious Themes

History of the Hebrew Commonwealth, by Albert Edward Bailey and Charles Foster Kent (Scribners). This attractive volume, planned evidently for use in secondary schools and therefore especially useful for young people, is full of information of value to Bible school teachers. It is based on the accepted conclusions of modern Biblical scholarship. It is readable and interesting. It contains 162 illustrations of educational value, and 28 maps. Some of the first chapter titles will indicate the nature of the contents: The World in Which the Hebrews Lived, The Rediscovery of the Hebrew World, The Cradle of Democracy, The School of the Wilderness, The Home of the Hebrews, The Struggle for a Home, The Struggle for Independence, Democracy under Samuel and Saul, etc. Professor Bailey is personally acquainted with the land of Palestine. He has long been a teacher of Biblical History and has been recently called from Worcester Academy to a position in Boston University. Professor Kent has no superior in knowledge and interpretation of Biblical Literature.

Peter—Fisherman, Disciple, Apostle, by F. B. Meyer (Revell). An exposition and biography in one by a writer famous for just such work. It is a picturesque delineation of a familiar figure which brings out new lights and shadows. It shows the growth and development of the great apostle under the leadership of Jesus. It is striking character analysis and is rich in homiletical suggestion and material.

A Lawyer's Study of the Bible, by Everett P. Wheeler (Revell). The sub-title indicates the scope of the book—"Its [the Bible's] answers to the questions of today." The various chapters are studies of truth, prayer, miracles, socialism, social settlements, war, justice and mercy, labor, capital and strikes, in the light of the teaching of the Bible.

The Cross, by Donald Hankey (Dutton). This inspiring essay by the author of A Student in Arms, who was killed in action during the recent war, is all the more significant as one contemplates the supreme sacrifice of Donald Hankey. It illumines the cross of Christ as a symbol of service and sacrifice, human and divine.

The American Cathedral, by Rt. Rev. William Lawrence (Macmillan). A plea by the Episcopal Bishop of Massachusetts for the cathedral in American church life where it will fulfill several purposes—stand for the unity of our Christian faith and the fact of the organic life of the church and be the working center of the diocese. He also indicates its relations to the whole people of the city. There are suggestions here that any church in the heart of the city might well consider.

Freedom and Advance, by Oscar L. Joseph (Macmillan). A series of discussions on Christian progress, being a summary of the trend of the religious and theological thought of our day. The book also constitutes an introduction to some of the best recent literature for the minister by one who has done much book review work for the Methodist Review.

WITH THE CHILDREN

A Hard-earned Dollar

By Annie Hamilton Donnell

"I wish I could earn some money, too!" Roly Poly said, with a wistful little sigh. It was hard to be only five years old "come June," and not have a single penny to put in the Famine Bank!

"I wish I could, Mamma!"

They were all in the nursery together, having their "go-to-bed sociable," as Eunice called it. Eunice had names for everything. She was on one arm of Mamma's chair and Roly Poly was on the other. The boys were lying upside down on the rug, leaning on their elbows, and Queen Mab was in her own rocking-chair, as usual. It was she who spoke next.

"Oh, you're too little, Roly Poly—you can't earn money hemming towels and piling wood and raking the lawn," she said. "You'll have to wait till there's another famine in India. Will there be another one, ever, Mamma?"

"I'm afraid so, dear," Mamma answered, her sweet face grave with pity. "India is so full of people, and there are so likely to be droughts, when the wheat won't grow, or the other crops they depend on for food. If there was only better irrigation there"—

"Ir-ri-what, Mamma?"

"Irrigation, Eunice. That means a way to water the land artificially, with pipes or open trenches. But India has to depend altogether on the rain, and so when there isn't rain the people starve."

"And the little babies," murmured Queen Mab, softly. It was the thought of the little babies starving that seemed most dreadful. The little baby in the cradle across the room was so round and fat and dimpled!

"I'll hem a dozen towels," Queen Mab resolved, valiantly.

"I'll rake Mr. Leadbetter's lawn, too," thought Dick.

"I'll pile up grandpa's wood-pile," Robert vowed. And poor little Roly Poly's sweet round face lengthened again.

"I wish I could earn some money, too!" she sighed.

"I'll pay you a dollar if you'll go to bed without any kiss from Mamma," laughed Aunt Gwen, mischievously leaning over to twitch a little pink ear. Everybody laughed, as if Aunt Gwen had made a joke. The idea of Roly Poly's going without her good-night kiss!

The Famine Bank was really a little brown jug that had to be broken to get out the pennies. It stood on the nursery table in plain sight, and Mamma had used it as the text for her little go-to-bed sermon tonight. She had talked about the hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of hungry people in poor, far-away India—the mothers who watched their little brown babies starve in their arms.

So it was that when the little sermon ended they all began at once to plan ways to earn money to put in the Famine Bank. They decided to begin the very next day because there was so much need of hurry. Somewhere in India perhaps there was a little brown baby that their pennies would save! But they must hurry—hurry.

"A whole dollar, Puss-in-Boots!" whispered Aunt Gwen, temptingly. "Think of putting a hundred pennies into the Famine Bank! And just as easy to earn—fie, just to go without a kiss!"

"'Tisn't a kiss, it's Mamma's kiss," Roly Poly murmured, snuggling against Mamma. She and Mamma were very "int'mate."

In slow strokes the nursery clock began to strike, "Bed-time—bed-time—bed-time," and the children got up, obediently. They were accustomed to obey the nursery clock.

"I'm going to get up at five o'clock to begin raking," announced Dick.

"So'm I, to pile wood," Robert echoed. But Queen Mab shook her yellow head.

"I'm not," she said. "I shall need all my sleep to prepare me for hemming towels!"

Upstairs in the girls' room Mamma unbuttoned Roly Poly's "behind buttons" and rolled up her soft hair into a row of little white "pop-corns." Then she tucked her into bed.

"Good-night, little one," Mamma said, after the little prayer was whispered in God's ear. "Pleasant dreams—why, where's your mouth disappeared? I can't find it to kiss!"

Roly Poly mumbled something into her pillow, but the little red lips stayed hidden. And slowly—very slowly, indeed—and gently, Roly Poly's two moist, warm hands pushed Mamma away.

"Don't kiss me, Mamma," the little girl said, tremulously; "I've 'cided I'd go 'thout. Please go away just as fast as you can. I'm 'fraid I'll change my mind."

"Why, Roly Poly, why, little one!"

Mamma looked down at the back of Roly Poly's head, with its fringe of little white "pop-corns," and felt an irresistible impulse to stoop over and kiss the little warm neck under the fringe. But she waited.

"Do you really mean it, dear?" she said, gravely.

"Yes'm, oh, yes'm, if you'll only please to go away, out o' my reach! I've 'cided to earn that dollar for the Famine Bank, an' the little hungry babies, Mamma. I've 'cided to. Good-night."

"Good-night," Mamma said, squeezing a little hand lovingly. Then she stole away, out into the hall. She sat down on the upper stair, to be within hearing if Roly Poly called her back. She hardly believed the child's courage would hold out.

Five, ten minutes went by, then another ten. Then Mamma heard Roly Poly singing, in a soft, broken voice:

O, do not be discullidged,
For Jesus is your F'end,
He'll give you g'ace to conquer,
An' keep you to the wend.

She sang it over and over to herself, and Mamma knew it was to keep from calling her back. She knew that in there in the dark Roly Poly was earning her dollar by the sweat of her brow.

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

You will wish to read, I know, some more of the letters submitted in the "Why-I-Like-My-Minister" contest. Here is another California Comrade, Millicent Childs, who writes:

"My dear Mr. Alden:

"Our Minister has five characteristics which I like very much. They are:

"1st.—While being able to meet and interest the most learned and refined, he condescends to people of lowly birth and attainments, and makes them feel at ease in his presence.

"2d.—He always preaches his sermons in terms and language that the humblest, even children, can catch his meaning and yet the best educated are fed and instructed as well.

"3d.—He always seems calm and composed, never rushed although the busiest and hardest worked man in the parish, he has time for everybody and everything pertaining to his work.

"4th.—He always seems to choose appropriate subjects at opportune times, never a faddist nor spectacular in his efforts to draw, and yet he draws and is popular among all classes.

"5th.—He is deeply spiritual as seen by his work, nor does he seem to do anything as being conscious that it is out of the ordinary or other than the everyday life he lives."

Now another Comrade, this time from Massachusetts, Edith Clark, gives this answer:

"My minister is one of the leading preachers of today, but I believe that were he the pastor of an obscure church, I would admire him just as much. His sermons, illustrated by many worth-while anecdotes, are so true and inspiring one wants to live up to them. Each is so straight-forward and reveals such clear thinking, one feels that it is indeed a message from God.

"I like him because of his interest in young people. Each Sunday he comes to Sunday school to give us a short talk or lead us in one of our memory hymns. And I like to talk with him afterwards, and ask him questions.

"And not only do I like him for these things, but also for what he is himself. To my mind he is just what a minister ought to be."

Next week I shall give one more letter and announce the prize winners.

I didn't think it possible that my challenge to your sharp eyes would go unmet. Remember I challenged you to find the misspelled word in one of the advertisements in the May 20th issue. Comrade Ruth Currier of Newbury, Vt., was the first to report. As she says, "On the first page right after the cover is an advertisement having at the top, 'Plans for Children's Day.' On the lower right-hand side with the photo flower cards is the word I discovered as spelled wrong. It was the word 'permanent' and it is spelled 'permenent.' The differents (I am not sure but that we shall have to have a contest to find the misspelled word in this Comrade's letter. Mr. A.) is that there is an 'e' where there should have been an 'a'." Comrades Lucile Ames of Orange, Mass., and C. C. L. of Newburyport, Mass., also found the word.

I have been very much afraid that they would find a number of misspelled words. I think that is a pretty good testimony to the accurate proof-reading of The Congregationalist, don't you? Think how many mistakes you find in the daily papers.

While I was traveling a few days ago I picked up a newspaper in Maine and found a communication from a minister where he said that he had found a white rose on one of his apple trees, growing out of the bark and not along with the rest of the blossoms. He said it had the perfect look of a rose but the perfume was more of an apple. I suppose this is true. I wonder if any of you have run across such an unusual thing as this.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

Howells Amid His Peers

A Celebrated Boston Event

By Warren P. Landers

When a boy in the Brockton, (Mass.), High School it was my fortune to secure a privilege offered but once in a lifetime. So far as I know, the particular grouping of notables here described had never occurred outside an artist's imagination.

Longfellow had been dead five years. Funds for his Cambridge Memorial were being gathered. His friends of the Inner Circle arranged to add impetus in a novel and remarkable way. Under the auspices of the Memorial Association, at the head of which was James Russell Lowell, an Authors' Reading was planned. A long list of prominent women formed the Committee of Arrangements, first in alphabetical order being Mrs. Louis Agassiz and Mrs. T. B. Aldrich. Charles Eliot Norton presided with wit and grace and for each participant had a summa cum laude introduction.

I still treasure the program of the occasion, held in what was then regarded as one of Boston's most elegant theaters, The Museum, on Tremont Street near King's Chapel grounds. The day was Thursday, March 31, 1887. The appearance of the notable readers drew a capacity house and I stood for two hours. It is not easy to reconstruct the event from a boy's point of view. It was Boston—a state of mind, not a locality. It had atmosphere. Let me reproduce the third page of the program:

Excepting Mr. Whittier, too ill to be present, all Massachusetts' literary stars of the first magnitude were there. Every author save Lowell read from his own writings. He gave in deep voice and with little variety of inflection, Longfellow's Building of the Ship. One cannot forget the playfulness of Aldrich in The Bad Boy's Diary, the liquid tones of Curtis in the Potiphar Papers, nor the interest with which we listened to Dr. Holmes in poetical contributions.

Of course there was a laugh for and with Mr. Clemens. Professor Norton introduced him with a reference to Darwin, who "always went to sleep with a copy of The Jumping Frog under his pillow." Mark Twain replied that that gave him great satisfaction until he learned that the scientist's physicians allowed him at night "nothing but absolute drivel." Strictly speaking the humorist did not read from his own work but from a late production which, as I recall it, he was fathering: English as She is Spoke.

Mr. Howells was next to the last in the distinguished list. He had lately become a member of Harper's staff and was working in "The Editor's Study." With a selection from The Rise of Silas Lapham he made a most pleasing impression. The novel had appeared two years before (1885) and been widely read. In good voice and forceful, his contribution was among the well-remembered gifts of the afternooon. He is the last to leave us of this galaxy of celebrities. His going is to the writer the breaking of a link in a wonderful memory. The curtain drops, as that of the Old Museum itself, disappearing with the march of time, but the names of the participants and their work are enshrined in history.

With the Schools and Colleges

Anniversary of Yale Divinity School

It has been a good year for the Yale Divinity School. The effects of the stress and strain of the great conflict are beginning to disappear, and conditions are returning to normal. The school, which sent more men to the war than any other graduate department of the University, was at one time reduced to 44 students. This year there were 111. The graduating class, numbering 36, is one of the largest and best, not only in recent years but in the history of the institution. Its members represented all sections of our country. Two came from Canada, two from England, one from British West Africa, one from China and one from Japan. Ten were Methodists, seven Disciples, six Congregationalists, five Baptists, two Presbyterians, with single representatives of the Episcopal, Reformed, Mennonite and other denominations.

As the graduates go to their various fields, they will be separated as widely as in the years before they came to Yale. Two go to China, one to Japan, one to Central Africa, one to Egypt, one to India, two to Turkey, two to England, one to engage in settlement work and the other for further study. The others are taking charges in all parts of our country.

The baccalaureate sermon was delivered by Professor Porter and was followed by an impressive communion service. At the 98th anniversary exercises Mr. Warren W. Pickett spoke on "The Need of a Great Cause," Mr. Raymond B. Culver on "The Contribution of the Y. M. C. A. to the Church," Mr. Albert F. Coyle on "The Church in a New World," and Mr. Rees H. Bowen on "The Social Task of Christianity." The Hooker-Dwight Fellowship was divided between Mr. Rees H. Bowen and Mr. Dryden L. Phelps. The address, given by Professor Walker, now the Provost of the University, was one of unusual interest; and the force which marked his discussion of the minister's task in the present was matched by the sympathy and affection with which he bade the class godspeed.

At the luncheon served in the Center Church House by the Smith College Alumnæ for the benefit of the Endowment Fund of their beloved alma mater, Rev. J. M. Deyo, of Danbury, presided. Mr. H. H. Luetzow spoke for the graduating class, Rev. F. A. MacDonald, of Westerly, R. I., for the class of 1914, Rev. W. T. Hale, formerly of Yale-in-China, for the class of 1905 and Pres. Lyman P. Hood for the class of 1885. Dean Brown then introduced the graduating class to the alumni and spoke of the need of recruiting men for the ministry.

The commencement exercises of Chicago Theological Seminary, Union Theological College and the Congregational Training School for Women were held during the week of June 6. Chicago Seminary had four graduates, Union College two and the Training School five. The Seminary has had during the year 45 students and counting the summer quarter, has had a total of 64, representing 42 colleges. The amount subscribed for the Seminary in the Mid-West Education Fund is about $300,000 and steps are to be taken immediately to bring the fund up to a million. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon Revs. J. W. F. Davies and R. W. Gammon of Illinois and F. L. Moore of New York. The plans for the erection of the new buildings at the Seminary will be held in abeyance on account of high prices.

The college has had 30 students enrolled this year. It has made great progress since last commencement. Dr. J. A. Jenkins, who had been Dean since the founding of the school, has accepted the presidency and is at work. The college has acquired Keyes Hall and Hammond Library and has had these buildings made over to suit its purposes so that it is now comfortably and adequately housed. Through the generosity of Mr. A. R. Dole of the New First Church, the college closed the year with all bills paid. Indications now are that the enrollment next year will be a large one and that the college will render an increasing service to our constituency.

The Training School has had what is perhaps the most successful year in its history. Three or four times as many graduates as it has been able to train could find employment in our churches as pastors' assistants. The school will remain in its present location, 5603 Dorchester Ave., for another year. The enrollment for next year is already larger than that of last year and the prospects are good for a full school. Miss Margaret Taylor, who has just closed her first year as Dean, will remain in that capacity for next year. Rev. J. W. F. Davies was re-elected President of the Board of Managers. One remarkable development in the life of the school is found in the fact that six of its graduates have lately been chosen to go to foreign fields, some of them have already sailed.

Captured by the Turks

What seems to have happened to Mr. and Mrs. Paul Nilson, missionaries of the American Board, who are reported missing from Tarsus in Cilicia, is that in seeking a short rest from their work they ventured outside the lines of the French force which holds that city and were carried off by brigands. They know the people of the neighborhood well and are well known to them, and it is hoped that they are merely detained by some irregular Turkish force. The French have voluntarily set aside twenty Turkish prisoners as hostages for their safety and demanded their return of the Turkish commander. And our State Department has been asked to make representations to the Turkish Government. Mr. and Mrs. Nilson went to Tarsus in 1919 from their former home in Illinois. Mr. Nilson is a graduate of Beloit College and Hartford Seminary, while Mrs. Nilson took her college work at Wheaton College, Illinois.

First, Manchester, Has Historical Collection

A historical collection of photographs and manuscripts and record books, together with other valuable material, has been gathered during the last few years for First, Manchester, by Miss Mary M. Tolman. An exhibition of this collection was held recently and excited great interest. There were nearly 200 pictures, including one for every deacon since the church was founded in 1828, the various clerks and treasurers, trustees, pastors and their wives and families, and of fourteen sons of the church that have entered the ministry or missionary service. The sextons and organists were also honored. A card index of all the known facts about each person included in the collection is kept by the curator, Miss Tolman. Incidentally, she is anxious to know if other churches possess similar historical collections, and she would like to correspond with the curators of any such treasures in other churches.

Union Services at South Weymouth

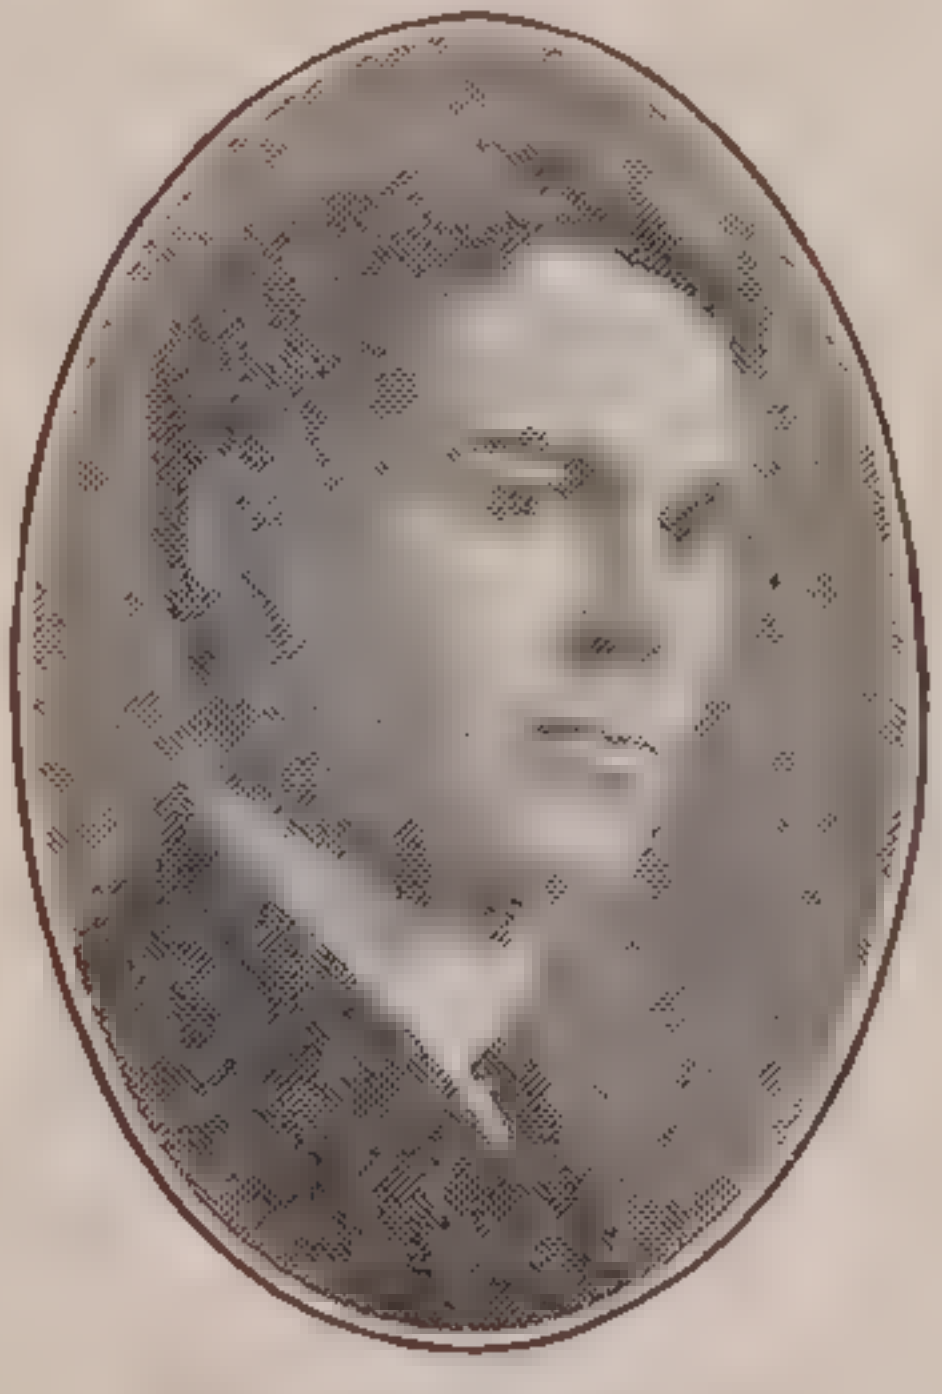
Since Jan. 1, 1920, 59 new members have been admitted to Old South Union, South Weymouth, more than half of them by confession of faith. This has been the result of steady consistent work on the part of the pastor, Rev. O. A. Price, and a few others working with him as an evangelistic committee. The pastor has made an average of 100 pastoral calls a month this year and since September, 1919, he has made nearly 1,000 pastoral visitations. This work showed its effect also in an enlarged attendance at the morning service of worship throughout the winter and spring. Arrangement has been effected whereby the Universalist and the Congregational churches will have united services during July and August, the pastor of the Universalist Church having the service during July and the first Sunday in August, he and his people coming to Old South Union, and the pastor of Old South Union having the service during August and the first Sunday in September, he and his people going to the Universalist Church. Plans are now also under way for a united Protestant Community evening service to be carried on during the following year beginning in October.

Fathers and Sons in the Ministry

"BLOOD WILL TELL"

REV. R. S. CROSS

REV. E. W. CROSS



REV. R. M. CROSS

CHARLES W. CROSS

The father of this ministerial group, Rowland Stevenson Cross, was born in Sarnia, Ontario, April 27, 1844, of Scotch parentage. At the age of 15 he went to live for a year or more with his uncle, Rev. James McLean of Thomaston, Me., under whose influence he entered decidedly upon the Christian life. Just about the opening of the Civil War he made the acquaintance of Henry D. Noyes of Boston, one of the best friends he ever had. Mr. Noyes gave him a seat in his pew in the old Berkeley St. Congregational Church, of which Dr. Henry M. Dexter was pastor and whose ministry he enjoyed for upwards of three years. He was received into the church along with Morton Dexter who afterwards succeeded his father as editor of The Congregationalist. Near the close of the Civil War, Mr. Cross decided to study for the ministry. His first pastorate was at St. Johnsbury Center, Vt. While there he made the acquaintance of Mary E. Weeks of Lyndon, a student at Mt. Holyoke, who later united her fortunes with his and by her "sweetness and light," her courage, her tact and her skillful management on small incomes, contributed largely to his success in the ministry. Together they have served home missionary churches of Minnesota for more than 30 years, receiving into membership nearly 400 on confession. Mr. Cross now resides in Milwaukee.

Rev. Edward W. Cross is a graduate of Carleton College and Oberlin School of Theology, and like his father worked his own way through his course of study. He was pastor at Livingstone, Mont., more than four years and then was called to Grinnell, Io., where he is now pastor. He served as Y. M. C. A. Secretary in France for 15 months in connection with the First Division. He was wounded in the right shoulder by a piece of shell while serving as a stretcher bearer. Later he served as chaplain of the 16th Infantry going with his regiment to Coblenz, Germany.

Rev. Rowland McLean Cross is likewise a graduate of Carleton and Oberlin and he too worked his own way. He served as "Y" Secretary in Honolulu two years and for another two years taught in the Mill School for Boys. After his return to the States he did home missionary work in Montana one summer and then took his theological course at Union Seminary and Oberlin. He was commissioned by the American Board as a missionary to Peking, where he is now at work among the great student body of that city.

Charles Willard Cross also worked his way through Carleton, took one year of his theological course at Oberlin and then served as Y. M. C. A. Secretary at Camp Cody, N. M., for a little more than a year. Not satisfied with this he enlisted in the army and later was commissioned Second Lieutenant in the 58th Field Artillery. He is now serving as assistant pastor of the Ft. Washington Collegiate Church while completing his theological course at Union Seminary.

Mr. Leavitt Remains at Baker, East Boston

The resignation of the Rev. B. F. Leavitt from the pastorate of Baker, East Boston, has been withdrawn. His letter had been read at a service June 6, which every member had been urged by personal notice to attend. The reason stated for the pastor's action was, that with the completion of 10 years in this pastorate, and with the pressure coming upon the church through the disclosures of the East Boston Survey of the Interchurch World Movement, it seemed as if the church might enter upon a new era of efficiency under a new leadership.

At the meeting called to act upon the pastor's letter the action of the church was unanimous that Mr. Leavitt be requested to withdraw his resignation and to continue in the leadership of the church; all pledging co-operation as best they can give it. On Sunday, June 13, the pastor announced his decision to comply with the church's request to withdraw his resignation and continue with them as their pastor and leader, an announcement which was greeted with applause. The church also added $100 to Mr. Leavitt's salary.

Dr. McCord Resigned Pastorate at Randolph

The pastorate of nine years of Dr. Archibald McCord over First, Randolph, will come to its close Aug. 31. As Dr. McCord said in his letter of resignation, these "nine years have passed without friction and not one unkind word." Whatever differences may have arisen, as many pastorates full well know, no one was ungenerous enough to cause him unhappiness in an expression of them. Coming from the Methodist Church, Dr. McCord entered the Congregational fellowship with a clear comprehension of its genius and has proved loyal to its traditions and purposes, as he illustrated in his previous pastorates at Providence, Taunton and Fitchburg.

Randolph has not been a vigorous church for many years, because of the passing of many families and because the preponderant element in the community is not Protestant. The place and influence of the Congregational ministry have been limited. Many would have been utterly discouraged. Still Dr. McCord persevered in spite of obstacles, inspired and guided by the idea, "I want to do good and help everybody I can."

The church will also be deprived of the splendid service Dr. McCord's capable helpmeet was always ready to give in a most unselfish spirit. Dr. and Mrs. McCord will leave with the good wishes of many friends.

First, Somerville, Buys Parsonage

There is a well-known story of a boy who said that the minister was coming to dinner and he had "got to catch that woodchuck" in order to have meat. Houses are now so scarce that it might be said that the minister is coming and the church has got to get a parsonage. This is especially true in the cities where the churches have let the minister and his family find a rent to suit themselves. The present shortage of housing has brought it to pass that, though the foxes have holes and the birds of heaven have nests, the shepherd of the church is likely not to have where to lay his head. Many churches have built or are building parsonages and others have bought or contemplate purchase.

NEW PARSONAGE OF FIRST, SOMERVILLE

Among those which have bought parsonages is FIRST, SOMERVILLE, situated on Franklin Street of that city. The opportunity was taken to buy a house standing almost across the street, which was built by a former Boston contractor for his own use, and, besides being adapted to the purposes of a parsonage, is of superior material and workmanship. The purchase was financed by pledges made at a parish reunion on April 7, and the money-raising meeting in the vestry was immediately followed by a religious service of dedication in the parsonage. The church building itself is a beautiful, substantial, commodious and well-arranged brick structure.

First, Somerville, originally a wealthy church in an aristocratic Boston suburb, has become a cosmopolitan church of working people. The change has been gradual, and this church, instead of yielding ground, is getting hold of the newcomers, and looking forward to larger usefulness in a more populous community. The present pastor, Rev. S. C. Lang, was called last November, on his discharge from an army chaplaincy. He made a fine record as a parish builder in his first pastorate at Quincy Point, Mass.

CONNECTICUT

United, Bridgeport, Has Notable Anniversary

UNITED, BRIDGEPORT, celebrated on June 13-16, the 225th anniversary of its founding. The anniversary service was held on Sunday morning, the 13th. Dr. W. H. Day, pastor of United, was assisted by Rev. H. H. Tweedy of Yale Divinity School and a former pastor of Second Church; by Dr. R. L. Swain, pastor of Second at the time of the union; and by Rev. H. D. Gallaudet, of Waterbury, Ct., pastor of First Church at the time of union.

The church was beautifully decorated in honor of the occasion and for Flag Sunday. On the organ, beneath a great American flag, hung the replica of the Colonial flag at the time of the Pilgrim Fathers, which was used at the 200th anniversary of the church. A Pine Tree flag covered the baptismal font. Over the choir rail two flags of 1777 were hung; in front of the pulpit was a flag with 16 stars, which had been rescued from Fort Sumter after its surrender. The vested choir of 30 voices, under the direction of Mrs. Elmer Beardsley, organist and choir director, rendered the anthem, "The Heavens are Telling," from The Creation, Haydn; also, "Except the Lord Build the House," by Gilchrist. An impressive feature of the service was the roll call of the original members of the Church of Christ in Stratfield, as the church was first known, responses being given by their descendants.

Dr. Day gave the historical address on "Our Church Inheritance," followed by Mr. Gallaudet on "The Spirit of Reunion," and by Dr. Swain on "Whom God Hath Joined Together."

At the fellowship service on Wednesday evening, the representatives of the different churches of the community were invited. The processional included the Protestant clergy of the city of all denominations. Those who took part in the service were Rev. D. B. MacQueen, Dr. G. H. Beard, Mayor C. B. Wilson and Mr. W. Seymour-Lacy, the last General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in Bridgeport, who told the story of the reunion of the churches, of the remarkable spirit of the reunited church which had its source in the splendid self-sacrifice of the two pastors. Each had come to his parish with great consecration but the passion for promoting the Kingdom of God had crystallized into an even more glorious vision.

Principal Alfred Ernest Garvie, D. D., of New College, London, gave an address on Ideals Common to the Two English-speaking Nations. He referred to the common love of liberty, our common literature, especially the Bible of King James, and prophesied that the United States would have her share in the new society of nations. He declined to comment on political affairs but he spoke with no uncertain voice about the great moral questions before the two nations. The benediction was pronounced by Dr. F. S. Child, pastor of the ancient Church of Christ in Fairfield, which with Stratford were the mother churches.

The week of celebration closed with a lawn fête on Saturday in the beautiful garden of Mr. and Mrs. Lucien T. Warner at Seaside Park, with a parlor concert by the choir in the evening. Mr. Herbert Birdseye was chairman of the anniversary committee.

South, Hartford, Damaged by Fire

On June 23, SOUTH, HARTFORD, was seriously damaged by fire, perhaps to the extent of $50,000. It is thought the fire was started from the torches being used by workmen in burning off the paint from the exterior so as to restore the original brick. The walls are intact and the work is going on; but the interior is badly damaged both by fire and by water. The church, under the lead of its pastor, Rev. W. S. Archibald, is planning to hold services in the Wethersfield Ave. Church, which is now a part of the South Church and the building of which is used for a parish house. The repairs on South will take some months. C. S. L.

Greenwich an Interesting Community

Greenwich, one of the most beautiful suburbs of New York City, is rapidly becoming an unusual Congregational colony. Among the latest additions to its Congregational circle is Dr. N. D. Hillis, pastor of Plymouth, Brooklyn, who has taken a charming home for two years and will commute to and fro from Brooklyn; Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of Christian Work and educational secretary of the Church Peace Union; and Dr. E. N. Hardy, secretary of the American Tract Society. Dr. Oliver Huckel is pastor of Second, Greenwich, from which Dr. G. A. Gordon was called to Boston, and where Dr. Josiah Strong and Hamilton W. Mabie were active laymen. Mrs. Sidney Lanier, widow of the poet; Ernest Thompson Seton; Irving Bachellor; and George Wharton Edwards, the artist, are among the literary and artistic people of the community.

First, Middletown, Has Young People's Forum

FIRST, MIDDLETOWN, prints in its calendar the subjects of the sermons of its pastor, Rev. Douglas Horton. They are exceptionally fresh and suggestive. Recent themes have been: "Christian America, Ltd.," "When Angel Meets Demon," and "The Tragedy of the Almighty."

Recent meetings of the Young People's Forum have been addressed by Hamilton Holt on "The League of Nations"; by Mr. W. O. Berckman on "The Curious Customs of Southern Mountaineers," among whom he has lived for 15 years in the Kentucky and Tennessee mountains; and Mrs. Lawrence Thurston of Ginling College for Women. C. NEW YORK

Dr. Hillis Addresses Ministers' Meeting

The New York Ministers' Meeting closed a remarkably interesting year with a luncheon at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, on May 17. Dr. Oliver Huckel, president, gave an address on "The Friendship of Books," and Dr. N. D. Hillis spoke on "Oliver Cromwell and the Present Crisis."

Littlefield; "Plain Words on the Concordat with the Episcopalians," by Dr. J. P. Huget, and "How New York Can Solve Its Problem of the Negro in Our Midst," by Dr. H. H. Proctor. Dr. Oliver Huckel of Greenwich, Ct., has been elected president for the third annual term and Rev. A. C. Church, secretary.

Progress at First, Newburgh

First, Newburgh, Rev. Thomas Bell, pastor, at the last communion service received 22 new members. A recent Every Member Canvass has doubled the income of the church and an old debt has been greatly reduced. The pastor's salary has been increased $300 a year. The first year quota on the Pilgrim Fund has been joyfully paid off.

Progress at Mapleton Park, Brooklyn

At Mapleton Park, one of the youngest churches in the Brooklyn suburbs, 29 new members were received on Easter Sunday, 28 on confession of faith. This makes a total addition since Jan. 1 of 34 new members. The pastor, Rev. E. W Robinson, a descendant in direct line of both John Robinson and John Alden of Plymouth fame, has just completed a successful five years of service with Mapleton Park. During his pastorate the church has erected its present beautiful and commodious edifice, now nearly free of debt; and both the membership and the income of the church have quadrupled. The past year has been the most successful of the five, Mapleton Park giving nearly one and a half times its quota for the Pilgrim Fund and also doing its full share for the Emergency Fund. B. A.

PENNSYLVANIA

Successful Federation at East Smithfield

Federated, East Smithfield, is composed of the Congregational and the Disciple churches. The Congregational church is one of the oldest Congregational churches in Pennsylvania. Like other communities, East Smithfield as it prospered became overchurched. For years four denominations were represented in a little village of only 400 people, a village which was a township center of a population of less than 2,000. Recently there has been a genuine effort on the part of the Christian forces of East Smithfield to get together, the result being the Federated Church.

In October, 1919, at the request of the Congregational Home Missionary Society and the unanimous call of the church, Rev. H. F. Gould began the pastorate of East Smithfield. Since that time the attendance at church and Bible school has increased 60 per cent. Organized effort has taken the place of disorganization.

The Minute Men, a men's Bible class which began with six members, now numbers 42. Every Sunday sees some new men in the class who for years had not been regular attendants at church. This class of men has undertaken to be for this country village what the Rotary Club is for the city. Already they have agreed upon a program for the boys of the community, have put over the Farmers' Institute and are now working on the problem of getting electricity for the township. Absolute harmony exists among the members of the Federation.

Rev. W. J. Williams, New Pittsburgh Pastor

A recognition service for the new pastor, Rev. W. J. Williams, was held at Puritan, Pittsburgh, the evening of June 28. A fairly good representation of the church members was on hand to hear the interesting addresses given by the several visiting clergymen, among whom were Dr. C. W. Carroll of Philadelphia, who received the minister and his wife into the membership of the church and gave the charge to the minister, and Rev. T. M. Hofmeister, pastor of Allegheny, Pittsburgh, who gave a stirring address to the church. The right hand of fellowship, welcoming Mr. Williams and his wife into the fellowship of the Pittsburgh Association of Congregational Churches, was given by Moderator A. D. Rhea of Punxsutawney. Rev. Raymond Kistler, pastor of South Side Presbyterian, welcomed Mr. Williams in behalf of the local churches of the South Side. Rev. W. J. Richards of Arlington, Pittsburgh, also took part in the service.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Parsonage for Mt. Pleasant, Washington

The first Congregational Church in Washington to secure a parsonage for its pastor is Mt. Pleasant. The housing situation at the Capital has been so acute that for almost a year the pastor, Rev. W. A. Morgan, has been compelled to live almost five miles from the church. Early last fall a movement was started to secure a parsonage and this spring a modern house was found and purchased by the ladies of the Church Aid for $16,000. It is situated on one of Washington's most beautiful streets, facing Rock Creek Park, the largest park in the city. There always will be an unobstructed view far across Rock Creek and over the woods to the Cleveland Park suburb.

Almost 100 new members have joined the church in six months, many of them men of influence in the city. The church is united and enthusiastic over the realization that before long a new site and a new plant will be necessary for the demands of the growing work. Two liberal raises in salary have been given the pastor since his coming to Washington almost three years ago.

ILLINOIS

Forward-moving Years at Aurora

Rev. F. G. Beardsley has just observed the third anniversary of his pastorate of First, Aurora. During the three years 91 members have been received, making the present membership 446. The last of an old debt which had hung over the church for years has been entirely paid, a new organ motor has been installed, and extensive repairs made to the church property. The church exceeded its quota for the Midwest Leadership Fund, the Pilgrim Fund, and recently subscribed its full quota for the Congregational World Movement.

WISCONSIN

First, Racine, Free from Debt

First, Racine, Rev. J. T. Chynoweth, pastor, received 42 into membership on Easter Sunday, all but one on confession of faith. This church is now entirely free of debt, the result being brought about without special pressure. Many free-will offerings were brought in response to Mr. Chynoweth's announcement that he would be glad to have his birthday celebrated in that way.

AN IMPORTANT BOOKLET FOR CONGREGATIONALISTS

BEFORE completing the plans for the new church in your neighborhood it is of vital importance that you read this booklet.

It contains an explanation of the true purpose of church furnishings. It tells how varied appropriations may be economically expended to secure the best and most harmonious results in the church interior.

If you are planning a new church, or if you are intending to refurnish your present edifice, this booklet will prove valuable to you, to the directors, and to the architect.

We will gladly send you one without cost or obligation.

three years to make up a total of $15,000 to meet past and present church obligations. Men, women and young people were divided into three classes of boosters. The women at the very first pledged $1,000 to be paid this year.

Endeavorers Organized at Broadhead

In April a Christian Endeavor Society of 47 charter members was organized at BROADHEAD, Rev. A. N. Brown, pastor. The Presbyterians have for some months been worshiping at the Congregational Church and recently disbanded their organization.

Live Organizations at Evansville

All departments of EVANSVILLE are making fine progress under the leadership of Rev. O. W. Smith and his splendid family. Work with the children and young people is especially well taken care of. Christian Endeavor, Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts and other organizations are prospering.

Books on Congregational History

LA CROSSE, Rev. C. C. Rowlison, pastor, has just purchased 14 books dealing with Congregational history and organization. These, together with The Congregationalist, Wisconsin Church Life, the Missionary Herald and the American Missionary, have been placed in the La Crosse Public Library. The list of books includes those for adults, young people, and children and are the very best that can be secured. Attention has been drawn to it through local papers, announcements from the pulpits, mention in the church bulletin and posters in the library. Thus during the Tercentenary year, not only the Congregationalists, but the other people of La Crosse have an opportunity to learn more of our Pilgrim history. This plan might be used by many other churches with great profit.

Plymouth, Racine, Has Monthly Conferences

PLYMOUTH, RACINE, Rev. J. R. Hogan, pastor, has enjoyed a splendid year of work, many social and educational features proving of great value. The church school teachers have a monthly conference and supper and the various women's organizations meet in joint session monthly. All departments of the church are flourishing under the leadership of the pastor and his associate, Rev. H. W. Carter.

MINNESOTA

Splendid Ingathering at Olivet, St. Paul

OLIVET, ST. PAUL, Rev. G. M. Miller, pastor, received nine new members on Pentecost Sunday, making a total of 84 since the first of the year, an aim of 100 new members in the year 1920 being almost realized in the first five months. Olivet sent its pastor as the church's delegate to the International Council. The quota of $4,250 on the Congregational World Movement has almost been reached.

IOWA

Fourteen Graduate from Hospital School

The commencement exercises of the Iowa Congregational Hospital Training School were held the last week in May. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Rev. J. P. Burling at the Greenwood church on Sunday. The graduating exercises were held in the Waveland Church the following Tuesday evening, the class address being given by Rev. B. M. Southgate, pastor of Algona. A class of 14 were presented their diplomas by Rev. Charles Parsons, President of the Board of Directors. The hospital has had a successful year and the training school affords a fine opportunity for young ladies desiring to fit themselves for the profession of a trained nurse.

MONTANA

First, Great Falls, Pushing Forward

FIRST, GREAT FALLS, Rev. B. R. MacHatton, minister, has recently passed the 100 mark with its total of new members received the past few months, 78 being added as a result of the Easter Drive. The Church School has increased in attendance from about 100 to an average of over 300. This required the completion and furnishing of the basement at a cost of $5,000. It is used also as headquarters for the Boy Scouts of the city and for social gatherings of the church.

This expenditure was preceded by the payment of a building debt of long standing, amounting to several thousand dollars and by the purchase of a Moeller pipe organ, valued at $7,000. This is a notable achievement, indicating sacrificial giving, for the section of the state, of which Great Falls is the commercial center, has suffered three years of drought. Happily, heavy snows and spring rains assure better times.

In addition to this the pastor's salary has been twice increased, now being $4,200, and in the recent drive for the Congregational World Movement, the church went over the top by almost doubling its quota, which had been trebled over the last year's apportionment, and is expected to reach $2,000.

OKLAHOMA

Religious Awakening in Jennings

About the first of April, at the suggestion of State Superintendent A. E. Ricker, Rev. Charles Mundell opened a series of revival services in JENNINGS and continued them well up into the month of May. He aroused sufficient interest to fill the house to capacity every evening. As a result 75 made open confession of faith, 25 joining the Congregational church and even more the Methodist. Mr. Mundell was asked to take active charge of the Congregational pastorate and has accepted. A. E. R.

CALIFORNIA

First, San Jose, Relieved of Burdensome Debt

During the month of April, FIRST, SAN JOSE, Rev. E. A. King, pastor, celebrated its 45th anniversary by paying off its long standing parish house debt. This debt-raising campaign was a direct outgrowth of the successful Every Member Drive of last December. For the past 12 years the church has carried this debt with interest. The people generally requested the minister to put on a campaign to wipe it out. The giving was most hearty and shared in by practically all of the members of the congregation and the parish. It was one of the most delightful campaigns ever put over.

At this time, by a special sermon and exercises, Mr. King observed the fourth anniversary of his pastorate and the 23d anniversary of his entrance into the Christian ministry. During the four years of this pastorate the church and congregation have grown in numbers and efficiency. There have been 130 new members added and a number of new enterprises have been undertaken. First, San Jose, has furnished numerous leaders for religious and social service enterprises and today has several stars on its Christian Service Flag, representing members who are at work in China and the United States.

WOMEN'S INTERESTS

Nancy's Way

By Mary Davis

We expected brilliant things of our Nancy and we grumbled a great deal when she married during her first year out of college. But we became reconciled as she made us see the splendor of motherhood. Four babies were welcomed into the little red bungalow during the next few years. Nancy's methods of bringing up truthful God-fearing youngsters were as original and effective as her thesis on "Mental Measurements."

Once when I dropped in on Nancy there was a patter of light feet in the hall and in burst Nancy, the Second. Her brown eyes were as round as dollars and her long thick braids bristled with horror. "Georgie swore, Mother," she whispered hoarsely, "he swore twice."

Nancy patted me on the shoulder as she vanished. "Whip the cream for me," she begged, "it's on the first shelf in the pantry."

I heard a long shrill wail of protest which grew fainter and then died away. Nancy, the Second, and rosy Abbie May helped me get luncheon. Nancy appeared when we had everything ready. She smiled at us as she put some slices of bread and butter and a mug of milk on a tray.

"You're a treasure," she declared, "I'll be down in a minute."

"Where's George?" demanded her mate as he rushed into the house and only Jack, Abbie May and Nancy, the Second flew at him.

"In the hospital," said Nancy as she tied Abbie May's blue bows in the original Nancy fashion.

When the other three were safely in bed we tiptoed into the hospital which turned out to be a little attic chamber away from the rest of the house. Nancy's mate pointed with an appreciative grin to the sheet dipped in disinfectants which hung in front of the doorway. "George loathes the odor of disinfectants," he said under his breath.

"Yes, and he'll hate profane language before he is discharged," Nancy said with spirit. Then her face grew tender as she looked at the rosy sleeper, "He'd counted on cream pie all day," she said ruefully.

Her mate closed the door softly. "Nancy treats lying, stealing and other juvenile crimes as contagious disease. The culprit is thoroughly scrubbed and put to bed on invalid diet."

"One of the results of breaking the law is to be shunned by society," remarked Nancy, "we mothers and teachers should make children realize it."

George was in a very chastened mood the next morning. He had felt the iron hand of the law although no harsh word had been spoken.

Conscientious little Abbie May was a worker but Nancy, the Second was a sad little shirk. We happened out in the kitchen one day and found Abbie May washing a tub full of dishes while Nancy the Second was curled like a kitten in the big rocking chair.

"I helped Abbie May with her home work," she explained lamely.

"That was kind of you," said Nancy evenly, "here, Abbie May, I'll wipe these. No, Nancy, go on with your book."

"Abbie May has been doing those dishes alone for weeks," Nancy told me later, "and I thought I had cured my little shirk."

For the next few days Nancy, the Second, did her share ostentatiously. But her mother had made up her mind that she needed a lesson. The great secret of Nancy's success in training her children was due to the tenacity with which she clung to her chosen course.

Saturday at breakfast she casually inquired of Abbie May if she knew how to reach a large crockery store. "I'd change at Main Street for a Walnut Square car and I'd go right by it," said the little girl sagely.

"I looked at dinner sets lately," said her mother, "and I found four pretty ones that I liked. Suppose you go in and look at them this morning and choose the one out of my four that you like best."

Abbie May grew an inch taller as we looked at her. Her rosy little face glowed with pleasure.

"I'll go with you," volunteered Nancy the Second.

"You are not interested in pretty dishes," objected her mother, "besides I shall need you."

Abbie May departed happily. "I shall worry every minute that she is gone," admitted her mother, "but responsibility is the best thing in the world for gentle Abbie May. My little shirk on the other hand needs to know some of the joys of the homemaker."

So when Abbie May returned her mother said happily, "Won't we have a wonderful time choosing wall paper next month, dear? You keep your room so neatly that I'm going to let you help me."

Nancy the Second departed noiselessly. Then we heard the tread of little feet above and the noise of furniture being tugged about. Capable Abbie May rushed away to join her sister. It was plain that Nancy the Second intended to choose her wall paper too.

Nancy grinned. "It takes a lot of contriving to teach little folks that it pays to be good in the long run."

"Big folks too," I said with a sigh.

The Hoover Type and Politics

Why is our politics not richer in men of the Hoover type? It is not solely because they are looked upon with horror by the politicians. The blame lies in part with the voter, who to some extent shares the politician's distrust of a man who is "different"; but it lies in no small part with these men themselves. Some of them would not touch politics with a ten-foot pole, and too many of those who try to get into politics cannot conceal their feeling that they are debasing themselves for the sake of ends that can be reached in no other way. We might as well recognize first as last that this feeling must be overcome if such men are to have the influence to which their abilities and their ideals entitle them. No man who shrinks from contact with his fellows deserves preferment at their hands. Aversion to the political methods that our democracy has developed is hardly to be distinguished from aversion to democracy itself, and it rightly means banishment from our politics. There are practices to which no self-respecting man will stoop, but they do not excuse an attitude of patronizing indifference. The only way to banish them is for able, high-minded Americans to play a larger part in the political game. —New York Evening Post.

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight-year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Eight ministers joined the Fund during the week of June 13 to 19.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

for young people now in session the whole afternoons are being spent with good results in directing the play of young people. They in their turn will be expected to return to their own home towns ready to carry out some of the healthy forms of play they are now enjoying themselves. Hence any true program for young people in every community will be a Program of Joyful and Happy Activities. It might well be called a Program of Light and Joy.

3. No one will dispute that the old type of Devotional Expression has no place in a modern program for young people. There is ample evidence that the average type of Christian Endeavor prayer service has ceased to function in true devotional expression. The difficulty is not alone with the material provided for this service, but also with the methods pursued for, granting that the very best material could be offered for this purpose, it is still true that it would tend to become stereoptyped in the hands of untrained leaders. No one has yet found any remedy for immaturity and inexperience—but systematic and thorough training.

Sympathetic and tactful leadership is the greatest need of the average prayer service. The devotional life of young people, even as every other phase of their life, is in need of real training. It is suggested that a half hour or more in the Sunday evening prayer service might be devoted to such a study as "The Training in the Devotional Life," one of the units of the second year of the Pilgrim Training course for teachers, might yield excellent results. Whatever may have been the ideals of the young people's prayer service in the past the fact is borne upon us with irresistible evidence that we must furnish sympathetic and tactful leadership in its devotional programs. Young people must not be left to educate themselves, they must be inspired by example and helpful guidance. Hence the program we are trying to outline will have as one of its chief points, the sympathetic and helpful leadership in devotional activities.

International Council Number

We have made this issue larger than usual to give space for reports of the great International Congregational Council meetings in Boston. There were so many meetings and so many speeches that we can only give a running story of each one and interpret the spirit and significance of it. But altogether it makes a long story. The central program of the convention was hardly more interesting or important than the sectional meetings, some of which developed great interest and gave the opportunity for needed discussion. We are pleased to be able to present so comprehensive a review of the meetings, but regret that we do not have space to publish in full many of the excellent addresses.

Among the features of the Council which appear in our reports our readers will be interested to note the Council sermon by Dr. Jones, the address to the world-wide fellowship of Congregationalists issue as the pronouncement of the Council on some important subjects, the various resolutions adopted, the organization of the International Congregational Fraternity and the description of the missionary exhibits.

To the latter might have been added a complimentary word regarding The Congregationalist section of the Pilgrim Press exhibit. Under the direction of our Circulation Manager, Miss Wentworth, The Congregationalist staff was "at home" to its friends there as well as at the home offices in the Congregational House, and a large number of visitors gave us the pleasure of meeting them. Our section was attractively decorated and the exhibit included copies of the paper representing the various periods of its history from the first issue of the original Recorder 104 years ago to the present time. The other departments of the Publishing Society were well represented.

DEAR READERS:

I wish to take this opportunity to express publicly my appreciation of the gracious introduction to you extended by our Editors a few weeks ago. Since the resignation of your former highly esteemed Circulation Manager, Rev. Charles Ernest White, the new manager has been placed in a somewhat amusing position, many of our readers assuming that she was another "Sir," and frequently letters have come to her addressed "Mr. E. M. Wentworth," "E. M. Wentworth, Esq.," and even "Rev. E. M. Wentworth." But she is now pleased to come into more definite personal acquaintance with the readers of The Congregationalist and Advance.

It has been my happy privilege during the meetings of the great Internatonal Council to meet many of you face to face and offer the hospitality of The Congregationalist. But to those of you who were unable to come to Boston for this inspiring Gathering of Congregationalists from every part of the world. I wish to extend now a friendly hand of greeting and good fellowship. May you feel that the new Circulation Manager is your friend and that we are all workers together in the service of our Master through The Congregationalist and Advance. Let us strive to increase its mission of service by never losing an opportunity to speak well of it and introduce it to our friends and neighbors. It is worthy of our best efforts.

Heartily your friend,
ETHEL M. WENTWORTH.

A Mid-Summer Call from Piedmont

A Letter That Changed Plans

President Frank E. Jenkins, April 12, 1920.
Piedmont College, Demorest, Ga.,

Dear President Jenkins:

The Executive Committee of the Congregational World Movement has received requests from several participating organizations that the committee should issue a ruling covering the point as to whether organizations participating in the Congregational World Movement Emergency campaign for 1920, may at the same time prosecute their own campaigns for funds.

The Executive Committee at its meeting held March 31st, 1920, expressed the unanimous opinion that to conduct the financial campaign for particular institutions at the same time the nation-wide campaign is on would be most inadvisable. Pursuant to this judgment the Executive Committee appointed us a special committee to draft a communication to all interested parties.

We recognize how difficult this is to adjust. If we say "No," there are splendid schools and societies which are expecting to raise much more than promised by the Congregational Emergency Fund. On the other hand, if we say "Yes," there would result endless confusion; many would be solicited often, the ground would be burned over by the separate campaigns, it would not be fair to other organizations who have syndicated all their appeals and it would not be playing the co-operative game in the Interchurch program.

The denominational drives expect to list all church members in Class A, or on the white card—while the Interchurch expects to list all outside the churches in Class B, or on the blue card. Is it not obvious that individuals who will be canvassed by this organization or that, are the same from whom the church or the Interchurch expect to raise their funds? It must be apparent that this is not "playing the game."

Therefore we are compelled to advise you that from date to July first all separate campaigns of churches or individuals should be suspended or participation in the Congregational Emergency Fund ought not to be anticipated.

If your organization has received large conditional pledges with a time limit, we should be glad to co-operate with you in the effort to secure an appropriate extension of time.

Signed: F. M. SHELDON, G. L. CADY, JOHN M. THOMAS, H. F. SWARTZ, Special Committee.

"To Play the Game"

The above letter was received while the President of the College was on a campaign for funds. Notice of it came to him in the city of Northampton, Mass. He had just made a call at the home of a friend of the College and was on his way to another; but instead of making the expected call, he turned about immediately and started for home. On arriving there, he found 30,000 pieces of literature lying on the office tables ready for mailing These had been stopped by the letter and have awaited the time limit set by the Committee.

It was indeed "Playing the Game" for the sake of the World Movement rather than for Piedmont College.

From the middle of April to the first of July are the most important weeks of our financial year. Within that time we are accustomed to receive by far the largest amount of donations of any like period within that year. On June 1st final payent of our teachers' salaries was due and the final payments of the fiscal year were all due within the time when our appeals were prohibited.

The Interchurch World Movement proved to be a financial failure. Our Congregational World Movement, with that of seventy-one other organizations, had underwritten the Interchurch Movement, thus involving a considerable portion of the two millions pledged out of the three millions called for. But for this World Movement, Piedmont College would have received within the prohibited time as much as or more than it will eventually receive from the Congregational World Movement. But for this Movement the money would have been in hand for all our bills; while because of the World Movement whatever we get will be scattered over many months to come.

To meet the situation temporarily has required the utmost effort coupled with all the ingenuity we could command. We hope there will be no eventual loss to the College, but "Playing the Game" has cost us heavily so far.

I issue this mid-summer call with the hope that our friends will see us safely through all the exegencies of the summer months—repairs, new dormitory room called for, etc. FRANK E. JENKINS.

The Congregationalist
and Advance

The Permanent Values of the Council

OUT of eight days of discourse, discussion and fellowship on the part of 3,200 Congregational men and women assembled in Boston from all parts of the world, what permanent values emerge of worth to the old Puritan city which entertained the Fourth International Council, to New England, whose founding it commemorated, to the nation and to the world?

FREEDOM UNDER CHRIST. Freedom is still the native air of Congregationalism. It rang in many a platform utterance. It was re-echoed in many a group meeting. Our birthright is more precious to us today than ever. Liberty to think in the field of theology and of social relationships, liberty to formulate the results of our thinking, liberty to promulgate them far and wide, liberty to worship and to work as seems best to the individual—and all these sacred and inalienable rights held in utter subjection to the mind of Christ—that continues to be the genius of Congregationalism. We will not muffle our witness-bearing to this fundamental principle. Some churches may use it as a cloak for selfishness and isolation—and their doom is sure. But we, just because we are eager for wider Christian fellowships, will not forsake the present outward form of its expression unless we can incorporate into the larger body this intrinsic element in our Puritan inheritance of freedom under Christ.

UNITY TRANSCENDING ALL DEVELOPMENTS. The hundred delegates from Great Britain, the half dozen from Australia, the group from Canada needed only to get shoulder to shoulder with Americans in order to realize that the course of these last terrible years has welded all together into a unity which no yellow journalist, no jingo, no cunning politician can ever dissolve. Our British brethren are British still. That is why we love them. In some respects they have grown more British in the last five years, as well they may have done. But the external differences are microscopic compared with the central convictions, glowing ideals and burning hopes that now command the common devotion of all decent men in England and America:

> "Who speak the tongue
> That Shakespeare spake, the faith and morals hold > Which Milton held."

But international Congregationalism is by no means an exclusively Anglo-Saxon affair. The American Negroes, the black delegate from New Guinea, the five Japanese delegates were integral and respected members of the Council, and the League of Nations for which the Council showed such tremendous enthusiasm and to further whose full completion the American delegates took special action, will embrace all these darker skinned brethren and all whom they represent the world around.

THE SENSE OF STEWARDSHIP. Throughout the Council the sense of Congregationalism's responsibility for a torn and suffering world was strong. It came notably to the surface when Jane Addams with all the strength of a heart that knows neither Jew nor barbarian pleaded for the starving children of Europe. It was the undertone of many an address and many a jovial after-dinner talk. Congregationalism today is as eager as at any time in its history to bear its full share of the labor and travail that go with the birth of a new world. It was a fine discrimination on the part of Sir Robert Falconer when he said that neither England nor America has any desire to impose Anglo-Saxon forms of government upon other nations, but simply to pass on the principles that have nourished the best life of the two countries and let other races and lands prove their value for themselves. The message of twentieth century Congregationalism is as simple as that of Jesus himself when he said to the two men who became his first disciples, "Come and ye shall see."

THE GREATNESS OF THE PRESENT OPPORTUNITY. Over the heads of the thousands gathered in the great hall and through the windows whence came the hum of industry, we looked now and again to get the world-setting for our Conclave. Every time and everywhere we looked we saw men and nations groping for light and leadership. It is the dawn of a new era, but a murky dawn. The world is still sick and sore and sad. The chances to help are so numerous and various as to bewilder even the well-intentioned. This task of healing and guidance cannot be committed to a commission of experts or devolved entirely upon legislators, cabinets, premiers and presidents or even upon a League of Nations. As President King said, this is a time when the single life counts, however limited its sphere may seem. This is the day in the history of the world when God can use any kind of a man or any kind of talent that is plastic to his touch.

GOD MOVING IN THE LIFE OF THE WORLD. Vain would have been the oratory and futile the fine human fellowships of the eight days, had we not felt the presence of one whom we saw not, but whom we knew as God high and lifted up, as God working in us and through us for the ends of his kingdom. As He was with us those eight days in the prayers and the breaking of bread, in the give and take of everyday talk and in quiet intercourse by the fireside, so He is out in the world of affairs, of politics, of business, and in the hearts of the rising generation. Because of the Boston Council in 1920 we shall be better able to recognize Him, to link our weakness with His strength, our fitful desires for nobler living and better service with His cleansing and empowering grace.

Ecumenical Conference Committee

ARRANGEMENTS for the preliminary meeting of the Committee on Ecumenical Conference have now been definitely completed and the majority of the American delegates have already accepted their appointment to attend. The Committee will meet at the Hotel Beau Séjour, Geneva, Switzerland, on Aug. 10 and 11. This is a preliminary committee meeting of federated church bodies to discuss the desirability and possibility of an international Ecumenical Conference. Besides the American delegation there will be representatives from all parts of the world, including especially Great Britain, Italy, Switzerland, Hungary and the Scandinavian countries. The Chairman of the American delegation, which will represent the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, is Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, of Brooklyn, N. Y., Chairman of the Federal Council's Commission on Relations with Religious Bodies in Europe. The General Secretary, Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, Rev. Arthur J. Brown, Chairman of the Committee on Fraternal Relations and Rev. C. W. Goodrich, representative of the Federal Council in Paris, will also serve on the delegation.

American Clergy Sail to Visit European Churches

"FRIENDLY visitors" from American churches to the churches of Europe include Rev. Arthur J. Brown, Chairman of the Federal Council's Committee on Fraternal Relations, will carry the message of American friendship to the churches of France, Hungary, Italy and Switzerland. Mr. Charles V. Vickrey, Secretary of the Near East Relief, will visit the churches of Armenia, Belgium, Bulgaria, Czecho-Slovakia, Holland, Hungary, Greece, France and England. Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, General Secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, has also left to visit Belgium, France, Switzerland, Italy and Holland. Rev. William P. Merrill, pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church in New York City, sails for England, France and Switzerland. The purpose of these visits is to strengthen the ties of international friendship between the churches and to try to restore the shattered confidence of these people in the sincerity of our American ideals.

The New Student Conference at Silver Bay

DELEGATES from more than ninety-five of the colleges, universities and schools in the eastern part of the country met at Silver Bay on Lake George, N. Y., June 25—July 4. This conference has formerly been held at Northfield, Mass. It assembled this year after a thorough study by a representative student committee of the entire question of the best possible site. Among the Congregationalists who helped in the leadership of the conference were Rev. Frank M, Sheldon, Secretary of the Congregational Board of Education; Alden M. Clarke, of the American Board; W. S. Beard, who represented the Home Missions Council. Rev. A. E. Garvie, B. D., Chairman of the British Congregational Union, preached the conference sermon on July 4.

A special effort was made this year to serve the interests of the denominations, not only in this conference but in the seven other student conferences held in other sections of the country. Official representatives of the leading denominations were present for group meetings and interviews and two sessions of the conference met by denominations, when the new and enlarging plans of the churches, both at home and overseas, were presented and discussed by the students.

One of the most interesting sessions of the conference was a meeting held at the time of the denominational meetings of those who represented small denominations who did not have enough representatives to have a meeting of their own. The chief topic of discussion in this meeting was, What distinctive contribution has my church to make to the whole Church of Christ? Students who spoke at this most interesting meeting included members of the following denominations: Christian, Lutheran, Society of Friends, Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, Church of Christ, Reformed, Dutch Reformed, Church of the Brethren, Free Methodist, Disciple, Unitarian.

Lowell's Historical Pageant

IT has been estimated that the historical pageant given in Lowell, Mass., June 8, was one of the biggest and most successful undertakings the city has ever witnessed, and in these days of increased interest in community endeavor would have attracted, had space permitted, even more than the 25,000 to 40,000 who were privileged to see it. It was in five episodes, opening with the singing of "Duke Street" by a chorus, followed by the prologue. All the figures in the pageant were symbolic, first appearing the "Pilgrim Spirit," who summoned "The Spirit of Lowell." She approached with her attendants, with the seasons Youth, Childhood, Joy, Play, etc., in succession. The meeting of Wonalancet and Passaconaway was portrayed in the first episode, John Eliot, the missionary, with Captain Goodsin, and the peace pipe ceremony and conversion of Wonalancet. The second was of Colonial and Revolutionary Days and the gathering of Captain Ford's company of Minute Men. The third marked the development of Lowell, with the business of buying the water rights that created the organization known as the Locks and Canals. The candlelight ball, an annual feature of this period, was a beautiful addition to the pageant, the dancers in costume carrying lighted candles which they placed on the ground while dancing. President Jackson's visit to Lowell when Lucy Larcom served on the reception committee, closed the episode. The final episode, "Lowell Today," was figurative of the city's part in the world war, and drew attention to the many nationalities who contributed service. It was a vast showing. Folk dancing, the singing of national hymns and the waving of national flags introduced pleasant features in the program, while the forming of a human flag with the singing of the Star-Spangled Banner brought to a close a performance that was gigantic in its scope, admirable in its production and reflected honor on its director, Mrs. Julian B. Keyes, and all who ably assisted her.

For Chinese and Japanese on Pacific Coast

The Oriental problem on the Pacific Coast, which is attracting so much attention, political and otherwise, at the present time, has its brighter side, though this is not commented upon to any great extent in the newspapers. The Chinese Christian Union of San Francisco, including in its membership 10 Chinese churches of various denominations in the city, has adopted the American custom of an annual picnic. On June 12 nearly 700 Chinese, all of them members or adherents of the churches, gathered in Golden Gate Park for a day of social intercourse and acquaintance on a Christian basis. On the other side of the bay the laymen of the Japanese churches of Oakland, Berkeley and Alameda are accustomed to meet once a month for a union dinner. Such a meeting was held on June 13, the guest of honor being Rev. Paul B. Waterhouse, who has just been appointed by the A. M. A. as a general missionary among the Japanese on the Pacific Coast. Mr. Waterhouse comes from a number of years of successful experience in Japan and is, therefore, well equipped for his work.

The Choice before the Voters

In nominating Governor Cox for the Presidency the Democratic Party has certainly not put itself in a position to win the adherence of the so-called idealists who have not been enthusiastic over the chosen standard-bearer of the Republican Party. Perhaps Mr. Cox may not be the altogether second-rate politician which the opposing papers pronounce him to be. He has done some good things for Ohio and he impresses one as a modest, self-controlled and capable man. He might improve if greater governmental responsibilities were put upon him. But so might his competitor. Moreover some of the forces behind Mr. Cox represent sinister influences and he will find himself especially handicapped by the support which the "wets" are giving him.

The plank in the Democratic platform relating to the League of Nations is much more specific and dynamic than the facing-all-ways declaration of the Republicans. If on that plank and on those which took sensible positions on social and some other questions a man of high character and entirely unallied with the liquor interests had been nominated, the Democrats would have pressed Mr. Harding closely. What may develop in the next four months is not easy to prognosticate. Many a voter will do some serious thinking between now and November. In such discriminating thought lie the safety and the hope of the nation.

The Next Council

Hardly two hours elapsed between the adjournment of the International Council in Boston last week and the coming together of six Americans and six Britishers more or less concerned with its inception to consult how the next Council may be better than the one just ended. As we write, we are not aware of what went on in that impromptu gathering, but we are glad that leaders of the denomination reviewed the week frankly, for notwithstanding the pronounced success of the Council in many particulars, it had certain defects and limitations.

The main sessions should have been held, we think, not in Mechanics Hall but in Tremont Temple, with Park Street Church and King's Chapel easily available for overflow meetings. Only two or three of the dozen or more sessions brought together audiences that would have overflowed Tremont Temple. Arrangements might have been made for them in Mechanics Hall. It is true that the latter provided better social opportunities and ample space for the exhibit, but we doubt if those superior advantages compensated for the difficulties in hearing the speakers and for the loss of that sense of intimate fellowship engendered in a smaller building.

Some careful work needs to be done before the next Council with a view to compressing the program so that two important elements slighted at Boston shall have larger recognition. One is opportunity for general discussion and the exchange of information, and the other the chance to become fairly well acquainted with as large a number of fellow delegates as possible. There were too many individual speakers at the Boston meetings and too many specific themes. It looked as if the makers of the program had scoured heaven and earth to bring together a large variety of topics, had then listed prominent men on both sides of the water who "shouldn't be left out," and tried to locate each of them appropriately. In this effort they succeeded for the most part admirably. But the average delegate would have been better content with fewer great speeches and fewer near-great speeches, and in fact fewer speeches of any kind. A notably successful Council is ultimately of more value to Congregationalism than a half successful mass meeting.

President J. L. Barton's task was admirably discharged. In view of the present prominence of women in denominational world affairs, we should like to have seen more provision for them on the platform and in the sectional meetings, or in meetings particularly arranged for them.

The National Council Committee and the Boston committee deserve generous recognition for all that they did. Members of both committees lavished time and thought upon the Council, sacrificing their own pleasure and interests in the hope of making the delegates comfortable and contented. To bring together over three thousand representatives of the churches from all over the world was an unprecedented and splendid achievement.

A Chief of the Armies of Health

We had just been hearing with satisfaction that Surgeon-General Gorgas had cleaned up that worst plague spot and infection-nest of the two Americas, Guayaquil, the seaport of Equador, and was taking a breathing spell before undertaking his next great work of sanitation, when news comes of his death in London. He was appointed to the army at the age of 26 and spent forty amazingly useful years in public service. His international fame is indicated by the fact that the public funeral was held in St. Paul's Cathedral. The most famous work of General Gorgas was done in preparation for the cutting of the Panama Canal, following upon four years' work in Havana. The French attempt to carry through that work failed as much because of the death rate as on account of financial bankruptcy. In fact the one was a main cause of the other. Malaria, Yellow Fever and other tropical diseases killed off the workers and made recruiting difficult. General Gorgas and his helpers made the Canal Zone as healthy as Massachusetts. As a result of this success he was made managing director of the International Health Board of the Rockefeller Foundation and became the international leader and adviser in attacks upon tropical diseases in many parts of the world. He had just taken, for example, a long contract for superintending the work of sanitation in the republic of Peru. Next to the Panama Canal the clearing up of the city of Guayaquil is his monument. As a necessary point of call on the West Coast and a great exporting city, it has long been a distributing point of infection. The hope that within a reasonable period of time the tropics may be made safe for human occupancy owes much to the object lessons in sanitation which General Gorgas supplied on such a scale that they won and held the attention of the world.

The Lambeth Conference

Once in a decade the bishops of the Anglican and its daughter churches are called together for conference by the Archbishop of Canterbury at his official residence, Lambeth Palace, in London. The sixth Lambeth conference, which began its sessions last week, has been put over for two years on account of the war. The attendance of some two hundred and seventy bishops and archbishops of churches in communion with the English Established Church are in attendance, seventy-two of them from this side of the Atlantic. Archbishop Randall Thomas Davidson, by virtue of his office as Primate of the English Church, not only invites but also presides.

The sessions of this international conference run through the month of July. They are not open to the public, or even to reporters; but the results in pronouncement will be published and there is a long program of subjects for discussion. First on this program comes the subject of reunion with other churches, mainly with the non-espiscopal churches, and of the validity of their ordination and their administration of the sacraments as the Anglican Church group thinks of them. The question of women in the councils and ministrations of the churches, the relation of Christianity to such cults as Spiritism, Theosophy, New Thought, Christian Science and the like will be considered, as well as the value of such missions of healing as Mr. Hickson has conducted in England and America. Much study will be given to mission work. Most pressing, in view of the present campaign for reform of the divorce laws in England, will be a discussion of the whole question of marriage and morals. Social and industrial problems and the difficult questions of international relations are also on the program.

It must be remembered that the Lambeth Conference is not a church synod and neither claims nor exercises rights of legislation.

The results of conference and discussion will be published soon after the adjournment of the conference in the form of an encyclical letter to the churches under the jurisdiction of these 270 bishops and others not present but in communion with them. An invitation has been given to a representative of the Oriental (Orthodox) Churches to attend; and not least in importance of the documents submitted to the conference is a petition from nearly all the Protestant organizations in China asking the bishops assembled in London to assist in the bringing together of Christians in China into a single church.

The Experience with Prohibition

A year of prohibition has now gone by and we are beginning to get official returns from the results. It is significant of the need that existed for banishment of alcoholic temptation that these returns mainly come to us through the court and penal authorities. They amount to a demonstration that the way to save money on prisons and prisoners is to cease spending money for drink. The Massachusetts authorities as interviewed by the Boston Herald, say that "Prohibition has proved a blessing." For the first five months of this year only 10,324 were arraigned for drunkenness in that state as against 37,176 for the corresponding months a year ago. The enforcement of the law is not perfect. There is trouble at the Canadian borders. Stored liquor has been let out. But these figures are indisputable.

We may well ask on the positive side what has taken the place of these 26,862 arraignments in the lives of those who last year were so often drunk. The answer which the authorities give is that the time and money were for the most part spent in family life. There is a real element of truth in the statement that it is difficult to get the help of scrubwomen now because the necessity of supporting drunken husbands has gone by and the wives are enjoying the luxury of being supported. The children are better cared for and better dressed. We are sure that as these facts and conditions come to the attention of the public it will cease in most quarters to regret any personal sacrifice of indulgence and line up solidly for an impartial enforcement of the law.

The Parable of the Car Wheels

A certain man labored in the Division Terminal of a great Railway. And it was so that when a Train entered the Station, that there they changed Engines, and Train-crews. And certain men put Ice in the Coolers, and Water in the Tanks. And there were times when certain others swabbed the Windows so that they might be seen through; but this did not always occur. And the duty which was assigned unto this man was this, that he should begin at the head of the Train, and walk the length of it, and stoop down and strike every Car Wheel with an Hammer. And he did Precisely as he was told. For he walked the length of every train, and struck every wheel on the right side thereof, and then turned himself about and walked back upon the other side of the Train and the wheels upon that side did he strike in like manner. And this he did quickly, so that he had it done by the time other men had put Ice in the Coolers and Waste and Dope in the Boxes of the Axles, and the Engines had been changed.

Now it came to pass that after many years the General Superintendent spake unto the President of the Road, and he said, Behold this man hath been on our Pay-roll for Five and Twenty years, and he hath never missed a day. Let us Celebrate, and Recognize his Faithfulness, and give him a Gold Watch, and a Pass for himself and his Wife unto California and back, and a little purse of Gold which he may blow in on a good time.

And they did even so.

And while the celebration was in progress some one asked of him, saying,

What is the reason why the wheels must be struck? And what is the occasion thereof?

And he said, Thou mayest search me. I know nothing save that I draw my pay for hitting the wheels, and I hit them every time and never miss a wheel.

But he had never listened to the ring of the hammer that he might hear whether the wheel were sound or cracked, neither had he known nor regarded. But he had done his job and drawn his pay for twenty-five years.

Now when I heard this tale, I said, That man is not so infrequent as some men might suppose. There are many who go through life in like manner. They do the day's job and draw their pay and never think what it all is for. Yea, there might even be such men in the pulpit, but may God forbid; and there are such in many another vocation.

And I prayed my God for all men, that they may labor, not only to strike the wheels but to listen for the ring.

For there are those who strike the wheels and go on, and if the Train run through, they say it is the result of Careful Supervision, and if the wheel crack, and the train land in the Ditch, they say it is a Mysterious Providence.

And there are such men, not a few, who obtain their living by labor no more intelligent than this, and some of them less continuous. And some of them travel on passes and receive the praise of men.

But God knoweth whether men listen for the ring, or whether they only hit the wheels.

In Brief

Hardly anything makes the world seem darker than to be innocent and suffer on that very account. And yet we have the light of one of Christ's sayings on just that situation: "Happy are they which have been persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

Our Congregational brethren in New Zealand have thought it wise to join their fortunes with those of the Presbyterians. In Australia a combination of the two communions is under discussion, with the Methodists for a third partner. It is a time of getting together and the price of union must be paid according to the circumstances on the various fields.

The Germans have just delivered to the British the Zeppelin which was built expressly for the purpose of bombing New York. In British hands New York is secure from its attack, but the thought of what the Germans intended is a warning to the United States that now is the time to carry through plans which will make wars and bombings difficult to the point of impossibility.

Once more the bubonic plague is near our doors. The moral of which is, "Kill rats." It is well established that the rat is the sole transmitter of the disease and the health officers at our ports are anxiously fumigating ships and putting guards on cables to keep them out. There is no occasion for anxiety but stopping up ratholes and cleaning up places where they breed and feed is now in order.

Mr. Harding's family history shows that he too is of New England stock going far back toward the beginnings of the Massachusetts plantation. From Eastern Massachusetts by way of Rhode Island to Pennsylvania, by way of the Wyoming massacre, in which members of the family suffered, they came to Ohio. That family history is typical of the origins of settlement in large sections of the growing republic.

It is good American sense to keep both your temper and your head in the excitements of a political campaign. We are choosing an executive and a Congress who must act for us in years when many of the war cries and rumors and—we must add—the misrepresentations and misstatements of the campaigning time will be forgotten. The long view is what counts. It is quite possible to choose a President in haste and repent at leisure.

High as sound and juicy red apples are at this season of the year, we would give a couple to know just how the real Rooseveltians feel over the nomination of Mr. Harding. We mean not the multitude of people who knew him slightly and who followed his banner, but those of the inner circle who were closest to him in 1912 and who were so eager to nominate General Wood at Chicago as the legatee of Roosevelt's policies and spirit. We suspect that most of them will in due time accept the nomination and work for the success of the ticket, as some of them have already signified they would do. In that case what is the use of trying to determine whether the deciding factor is common antipathy to Mr. Wilson and all his "heirs and assignees" or grace working triumphantly in the human heart and producing the forgiving spirit.

The cordial celebrations of our Independence Day this year in France, England and South America are grateful to every farseeing citizen of the United States. We want to live not merely in peace but also in cordial relations with all the peoples of the world. The machinery for such relations in practical working is sure to come; but the cordiality that is volunteered in the meantime is specially welcome.

Ohio's claim to be the modern Mother of Presidents now seems quite certain to get a boost, whichever way the November election turns. Both the Republican and Democratic nominees born in quiet Ohio homes made their own way to fame and both through the training of a newspaper office. There will probably be a pretty lively time in Ohio from now on until the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

Our first interest in the meeting at Spa is the same as that of our Allies—we want Germany to disarm. But we want it chiefly as the first necessary step toward the disarmament of the whole family of nations. For great standing armies necessarily discredit such organizations as the League of Nations and the International Court, the organization of which Mr. Root and those with whom he is working seem to be bringing to success.

From now on we shall be watching with much interest the British and Australian newspapers to see what our late most welcome visitors at the International Council will have to say about conditions in the United States as they saw them. We shall no doubt have something to learn from these kindly utterances, though we shall also remember that no one of our guests saw in his brief visit all round the life or the character of our widely variant nation.

Irish-American self-consciousness tends to a sensitivenss which rather overrides the Irish sense of humor. In Boston it is proposed to discard one of the famous American dictionaries from all school libraries of reference because in an illustrative quotation certain Irishmen are spoken of as "brutal." Since the dictionary was published some years ago we must conclude that the reference was not to the murders, assassinations and cattle drivings which are going on in Ireland today.

Rev. Jason Pierce's acceptance of his call to the First Church, Washington, is another instance of a much to be regretted subtraction from the religious forces of Greater Boston in order to strengthen Congregationalism at the national capital. He will carry thither the professional qualities that will commend the Pilgrim faith to people from all over the country and, in fact, to people from all over the world who reside temporarily or permanently in Washington.

Scotland is seriously considering not prohibition but local option. The startling and enheartening thing about the Scotch campaign is that it has so large an element of support from working men behind it. It is not true then, after all, that the Scotchman who works with his hands loves his opportunity of befuddling his brains with beer and whiskey most of all. A few localities rid of alcoholic drinks by the votes of their own people would be lights in the dark places of Great Britain.

Fame grows and books stand still. A lot of editors and others as a result of the Chicago nominations turned to their "Who's Who in America" to learn what they could of the life history of Governor Coolidge of Massachusetts, Mr. Harding's running mate. There are plenty of Coolidges enumerated but, lo, there is no Calvin Coolidge. In Massachusetts no "Who's Who" is necessary for the people know all about their Governor, who has no secrets from his neighbors. And that the next edition of that useful handbook will include his name is certain.

If Winston Churchill, the English secretary of war, succeeds in carrying through his scheme to reclothe the English army in the gaudy uniforms of the pre-war era, the poets and descriptive writers who have been sounding the praises of khaki for the last five years will now have to adopt another style of diction. But why this needless expenditure of approximately $15,000,000? Tommy Atkins in his neat inconspicuous garb looks well enough now, and so does his American cousin Sammy.

The question has arisen as to the oldest survivor of the Mayflower company. Miss Hartt in her article on Plymouth speaks of John Howland as "the last survivor of the Mayflower passengers." That honor belongs, we think, on all the evidence we have been able to gather, to Mrs. Mary Allerton Cushman, who died in 1699 and is commemorated, with her husband, Thomas Cushman, Brewster's successor as elder in the Plymouth Church, in a monument on Burial Hill at Plymouth. Mary Allerton was a little child on the Mayflower voyage; her husband came on a later ship.

There is one sign of hope on the world horizon—there are to be face to face discussions of the situation by those who have been enemies. There should come out of the conference at Spa between representatives of the Allies and representatives of the Germans not only a better understanding but also some at least of the rudiments of good will. And it will do no harm to the English government to hear patiently what the representatives of the Russian leaders have to say about trade and other things than trade. It is difficult to hate a man with whom you have talked across a table.

New York has just passed a law permitting the sale of drinks containing 2.75 per cent. of alcohol. But the law does not guarantee that the seller will not be interfered with by the Federal authorities, first, under the war restrictions, and then under the Prohibition amendment. The Department of Justice and the Bureau of Internal Revenue have announced that they will prosecute. The New York law is really an expression of opinion by its legislators and governor. It is perhaps intended to affect the judgment of the Supreme Court in its pending decision as to the constitutionality of the Volstead Act.

Letters drift in from one source and another that indicate a good measure of satisfaction in many a local church with the outcome of the Congregational World Movement Campaign. Here is what a Massachusetts pastor writes:

> Certainly without the Interchurch neither the surveys nor the stimulus of a co-operative example could have been achieved and these were necessary for the success of our own special cause. We believe with you that the Congregational churches have been awakened to new and more sacrificial standards.

From a pastor in New Hampshire comes this word:

> The Interchurch Movement has made many mistakes, bless it! But it has done my church an enormous amount of most practical good. It has accomplished the "impossible and hopeless" in opening both the minds and the pocketbooks of many people of influence to the glorious possibilities of the Kingdom of God in earth.

It was inevitable that the death of Prof. James Hervey Hyslop, so long foremost in research about efforts to communicate with the dead, should be accepted as a challenge and in hopeful expectation by those who are convinced that such communications are not only possible but well established. Special confidence in the thoroughness of testing which has marked Professor Hyslop's studies in this field adds interest to this expectation. His long work as teacher in philosophy and ethics at Lake Forest, Smith and Columbia lies outside this special interest and avocation. As was to be expected, there have been messages purporting to come from him, but none as yet through the Society of Psychical Research which used his services in its American branch as secretary and editor. One such message through a Canadian medium is just such an essay on conditions beyond as adumbrated in the messages which have come in many quarters through recent years as any student of the subject might write at leisure. We shall look forward to any report which the Psychical Society may have to make when the returns from Professor Hyslop's experience are in and authenticated by such tests as he himself employed and such other special tests as he in anticipation of his own death arranged for.

The International Council Sermon

The Doctrine of Development

By Rev. J. D. Jones

Pastor of Richmond Hill Church, Bournemouth, England

Editors' Note.—A central feature of the International Council was the sermon by Dr. Jones on the Doctrine of Development. We regret that we have not space to publish it in full, but the following excerpts reveal its scope and teaching.

John 16: 14—"He shall glorify me; for he shall take of mine and shall declare it unto you."

This is a great passage about the office and function of the Spirit. The Spirit has a work to do so far as the "world"—the hostile unbelieving world—is concerned. He is to convict it of sin and righteousness and judgment. When the Christian preacher proclaims his message, he is not the only person at work—the Spirit vindicates the truth of his message by using it for the conviction and conversion of the hearts of his hearers. The first preachers of the Gospel were blessedly conscious of the work of the Spirit in this regard. "My speech—my preaching," says St. Paul, speaking of his experiences among the Corinthians, "were not in persuasive words of wisdom but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

But the Spirit has not only a work to do in and upon "the world." He has also a great work to do for the disciples themselves. He has to take Christ's place, and continue Christ's work and lead them into Truth which, of necessity, Christ himself had to leave unrevealed. "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now," Jesus has said just above in v. 12. I do not think it is fanciful to detect a certain wistful regret, a certain tone of disappointment in that sentence. The twelve often tried the patience of their master by their slowness to believe. At best they were dull scholars. There were whole reaches of Truth into which Jesus would fain have introduced them which he had to leave unexplored. And the fault was not his but theirs. It was not that he was unwilling to impart; it was that they were unable to receive. The power of the teacher to give is always limited by the ability of the scholar to receive. Mr. Prejudice and his sixty deaf men were so completely in possession of the minds and hearts of the twelve that they were absolutely impervious to certain aspects of truth which he wished to convey to them. Bishop Westcott suggests that what was specially in Jesus' mind at this point was the meaning of the Passion. Again and again he had tried to speak of it. But the disciples would listen to no hint of dying. What they were dreaming about was not a cross but a throne. Christ would fain have talked to them about his cross, its meaning, its purpose, as he did after his resurrection to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus. But the disciples could not and would not listen. And now he had come to the eve of his dying and all the things he would like to have told them had to remain unsaid. "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." It would have been an added bitterness to the already bitter cup of our Lord if he had thought that the many things he had wished to say to his disciples would have to remain forever unsaid. But he comforted himself, as he comforted the disciples, with the promise of the coming of the Spirit. The Spirit would continue and complete his work; the Spirit would carry on his teaching. . . . The twelve were not to remain forever uninstructed, blinded, ignorant, and taught by the Spirit their career was to be one of growing enlightenment, of ever enlarging understanding of the truth, and especially of a clearer, richer, deeper apprehension of the person and work of Jesus Christ himself.

But the promise is not to be limited to the first disciples to whom it was originally given. The promise is for the Christian church of all time. To us as to the twelve the Spirit is given. His work today is the same as his work then. He takes of the things of Christ, reveals them unto us. For Christ is not even yet a Christ fully explored and exhaustively known. There are heights in him which we have not scaled, and depths in him which we have not fathomed, and breadths in him which we have not traversed. And the Spirit is ever leading us into a fuller apprehension of the truth as it is in Jesus, helping us to clearer views of his glory who is full of grace and truth. That is to say, the promise here given quite clearly contemplates and indeed foretells a certain growth and development in the understanding of Christian truth.

But while our Lord's word here contemplates growth and development, it also suggests the limits within which such growth and development must always proceed. It is an ever enlarging knowledge of Christ the Spirit gives. In him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead; in him are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden. What the Spirit does is to take of this infinite "treasure" and turn it into the current coin of our thought and worship. The Spirit does not, so to speak, invent new truth. He works ever within the sphere of Christ, and the result of his work is ever to make Christ more glorious, more wonderful, more divine. "He shall glorify me, for he shall take of mine and reveal it unto you."

So in the sentence of my text I find these three things, the fact of development, the limits of development and the results of development. I want to speak briefly upon each of these three points.

The Fact of Development

Here then, to begin with, we have the fact of development announced. "He shall take of mine and shall reveal it unto you." It was a promise originally to the eleven. And it was a promise gloriously fulfilled in their case, as their subsequent history abundantly proves. The disciples knew their Lord better after he had gone from them than they did while he was still with them. They understood his purposes better—the whole meaning of his mission to this world—after the cloud had received him out of their sight than they did while he walked with them the ways of Galilee. The merest glance at the New Testament is sufficient to convince us of this. A whole world of difference, for instance, separates the John who wanted to call down fire from heaven upon some discourteous Samaritans from the John who wrote the first epistle.

And with the growing understanding there went necessarily a recasting and a reshaping of the forms of their beliefs. "The kingdom" was perhaps the central theme of our Lord's speech in the Galilean days. To his disciples the term suggested an earthly, material, temporal empire—a glorified edition of Cæsar's. Nothing our Lord could say or do could penetrate through their Jewish prejudices. A kingdom of love won by sacrifice was not in all their thoughts. Whenever Jesus began to speak about death, they simply refused to listen. But the Spirit accomplished what Christ had to leave undone. There was a vast difference between the Peter who at the suggestion of death cried, "God forbid, this shall never be unto thee," and the Peter who could preach that it was through death God exalted Christ to be a Prince and a Saviour—not to establish a kingdom of earthly glory—but to give repentance and remission of sins and to found a great spiritual commonwealth in which the Gentiles also were fellow heirs. . . .

The promise of the guidance and illumination of the Spirit was not for the first disciples only. It was for all Christ's people and for all time. This is the service which the Spirit still renders. He is constantly leading men into a fuller understanding of that truth of which Christ is the perfect embodiment. Theology is not static, it is kinetic; it is never fixed and rigid and stationary, it is always growing and progressive. Development is an inevitable consequence of the presence and activity of the Spirit. Our God is a living and present God. He did not finish speaking to men nineteen centuries ago. I believe in the constant, unceasing revelation of the Spirit of God, the light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

Never a Last Word

In a sense, there can never be a "last word" spoken. It can never be asserted that at any particular stage we have reached finality in truth. Not until we see God face to face shall we know even as we have been known. In this world of time we know in part and we prophesy in part. But the partial, under the teaching of the Spirit, may continually be approximating toward the complete. That is why we Congregationalists have consistently refused to bind ourselves down to any written formulary or creed. Not that we have no fixed and definite beliefs of our own. The essential Christian Gospel is involved and imbedded in our ecclesiastical position. And not that we undervalue those ancient and historic formularies in which preceding generations have expressed their faith.

Those ancient creeds are invaluable as marking the stages in the Church's enlarging apprehension of Christian truth. But we do not believe that wisdom and spiritual discernment died with our fathers. . . . We are bound to believe with our great leader, John Robinson, that God has still more light and truth to break forth from his word, for the simple reason that we believe in the present-day guidance and inspiration of the Spirit of God. . . .

Take the central doctrine of the Atonement—which Bishop Westcott thinks was the particular matter Christ had in his mind when he first uttered these words—as an illustration. The cross is absolutely central to the gospel and without the cross there is no gospel left at all. The good news of the Christian faith centers in the proclamation that God in Christ and in the cross dealt seriously with sin and made an ethical forgiveness possible. Nothing is a gospel to a broken and sinful world which does not bring to it a promise of emancipation and release from sin and death. But while the cross is the very heart of the gospel and has been so all down the centuries, the doctrine of the Atonement—the intellectual statement of what was accomplished on the cross—has had a history, and its history has been one of ceaseless change and development. It meant one thing to Augustine and another thing to Anselm, and another thing to Grotius, and another thing to Calvin and our Puritan forefathers, and it means yet another thing to us today. I am not suggesting that the full truth is with any one view. All the views put together do not give us the full explanation of that mighty act in which the grace of God dealt and dealt finally with human sin. When we have looked at the cross from every standpoint, there is still

> "A deep below the deep,
> And a height beyond the height,
> And our hearing is not hearing,
> And our seeing is not sight."

But what I am suggesting is this: that old theories of the atonement are continually proving themselves inadequate in face of the ever enlarging understanding of Christ which the Spirit imparts to men. Or take our conceptions of God. Under the influence of John Calvin—that mighty and rigorous thinker—the dominant conception of God held by our fathers was that of Sovereign. I am not here to utter a single word in depreciation of the Calvinists; they were great men and they accomplished a mighty task, for they broke the back of tyranny and won freedom for our English-speaking world. Nor am I going to repudiate the doctrine of the Sovereignty. It stands for an abiding truth. It is the guarantee of order and purpose in the world's life. It was the great truth on which many of us steadied ourselves during the long agony of the war. But since John Calvin's day men have been sitting at the feet of Christ and learning of him. And the result is that we have come to realize that God must be expressed not in terms of bare Sovereignty but in terms of sovereign Fatherhood. The Spirit has been taking of the things of Christ and revealing them unto us.

GLIMPSE OF AFRICA AT INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL

Every article of our Christian creed, almost, would illustrate the same fact of development. We do not stand where our fathers did and we do not state our belief as they stated theirs. . . .

The Limit of Development

But my text not only announces the fact of development, but it also suggests the lines and limits within which that development will proceed. It was into a fuller understanding of Christ his Spirit would lead these first disciples. Christ was to be, so to speak, the text upon which the Spirit was to be the Commentator. Christ was to be at once the sphere and the limit of the Spirit's revelation. The Spirit was not a new authority giving an independent revelation of his own. He was Christ's interpreter. "He shall take of mine and reveal it unto you." It is within that same sphere the Spirit still works. What he reveals to men are truths which are all the while involved and implicit in the person and words and work of Jesus Christ Himself. . . .

The Spirit does not create new truth: he only unveils truth which has always dwelt in Christ, but which has more or less been hidden from us. Strictly speaking, it is a mistake to call a truth new. There is no such thing as new truth. Truth is as eternal as God. It can only be new in the sense of being new to us. . . . Our new conception of God as Father—was not that already "in Christ," was not that indeed the truth about God which he came specially to declare? Our new conception of the kingdom, our new sense of social obligation—was not that truth also in Christ? We may possibly overemphasize the social Gospel because of the neglect in which it has lain for so long. But at any rate it is implicit in the Sermon on the Mount, in the Great Commandments, in the parable of Dives and Lazarus. The marvel is not that we should have discovered it, but that preceding ages should have missed it so long. Our new ideas of the sweep and outreach of the love of God—were they not also in Christ—in the story of his visit to Sychar, in his dealings with the Syro-Phœnician woman, in the parables of the lost sheep—the lost son? The marvel is, not that the missionary enterprise should have started when it did; the marvel is that Christian purpose should for so long have remained indifferent to the needs of those "other sheep" which were out of their fold. These recent developments are not new truths—they are eternal truths newly discovered. . . . How shall we know whether some new view is a revelation of the Spirit or not? By bringing it to the test of the historic Christ. If it is a genuine revelation of the Spirit we shall find that it is already implicit in him. . . .

The Sole Test

Christianity is the historic faith which originates with Christ. It is the faith of which Christ himself is the sum and substance. It is the faith which proclaims Christ not simply as teacher and master, but as Saviour and Redeemer and Divine Lord. It is the faith whose mighty assertions present themselves to us, confirmed and ratified by the redeemed experience of innumerable thousands of God's saints. It is not within the competence of any man to invent a system of his own and then label it Christian. Every scheme that pretends to be Christian must prove itself to be "in Christ." It must demonstrate itself to be the legitimate development of Christ's teaching and the explication of his Person and work. And I take the liberty of saying that many of the schemes that propose themselves for our acceptance in these days, many of these systems which parade themselves as "new thought" and the rest of it—which minimize sin, if they do not wholly deny it, which hide the Cross, which detract from the sole Saviourhood of Christ, do not seem to me developments of Christianity at all. They are perversions and repudiations of it which reduce him to the limits of a mere man. But the knowledge of Christ which is Spirit-given ever enhances his glory. There are certain things which are spiritually discerned—the glory of Christ is one of them. To the man who is led and illumined by the Spirit, Christ becomes ever more wonderful, more glorious, more divine. In a sense, this becomes a second test of the truth of any new revelation that claims our allegiance—where does it place Christ? What does it do with Christ? Does it exalt him—enhance his glory?

No system that lessens or impairs the dignity of our Lord commends itself to me as a genuine Christian development, for the effect of all the Spirit's illumination and revelation is to glorify Christ. It is those who, led by the Spirit, have come to know him best, who adore him most. And that is the question I ask myself with reference to every new development—Where does it place Christ? What position does it give to him? Nothing is Christianity which has not him for foundation; nothing is Christianity which has not him at the center; nothing is Christianity which does not exalt him as Redeemer and Saviour; nothing is Christianity which does not give him a place absolutely supreme and unshared.

And that is my one concern about these churches of ours. In their unfettered freedom which allows them to follow the leadings of a Spirit, in their openness of mind which makes them hospitable to new truth, I glory. It enables us from age to age to restate our Gospel in terms of current thought and speech. That freedom of ours gives us our opportunity in these days of radical and far-reaching change. But you will let me add this word—it will be woe to us if in our eagerness to follow new lights, we minimize the place of Christ. Our liberty will be our doom if we only use it to let go the Head. So let us in these tremendous days hold fast the Head. And let our churches be known as churches which, though free, exalt and glorify and magnify Christ. A mighty Christ means a mighty Church. And it is a mighty Christ I find in this book—the first, the last, the Living One, who became dead but who is alive: who has the keys of death and hell: the Conqueror of sin and the grave: the mighty Redeemer who bore our sin in his own body on to the tree and who can save to the very uttermost. That is our Christ—confirmed as the picture is by all the mighty experiences of the Christian centuries! It is with that mighty Christ we face our stricken world! It is that mighty Christ we proclaim. Not a pathetic memory but a glorious presence! Not a martyr for truth, but a Redeemer from sin. Not the best of men, but the mighty God! Let us preach that Christ, exalted, glorious, divine. And power will come to us, triumph will come to us, for he, when he is lifted up, will draw all men unto himself.

Congregationalists Assembled from Afar

International Council Meetings in Boston

The Fourth International Congregational Council met in Mechanics Hall, Boston, June 29, and continued its sessions through the afternoon of July 6. It was the largest gathering of Congregationalists that has ever been held and was notable for the spirit of international brotherhood, moral earnestness and loyalty to Pilgrim ideals as applied to the life and problems of today.

The first day's sessions were reported in last week's issue of The Congregationalist; following are reports of the many sessions and special events of the Council period beginning with those of Wednesday, June 30.

POLITY

In the arrangement of the general program the morning sessions were largely devoted to subjects upon which ten double commissions, English and American, had been conducting surveys, such as polity, education, unity, etc., and whose findings were embodied in a series of advance reports. These reports were not read in the meetings, but their authors still fondly cherish the hope that they had been or will be read by the delegates. Each commission, however, had twenty-five minutes for a subsidiary or explanatory or collateral address, and in some cases other addresses followed on kindred subjects. These meetings were held two days in Mechanics Hall, but after various experiments with the acoustics of the hall and the number of listening and of hearing ears, the morning sessions were on Friday transferred to the Old South Church which proved to be just about the right size for those meetings.

When the first morning session opened, the seated delegates looked lonesome in the big hall, but the audience steadily grew to such proportions that when a considerable fraction decided to leave just before the final number on the program, Moderator Barton had need of all three of his presentation gavels to secure quiet. The keynote of the morning was polity, in both its spiritual and practical applications. It was given to Scotland to open the day with a scholarly address on "The Spiritual Import of Congregationalism," by Rev. W. L. Walker of Garelochhead. A free church, he said, is specially indebted to the guidance of the Spirit. The spiritual mind goes out from self to help others. Fellowship is a factor of our polity, the raison d'être of any church. Another implication is simplicity of worship, and the making of church services only the prelude to a week of worship in the daily life.

"The Recovery of the Spiritual Principle of the Church as a Condition of Spiritual Revival" was discussed by Rev. Thomas Yates of London, a pulpit orator with typical British charm. A new form of life is the main thing in religion, he said, and polity is but the method of its working out. The church is not a law nor a creed but an experience. It is gathered not within walls but round an allegiance, not for defense but a phalanx for fighting evil.

The genesis and evolution of our polity were discussed historically by Rev. Albert Peel of Blackburn, England, and Dr. William E. Barton of Oak Park, Ill. Dr. Peel charged the early Separatists with failing for the most part to discern that the church is not static but dynamic. Our churches to be powerful must be small, he contended, not a club nor a preaching station, but a communion of saints, a fellowship, not a procession, where the members know each other and are united for their peculiar work.

Dr. Barton reviewed the three centuries briefly as touching organization. Congregationalists have always been satisfied with other people's credal statements "for substance of doctrines," but they would work out their polity with a view to their own changing needs. There seemed at first more politics and prohibition than polity in this breeze from Lake Michigan, which was also enjoyable and pardonable in view of the very recent Chicago convention. Dr. Barton also paid his respects to Roger Williams and his protesting commonwealth down the centuries, too often in opposition to the majority, pushing independence to the limit of obstinacy.

WOMEN AND PRESENT-DAY NEEDS

Pres. Mary E. Woolley received a splendid ovation when she rose to speak on "Women and Present-Day Needs." Her message was to the grand-daughters of the Pilgrim mothers, and she drove it home in well-chosen words. Ignorance and indifference have too often been characteristic of women. Integrity and idealism are qualities shared by the women of 1620 with the men, and in 1920 women and men should still be sharing them. Woman's influence under the driving power of a great ideal is beyond computation. "America first" must read "America first in world service." A majority of our women, she asserted, believe this in favor of a League of Nations.

Last on the program of the morning was the presentation of diplomas for the correspondence course in Pilgrim Ideals and History as offered in the Tercentenary program. They were presented by Rev. E. H. Byington of Boston, who claimed President Woolley's address as their baccalaureate sermon. A special prize was awarded to the German church of Fitchburg, Mass., more than a third of whose members had completed the course. Mr. Byington presented only one diploma individually, singling out Miss Margaret Pierce who had come from California for her diploma.

THE COUNCIL SERMON

To secure a churchly setting for the sermon and sacrament, the Council transferred its Wednesday evening session to Tremont Temple where all the sessions of 1899 were held. Nearly 3,000 were gathered for this service and it was one of the high points of the week. Dr. J. D. Jones of Bournemouth, in the foremost rank of England's Congregationalists, was fitly chosen as the preacher. He read his own Scripture lesson and prayed as well as preached. The sermon in substance is printed elsewhere in this paper. It was "different" from an American sermon, exegetical and expository rather than topical, quiet and simple, but holding the throng as the preacher made them sit in heavenly places with Christ Jesus. From the text in John 16:14, Dr. Jones drew the fact, limits and result of development under the instruction of the Holy Spirit. The result, to bring further honor and glory to Christ, was well exemplified in the preacher's own work that night. He exalted the Christ and preached him as he exhorted others to do.

The sacramental service following was most impressive. Dr. Oscar E. Maurer of New Haven and Dr. R. F. Horton of London were in charge and were assisted by Rev. E. G. Guthrie of Boston and Rev. Maldwyn Johnes of Sandown, Isle of Wight. Eighteen local deacons distributed the elements to those on the floor, and the hundreds of worshipers in the galleries were served by other groups of deacons. The chorus choir added by its sympathetic work to the high spiritual level of the evening worship; and men and women went down the stairs to the street as the disciples must have gone down from the Mount of Transfiguration.

Theology

Thursday was the day for theology. Prof. J. W. Buckham of California and Prof. Robert Mackintosh of England discussed the present trend and duty of Congregationalism in the field of religious thought and Prin. A. E. Garvie of London followed with a vigorous address on the vital issues, or, as he phrased it, the vital issue, in present day theology. Dr. Buckham's paper was literally sweetness wasted on the desert air. A scholarly, irenic and progressive review of American theology in its history and valuation failed to reach the waiting audience beyond the speaker's immediate vicinity. He mediated between old and new theology by means of a revised terminology, such as the substitution of "Providence" for "sovereignty." New England theology did not collapse, he said; the superstructure fell but on the abiding foundations on which the architects of the new theology built their Christocentric system. Religion cannot be saved by emotion or pragmatism without theology, but we are steadily nearing the mind of Christ and the eternal verities.

Professor Mackintosh pictured British Congregationalism as stronger in Christian life than in Christian thought. He dealt largely with the commission's report. He declared that it is impossible for a state to maintain religious neutrality. The church should be the inspiration of statesmen and thus be a factor in the conduct of public affairs.

A prosperous looking business man was seated by the Moderator, but at the call for Principal Garvie, head of a theological school, behold, this man arose and lifted up his voice and was heard gladly. There is but one vital issue in theology, he said; it is the question, Where sin abounds shall grace much more abound? Why did God allow the war? Because there are moral limits to omnipotence. Immanuel is God's name, a real God near us, a fellow sufferer, exhibiting the sovereignty of Saviourhood. Salvation can come only through suffering, and Gethsemane and Calvary were real experiences for God.

After an interlude in theology in order to hear Lieutenant-Governor Cox, the question of making theology real was handled by Dr. Carl S. Patton in a typical Patton address, breezy, sparkling, mirth provoking, yet driving his points home seriously and effectively. He pictured the fog, haze, illusion, unreality about religion in the pulpit and the pew, and the feeling many have that religion is something "put over" on them. A good deal of our religion is as remote as a rainbow with one end resting in Palestine and the other in heaven. Make men think about religion; we have every kind of religious thought except just thought itself. Speak of religion in everyday language and be honest about it, saying what one really believes.

Governor Coolidge was scheduled for an address but a national issue detained him in Washington, much to the regret of all, for they wanted to see and hear this ruler of Pilgrim uprightness from more motives than mere curiosity. The lieutenant-governor was drafted as his substitute and in a ringing speech voiced the greetings of the commonwealth, extolled the Pilgrim spirit in life and religion and exhorted us to preserve the priceless heritage of the fathers and transmit it unblemished to our descendants.

Liberty and Education

Civics and education were the general topics discussed Friday morning at the Old South Church. Rev. A. D. Leavitt of Brookline and Dr. E. Griffith-Jones of Bradford, England, discussed the contribution of Congregationalism to civil and religious liberty. Here in America, said Dr. Leavitt, the most significant contribution was made at the very beginning, through the Pilgrims. The passion for liberty is a spiritual passion, an unconscious reach toward God. Religion is under obligation to guide such a passion, to direct the energies of mankind to spiritual vision. The church, like the empire, was afraid of democracy in the old days; hence, for example, the excesses of the French Revolution. The positive way in which the Pilgrims interpreted liberty is a challenge to us.

International Council Jottings

"Interdependence Day" began to be heard during the Fourth of July sessions.

This nugget from Dr. Francis E. Clark is worth remembering: "It is ten times better to set ten men at work than to do the work of ten men."

One thing is certain—the Council has distinctly broadened the region of mutual understanding among a great company of leaders of the English-speaking races.

Assoc. Sec. D. Brewer Eddy of the American Board, in extending the courtesies of the City Club to some sixty of the British delegates, added materially to the pleasure of our brothers from overseas.

The senior delegate of the Council was probably Dr. H. A. Miner of Madison, Wis., who, in his ninety-second year, enjoyed the sessions, including the Plymouth excursion, with the enthusiasm of a boy.

Dr. Griffith-Jones echoed Dr. Leavitt's words about the harder task of those who stayed in England in the seventeenth century, Cromwell the most conspicuous of those who elected to continue the struggle at home. He contrasted the theories of Rousseau and Paul, of man in chains and man enjoying liberty where the Spirit of the Lord is. The present task of the church is to preach not the rights but the duties of democracy. For himself he prefers the British system of fostering colonies in their development to that of the continent where each new little political unit is an unhappy waif in an unfriendly world.

Rev. A. C. Hill of Glasgow by his animated delivery gave a vigorous exhibition of Congregationalism in action, as he spoke of continuing the fight for freedom. Not the outward emancipation wrought by Lincoln, but the inner freedom which Booker Washington began to confer on his pupils and people, was the text of Mr. Hill's address. Freedom is inner or not at all. The abysmal ignorance of the world's democracies is the greatest modern peril. We ought to recognize a special spiritual ordination of teachers to fight this peril. Evil is organized; virtue must be organized in opposition. The individual tyrant never dies; he but changes his garment and his form.

Congregationalism in Education was the subject of addresses by Rev. A. J. Viner of England and President Cowling of Carleton College. Mr. Viner is chairman-elect of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. Six of his predecessors in that premiership of British nonconformity were also Council speakers. He reviewed the British educational system and the work of a century in getting three ideals embodied in the national system: That education is a natural right; that the state must provide it; and that it should be national in character. In America the melting pot is for the fusing of the races; in England the school is the melting pot for classes and masses.

President Cowling limited his theme to our leadership in the college field. The American college is our contribution to the world's education. The early colleges had an amazing influence. Three secrets of their strength were first, that they evoked idealism in their students, inspiring them not as money-makers but as leaders of human efficiency; they conferred the personal touch through men of vision and character; and they laid emphasis on the moral and religious life. In this day of the ascendancy of the state university, religious colleges must co-operate and concentrate.

International Obligations

There was hardly a session when international issues were not more or less in evidence; indeed it could hardly be otherwise. This paragraph is concerning the Friday evening mass meeting in Mechanics Hall when an English missionary secretary and an American ex-senator discussed the set topic of "Our International Obligations." Dr. W. Nelson Bitton, home secretary of the London Missionary Society, gave the churchman's view. The Christian is a cosmopolite. Exiles like Abraham and Brewster are not mere emigrants. The Christian position, higher than diplomacy, deals with moral issues. White leadership in the world may yield to color. Rome may yield religious hegemony to Pekin. We must have a constructive program for the world's need; cultivate in young people an international mind and sympathy, suppressing the habit of speaking slightingly of other races and nations; and our pulpits must be emphatic in the interests of good will. Dr. Bitton scored happily at the close with an apt quotation from the Declaration of Independence.

Hon. T. E. Burton of Ohio exemplified the best type of United States Senator, though he has had his day and ceased to be one for the present. He reviewed the national ideals in foreign affairs and our evolution to a broader outlook. His British hearers relaxed their tension when he got to the evolution part of it! Our present responsibilities are first to set our own house in order, with new ideals of service and sacrifice; a quickened sense of civic duty, more regard for law and order, and a zeal for peace and arbitration. Mr. Burton believes in a League of Nations with a court and with executive authority. He believes in reservations to the Treaty, especially in safeguarding explicitly congressional rights in Article X. The Monroe Doctrine is practically obsolete, the more so if the League adopts its principle for the whole world. And especially, said Mr. Burton, should we hold out a helping hand to weak nations.

Christian Unity

Saturday morning was devoted to Christian Unity, including fraternal greetings at the close. The commission report for America was presented by Rev. W. L. Sperry of Boston, chairman. There is no perfect unity within any denomination; each embraces many types, and union of churches may eventually come by cleavage and readjustment on new lines. Sectarianism is to be condemned but there is a better side to the shield of denominationalism. We can serve the longer, larger work better now by maintaining our position for democracy.

Rev. J. G. McKenzie of Wolverhampton was not on the English commission, so he felt privileged to begin with a critique of the report. Every church has something to contribute to and receive from the Holy Catholic Church. Unity is a matter not of good will but of principles. It cannot be patched up but must grow up. The Church is big enough to hold episcopacy, but episcopacy is not big enough to hold the Congregational Church. Conferences often reveal more differences than they banish. We should remove the freezing atmosphere of isolation among Congregational churches, unifying the denomination; then all the churches should make a collective impact on society.

Rev. K. L. Parry of England discussed the movement toward unity from an academic point of view. The highest argument is that it is inspired by the Holy Spirit. Thus it exalts Christ and makes for a wider unity of all life and thought. What we want is not a uniform church but a religion that unifies life.

Another Wolverhampton pastor, Rev. A. R. Henderson, massive in physique, broad in outlook, discussed the psychology of Congregationalism, the mental processes and the intellectual results of the Pilgrim movement. It began with a rediscovery of the New Testament church, with freedom in the church to obey the laws of Christ. It embraces a positive doctrine and a vivid personal experience. It stands for the spiritual equality of men and is the pioneer of religious toleration. It early showed a tendency to excessive individualism, overlooking Christ's headship of the whole race, and it has often failed to live up to the freedom which is our glory.

Unitarian Greetings

A cordial reception was given Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, president of the American Unitarian Association, when he brought the greetings of the Unitarian churches. Notable son of a notable father, he made a fine impression on his hearers. Men cannot think without dissent, he said, but they ought to without prejudice; and he brought out in sharp contrast the conflicting motives of keeping up with the times and keeping in touch with the Infinite. Speaking of the two wings of Congregationalism he intimated that a bird needs two wings, balanced, whose function is to lift their owner nearer heaven. Some of his hearers must have had to revise their opinions of Unitarians after this inspiring contact with Dr. Eliot.

Fraternal greetings were also brought by Dr. William I. Haven from the Federal Council embracing thirty denominations, our own of course among them. He pictured denominationalism stronger than ever in growth and loyalty, with the need of co-operation and fellowship for the world's need. He sketched the work of various commissions of the Federal Council, mentioning especially war work and new relations with the Protestant churches of Europe. So ended a whole forenoon of unity in theory or practice, and when the benediction was pronounced the delegates were disunited for twenty-seven hours, save for voluntary associations in minor pilgrimages in the rain on Saturday afternoon.

Part of Council Audience at Plymouth Rock

On Cole's Hill just above the Rock

The War Memorial Service

A great meeting of the Council and one of the most impressive was the Memorial Service for the men who gave their lives in the Great War, which was held in Mechanics Hall Sunday afternoon, July 4.

A large audience was present and the big musical feature of the Council was presented. The Commemorative Ode, "A.D. 1919," by Brian Hooker, music by Horatio Parker, first rendered at Yale Commencement last year, was sung by the International Council choir, assisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Laura Littlefield, soprano, with A. Vincent Bennett, director. It was a strong, fine presentation of appreciation for service and sacrifice in a rich musical setting and all rendered with artistic feeling and effectiveness.

Two brilliant and inspiring addresses were given by Dr. Sidney M. Berry of Birmingham, England, and Dr. Nehemiah Boynton of Brooklyn, N. Y. Dr. Berry referred to the common language and ideals of liberty possessed by America and the British people, and said that our dead who died in the Great War stretch out unseen hands to unite us. As we are faithful to them in the years to come we shall pursue a common road. During the war we set forth our aim to end war through that struggle. Now a purpose of the churches should be to make that propaganda of war the program of peace. Our task is to help to rebuild civilization in a better, safer way. Our two nations should have a new Independence Day with the purpose of freedom from war and the things of war.

Dr. Boynton said that the spirit of kinship and likeness is one of the discoveries of our time. Three hundred years ago among our Pilgrim Fathers no principles of separation could compare with the principles of likeness. But we have accentuated the idea of independence so that it has obscured the great idea of interdependence. The principle of likeness is greater and more lasting than that of difference. We Americans should not attempt to settle the domestic problems of Great Britain. One of our great perils is thinking too much of self-regarding motives. As we think of the pleading hands of those in distress across the sea our Christian faith should exalt the principle of service in which one would lose one's life if need be to save the world. The word from the brave who gave their lives for our cause overseas is that we must honor ourselves in our sacrifices as common sons and daughters of Almighty God. They say to us:

"If you break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep who lie in Flanders field."

World Brotherhood

Quite naturally Sunday night witnessed the largest assembly of the week, several thousand being in attendance. Moderator Barton yielded the chair to the senior British vice-moderator, Sir Arthur Haworth, who made a delightful Fourth of July speech on taking the chair, in the course of which he traced the relations of England and the United States since 1776, with their increasing good feeling since 1865. United in heart but independent in machinery, he said, we are going forward for the betterment of the world.

A telegram from President Wilson was read: "Please convey to the members of the Council my utmost cordial personal greetings and an expression of my profound interest in the important objects for which they are met."

A cablegram from H. H. Asquith also elicited a round of applause but less vigorous than the President received. Mr. Asquith said: "Please convey to the International Congregational Council assembled in Boston my cordial good wishes for the successful celebration of the Mayflower Tercentenary."

Three disappointments were associated with the program. Sir Auckland Geddes sent word of his inability to leave Washington. Dr. J. L. Barton's name on the program by mistake raised hopes that were unfulfilled, and Sir Robert Falconer chose to treat his topic in historic and academic fashion rather than touching upon current applications of it. He made a scratch hit when the bleachers were looking for a home run.

Pres. H. C. King of Oberlin, Moderator of our National Council, made the first of the two addresses on Christianity and the Nations. He professed himself greatly dissatisfied with the results of the war up to date, and loud applause registered a similar frame of mind in the pews. He reviewed America's present task in the light of great perils and great values of the present time. Among the perils he noted that the very tissue of civilization is suffering from disease. Yet worse is the danger that men shall suffer breakdown of faith in one another. Counterbalancing these he listed as assets the high idealism with which America entered the war, a deepening conviction of the supremacy of intangible values, co-operation on a great scale for a great cause in war, and why not in peace, the unexampled extent of the spirit of sacrifice, and a new sense of the greatness of the common man. We must go on to a greater democracy than the world has yet known.

Another college president followed Dr. King, Sir Robert Falconer, K. C. M., of Toronto University, on "Patriotism and Internationalism." In the seventeenth century internationalism was an impossible ideal, but Calvinists went on and created a new democracy and a prosperous one, and so prepared the way for broader ideas. At some length Sir Robert repudiated the idea that patriotism and internationalism are incompatible, with Jesus, Paul and Milton as leading examples. Grotius began the idea of internationalism, and today, whether one likes it or not, the world is one. The strongest hope of internationalism is in Christian missions.

The Social Order

A legal holiday and blue Monday conspired to keep attendance small on Monday forenoon. By afternoon the sectional meetings had gripped the delegates again. "Congregationalism and the Social Order" was the topic which persisted in various phases for over three hours. Our social secretary, Rev. Arthur E. Holt, led off with the question whether we can anticipate and absorb the impending revolution. The church which does not keep the moral issue where it can be solved by peaceful methods has failed of its great opportunity. Factory production has created a new frontier on which Protestantism must mobilize its forces. Early Protestantism here grew like the streets of Boston, haphazard. We must build henceforth not by competitive drift but by co-operative intention. We have become a nation ruled by a high-powered propaganda. We need to build a social order which challenges the best in all of us.

Rev. W. Blackshaw of London continued the discussion, declaring it dangerous for the pulpit to dogmatize on things of which it is ignorant, lest its voice as an expert at other times be scouted. He gave particular attention to certain phases of English life, the family, including divorce and birthrate problems, class distinctions, and the state. An effective quotation was from Colonel Roosevelt's Romanes lecture that dealings between states should be on the same high level as between gentlemen. In 1770, Burke prophesied the doom of democracy, but history has falsified his predictions.

Rev. J. A. Patten of Ipswich, England, four years at the front as chaplain, declared the war had revealed wide discontent of the men in the trenches with present social conditions and a skepticism as to the power of the Church to grapple with them, lacking reality, love and life. The contribution of the Church to social upbuilding should be to produce leaders in civic life and be a training ground for citizenship of a high order; to preach the social gospel more insistently, inculcating its principles; and to exalt democracy, the genius of our church.

Said in the Council

By President King, I see no greater peril than the breakdown of men's faith in one another.

By Rev. S. M. Berry, There is only one memorial which our churches can raise and that is a museum for war.

By Sir Robert Falconer, It is the faith of the Pilgrims that produces tough Puritanism and sinewy internationalism.

By Sir Arthur Haworth, We are now going forward united in heart but independent in machinery for the betterment of the world.

Temperance

"Present Features of the Temperance Crusade" was the topic which fitly closed the forenoon speaking. Rev. Howard H. Russell put at least a twenty-minute speech, perhaps twenty-five, into his quarter of an hour. He hitched his movie machine to a star and the word pictures of the temperance situation in many lands were run off at planetary speed. Will America make good and stand firm? Not a doubt of it. Conscience and business economy are the sturdy pillars upholding the prohibition arch. The Carnegie institute after long scientific research has announced that alcohol is not a stimulant but a depressant.

In the absence of Sir R. Murray Hyslop, his paper on English conditions was read by Rev. W. J. Wray, English secretary of social service, who added comments of his own sufficient to create a desire to hear him at greater length. The paper pictured war-time conditions when for national efficiency in speeding up munitions the government gradually reduced saloon hours, limited the sale of the strongest drinks and opened canteens to supply food and soft drinks as counter attractions to liquor.

Rev. E. D. Silcox of Toronto, editor of the Canadian Congregationalist, sketched temperance progress in the Dominion, where provincial and federal authority are divided as in the United States. The crusade goes on triumphantly in spite of hindrances. Where prohibition has gained a foothold, higher education has had an instant boom. Canadians are concerned not by what manner of life the traffic may live, but by what manner of death it may die. They want to shoot, not chain, the tiger.

A Moral Challenge

Another large attendance was registered Monday night with Miss Jane Addams of Chicago and Dr. S. P. Cadman of Brooklyn as attractions. Dr. Cadman did not appear and Mrs. Cadman's message of explanation sent Sunday night of his broken arm while on the way, was not delivered, owing to the holiday, until Tuesday forenoon. On the spur of the moment Dr. James L. Barton was drafted to supplement Miss Addams by telling what he had seen of childhood's needs as leader of the Near East relief expedition. The meeting was in charge of Vice-Moderator Frank Kimball of Chicago, and in place of a choral number Prof. H. A. Smith led the assembly in extended congregational singing of hymns appropriate for the day. He did not ask the people to try to sing "The Star-spangled Banner." Professor Smith was just leaving for Japan, for the Sunday School Convention, and was given a hearty Godspeed and a vote of appreciation for his leadership of all the Council music.

Miss Addams pitched her voice to the needs of the big auditorium and spoke most effectively upon "The World Food Situation, a Moral Challenge." She began with pictures of what she had seen of hungry children all over Europe as a background for her argument. There are millions of them underfed and breaking down. If the hope of Europe is in the coming generation it is a forlorn hope unless help comes speedily. The difficulty seems to be the inability of nations to function as co-operatively in peace as in war. Yet the present situation carries almost as serious a challenge as anything in the last six years. If only the League of Nations might assume control and approach the problem from a human and moral viewpoint, not a political one, there would soon be relief in sight. America has a further interest than merely ministering to these little ones in Europe. A great opportunity exists to strengthen ties of friendship with the alien populations in this country by our service to their brethren and kinsfolk in the homelands. It would do much to allay discontent in the foreign quarters of our great cities and lead to a much better mutual understanding.

Dr. Barton not only added his testimony about the Near East but went on into a ringing speech of a Christian statesman. Christianity demands more of a nation than that it shall save itself. If a humanitarian interest in the misery of the world and an effort to relieve it be politics, the Lord grant that the Church go into politics. Danger? Of course; but why should the Church practice prudence more than its Master? Christian law applies to nations as surely as to individuals.

League of Nations Resolution

The challenge of the speakers was not in vain. The American delegates were asked to remain after the benediction, and with Moderator King of the National Council presiding the following resolution was unanimously adopted without any desire for debate:

Resolved, that the American delegates to the International Congregational Council representing every section of the country respectfully ask the nominees of the Republican party, the Hon. Warren G. Harding and the Hon. Calvin Coolidge, and the nominees of the Democratic party, the Hon. James M. Cox and the Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, to make a public statement at the earliest possible moment that if elected they will make every effort in conjunction with the Senate to have the United States enter the League of Nations in order that America may assume its full share of the responsibility of promoting international justice and preserving international peace.

This resolution is not intended to preclude the adoption of such interpretative reservations as may be deemed essential to safeguard the life and independence of America without nullifying our loyal adherence to the objective of the League.

Resolved, that a committee be appointed to present this resolution, consisting of Henry Churchill King, chairman, Moderator of the National Council; James L. Barton, president of the International Congregational Council; and the living ex-Moderators of the National Council, T. C. McMillan, Nehemiah Boynton, Henry M. Beardsley, Charles R. Brown, William Horace Day, this committee to stand during the campaign and to have power to add to its numbers.

Missionary Day

Tuesday was largely missionary day, with the young people's work sharing the morning session. The commissions on Congregationalism and Missions reported first through Dr. Frank K. Sanders of New York and Rev. E. W. Franks of London. Dr. Sanders traced the missionary interest in this country from John Eliot down to the present in three eras, a short two centuries to 1810, a century to 1910, and the last decade. He reviewed briefly our organizations and named half a dozen tasks in our program: a comprehensive plan for saving America, not only self-protection but aggressive work, a co-operative program, a broad co-operative campaign, recruiting and training leaders, and going the limit in recognizing independence of thought and action in mission fields. He appealed for broad vision, a fresh baptism of power and a pledge of heroic service.

Mr. Franks traced the story of the London Missionary Society, 125 years old, for future inspiration. History, he quoted, is an excellent cordial for drooping spirits. He paid an eloquent tribute to the three great English leaders whose faces looked down from the gallery wall in Mechanics Hall, Thompson, Fairbairn and Horne, all passed on since the last Council, in their relation to the missionary enterprise, and he stressed the keynote of pioneer evangelism through education, medical and social service. Christianity can lead the world because it has a living Leader.

Following them came Dr. C. E. Jefferson of New York speaking on "The Broad Horizon of the Missionary Enterprise." He led his hearers to the highest viewpoints for the broadest outlooks, to see the work steadily and see it whole, and to feel one's self a part of the whole. The human mind is international and the Christian mind is only more intensely so. We have pushed geographical horizons to their limit, now we deal with mental horizons. The old idea of preparing souls to die has yielded to the effort to fit them to live. The school, hospital and workshop are necessary developments of missionary work beyond the mere gospel proclamation. New ideas are forever fomenting and creating problems and larger horizons.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S WORK

Congregationalism and the New Generation of Pilgrims received attention from Rev. W. Charter Piggott of London and Rev. E. B. Allen of Illinois, for the commissions on young people's work. Mr. Piggott urged the placing of church offices and responsibility upon young people at an earlier age, letting them learn by practice. Their very mistakes may be more profitable than much of our inspired dullness. We should co-ordinate their work with the church, not patronize it. We should find a finer statement of our faith to win them, teaching the Bible in its newer light and putting the great compelling spell of Jesus Christ upon them. We have been too easy and afraid of our cross. Challenge them with a great Christ. Ernest Allen, well named, asked if Plymouth Rock were a stepping-stone or a terminal station. We must practice what Benjamin Kidd has called projected efficiency. Five tasks face us in teaching our young people: to put war on the scrap heap where it finally belongs; to extend the conquering spirit of internationalism; to train them to carry on the missionary enterprise; to create a new social order, Christian to the core; and to exalt the sovereignty of God with gratitude to him for partnership in his work.

An ovation was accorded "Father Endeavor" Clark who spoke on "Training Young People for Service." We must let them work out their education with fear and trembling while God and the Church are working with them. Elders must trust and believe in their juniors. Put up the challenge of Christ to them. Amusement solely for amusement is out of place in a church program. They should be trained for service, fellowship, leadership, and this last can only be learned by practice.

NEW CONSTITUTION

Before adjournment a revised phrasing of the Constitution of the Council was submitted and adopted. It is only a trifle altered from the previous document, being a fuller statement with minor changes such as the number of assistant moderators and secretaries. Some passing debate was had on the point of holding the meetings oftener than every ten years, but the English desire on that point for a ten-year period, as soon as understood, was supported with hardly a dissenting voice.

Missionary Messages

Dr. Herring acted as master of ceremonies for the first hour Tuesday afternoon, introducing half a dozen speakers from different lands, who naturally had brief time to talk before their initial bow and the sound of the inexorable buzzer. Japan was represented by Rev. Akira Ebizawa who spoke for 28,000 Congregationalists there. They are carrying on foreign work themselves. Rev. H. A. Stick had a large subject in the continent of Africa. In a sentence or two he spoke an introduction to a product of mission work there, a Columbia University student, Mr. Columbus Kamba Simango, who with seventeen other boys left home fourteen years ago, traveling 225 miles to Mt. Silinda and training there for service. He made an earnest plea for three families to start a mission where Rev. C. H. Maxwell fell in 1917 at the outset of his service.

Hon. W. F. Frear of Hawaii told the rise and progress of the Hawaiian mission, two centuries younger than New England Congregationalism. The cost of a million dollars has been repaid indirectly many times. "The life of the land is perpetuated by righteousness," has since been the motto of the islands. Miss Charlotte De Forest of Japan, daughter of an honored missionary home, brought another message from the island empire from the white point of view. There is a widespread demand not only for education but for Christian education beyond the ability of our missionaries to afford. With only one Pacific cable, one end in Japan, not all Japanese news published here needs to be accepted implicitly.

Rev. Frank C. Laubach of our Philippine Mission spoke of Mindanao, the Ireland of the Philippines. He wants an American mandate for Armenia in order that a favorable approach to Moslems of Mindanao may be opened. American rule in the islands is commending American religion there. We must Christianize the Moros, and we can. The Moro admires Americans. Help him to our religion. China found an able spokesman in Anson T. Wong who issued a challenge to the Christian world to Christianize that mighty country. China needs inspiration more than material help. Are we satisfied with results there? What we should contribute most is strong leaders who can train Chinese leaders.

Dr. Herring then called on Rev. George Barrett, a director of the London Missionary Society, to represent the rest of the world. He declared that missionaries are the real statesmen of the world, and ended with the greetings of his society.

"Urgent Aspects of the World Tasks" was the subject of an able address by Dr. R. F. Horton of London. His world vision was based on the last words of Edith Cavell, "I have learned that patriotism is not enough." After a student volunteer convention in Kansas City he formed the opinion that America is the mandatory of the missionary work of the world. The war did not cripple missions as was feared, and instances of growth were cited, in Madagascar and the Syrian Church of India. But the financial problem is difficult because of the unfavorable rate of exchange. The Council becomes a success if the 3,000 delegates and all our brethren become one force of Pilgrim missionaries for saving the world. In beauty of imagery Dr. Horton proved himself a prince of speakers.

"The Motive and Message of the Modern Missionary" was handled strongly by Rev. W. C. Willoughby of South Africa. Today the missionary must approach pagans in sympathetic spirit, finding common ground and building on what they have of religious instinct. Savage worship is like a child's affection for her rag doll, the outcropping of an instinct that in time will rise to higher things. With wonderful tenderness Dr. Willoughby elaborated this thought in the teaching of that instinct the greater truth of God.

An afternoon of great addresses was yet further enriched by Dean Charles R. Brown of Yale speaking on "The Path Ahead." We need, like the Pilgrim, a sense of God. Science has made the world a neighborhood but not a brotherhood. We need to feel the presence of God in every aspect of life. We need also the Pilgrim belief in the final significance of the regenerate man, exhibited in sound judgment and renewed personal character. Dr. Brown scored heavily the promoters of great movements like Men and Religion, and the Interchurch; the results are not commensurate with the moral cost. If every man had all he earned and none had more, there would be no industrial problem. We have wealth enough but not character and social justice enough to save the world. The glamour of the big thing and the psychology of the mob have sometimes dimmed our vision of the real forces in life.

CLOSING BUSINESS

Sir Arthur Haworth eloquently voiced the gratitude of the foreign delegates for all the arrangements for their comfort and enjoyment, and made mention of the efficiency and modesty of Moderator Barton as a model presiding officer, a sentiment which every delegate would echo with emphasis.

Dr. Williston Walker read the epitome of the "Address to World Wide Congregationalism," the full text of which had been presented on Monday, and it was adopted. Resolutions of greeting to President Wilson, Premiers Lloyd George, Borden and Hughes, and Mr. Asquith were adopted, also one to the Lambeth Conference and a commendation of simultaneous schedules in Christian nurture according to the Christian year.

After a hymn, and prayer by Dr. Horton, the Council came to an end at 5 o'clock. There was no anti-climax either in attendance or in quality. The church was crowded to the end and the good wine at the end of the feast was the best of the whole vintage.

Congregational Convictions

The representatives of the Congregational churches composing the International Council, adopted an address to the world-wide fellowship of churches represented by them, emphasizing the following points:

They called attention to the conviction of the reality of God which dominated the Pilgrims of three centuries ago. His was a lordship before which any merely earthly lordship, whether in church or state, sank into insignificance. With this conception of God was bound up the thought of individual responsibility, for those pioneers of New England viewed their relation as making them fellow laborers together with God, and out of this flowed their democracy, their sense of the duty and responsibility of the individual in church and state alike, and his right of participation in all that makes for a common welfare. The Council would emphasize this thought of God as regnant over all human life and as revealed to us in the life and teaching of Jesus Christ. This emphasis points the way to the solution of personal problems and those which underlie commercial, industrial and political life.

Out of the confusion of the world war there emerges the conception of certain great fundamental possibilities of a better world. The Council emphasizes the possibility of a more Christian relation of nation with nation, and to that end commends the establishment of a world court as is now planned by the Commission under the League of Nations.

The Council furthermore expresses its earnest hope that the idea of a League of Nations may not fail for the lack of the support of the nation, which, more than any other, gave to the world the conception of such a League, and urges the adoption of the Covenant of the League of Nations either as now proposed, or as it shall be adopted by reservations agreed upon by the President and Senate of the United States, and accepted by the other Powers.

The Council urges the duty of all Powers receiving protectorates over weaker nations to exercise such control in the real interests of these communities, and prays that the League of Nations may be empowered to see that these protectorates are so administered.

The Council indorses the historic contention of our churches in regard to freedom of thought and of speech on all matters vital to a nation's life, and deplores any tendencies to depart from these principles.

The Council expresses its satisfaction that suffrage has been so nearly achieved for women in all English-speaking lands.

The Council urges labor for the betterment of the relation between man and man, and believes that the solution of the present conflicts between labor and capital may be sought in the application to each party of a common rule, not of self-seeking struggle for the utmost that either can obtain for itself, but of joint contribution to the common good. It commends those constructive efforts which are being made to secure to labor, as well as to capital, effective shares in industry and in the determination of wages and conditions of life, that a more Christian industrial order in which the rights of all elements receive their just value, may be wrought out.

The Council emphasizes the desirability of closer relations between the churches which own the common lordship of Christ; that increased unity is necessary to the fullest witness of the Church for Christ and his Gospel, and the Council therefore urges co-operation in any wisely planned efforts for federation or union of the now divided forces of Christianity.

Finally, the Council recommends to every Congregationalist participation as he has opportunity in securing legislation as shall contribute to justice, clean living, and helpful relations between man and man; the securing of an intelligent public opinion, based on discussion and education, and above all, the imperative need of the proclamation of the Christian message throughout the world.

Resolutions

Time was allowed Rev. Ernest Davies of Melbourne, in the midst of the session, to present an Australasian invitation for the next Council meeting, preferably in Sydney, N. S. W. It was referred to the business committee.

Later another invitation was received from London and the two were referred to the provisional committee with power to select.

Time was also allowed the committee on resolutions to present the first draft of the Council's Address to the Churches and three resolutions. The resolutions were called up again at the end of the forenoon and were unanimously adopted, concerning liquor, Armenia and the Negro.

1. This meeting of the International Congregational Council heartily rejoices in the triumph of the temperance cause in the United States and in the Dominion of Canada, and hears with profound satisfaction of the great beneficial results, both moral and material, that have accrued from the suppression of the drink traffic. It urges Congregationalists in the various lands represented by the Council to take note of the results achieved in America and Canada, and earnestly appeals to its constituents, in view of the measureless benefits accruing, to take such steps as may lead to like results in their own countries.

2. This International Congregational Council records its unqualified conviction that the Powers which were victorious in the Great War should at once seek to discover and apply measures for the effective protection of the Armenians now imperiled at the hands of their hereditary enemies in the Near East.

3. The International Council of Congregational Churches pledges itself to the realization of human brotherhood, and emphatically protests against lynchings, mob law, all forms of injustice and of discrimination against any people upon the ground of race or color in any part of the world, and we urge the Congregational churches of the world to maintain this ideal.

The Congregational churches of the world by delegates in International Council assembled at Boston, Mass., send Christian greeting to their brethren assembled at the Lambeth Conference now in session in London. We recognize the supreme responsibility that rests upon all who confess the name of our common Lord and Master, and we join with the Lambeth Conference in earnest prayer for the essential unity of the Church Universal and for the realization on earth of the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The International Council hears with satisfaction reports of increased attention by the churches in all countries represented in this Council to Christian education and the nurture of the young in preparation for church membership. We commend to our churches simultaneous efforts to be scheduled according to the year of church work and in the several countries, for the upbuilding of the Church schools, the organization of pastor's classes and the training of the youth of our churches for Christian service.

Sherrod Soule of Connecticut, Dr. A. H. Bradford of Rhode Island, Rev. W. J. Ashford of Tasmania, and Rev. W. H. Warriner of Canada.

Along the Council Trail

By Herbert Atchinson Jump

"Abraham was the first great American," Rev. C. Beale of Milwaukee quoted Dr. Gunsaulus as saying, "because he went west, not knowing whither he went."

Sixty-eight British delegates came over together on the Adriatic. One day the band started a melody and divers persons on the boat immediately stood up. "What's on? What are they standing up for?" ingenuously asked one of the English parsons. A member of the party who had been in the States before quietly replied, "The band is playing 'The Star-Spangled Banner.' "

He was one of the most popular of the Connecticut men and he was toiling perspiringly on some work of preparation up in the exhibits the day before the Council opened. "I suppose you are keen for Council meetings and church conventions, aren't you?" I asked, "you will probably attend every session." "Not much," he ejaculated. "When a convention comes along, I always think of the Yankee farmer down my way who used to say, 'Hang it, it's Saturday night, and I've got to go down to the village to get drunk. But I hate to do it.' "

Are Englishmen shy? Lots of evidence pro and con has been lying round loose in Boston during the Council, and many Americans have been studying the problem. But Rev. Clarence Wilson, the philosopher-prophet of Glen Ridge, N. J., declares it for a fact that two Britishers once had a business appointment to meet in the city of Bombay, India. They chanced to set sail by the same steamer, and soon learned of each other's presence on board. But they didn't dare speak until the hour and place of the business appointment!

Rev. Stanley Ross Fisher has been my summer neighbor for a couple of years up in the New Hampshire country town of Bridgewater. It is rural New Hampshire par excellence for beauty and also for quaint human nature. Stanley had to do the speaking honors one year for the dedication of a modest fountain in front of the town hall. "And remember," he was warned, "that this fountain is for man and beast. Don't forget the beasts in your oration." So he didn't forget the beasts. He wove into his address a long and touching tribute, "Our faithful friends, the sturdy horses without whose help the pioneer could never have found these remote hillsides, could never have plowed these stony fields, they could never have hauled supplies up the exhausting grades. Yes, we remember the horses today, and this fountain is for them also." He was still in exaltation from the proud consciousness that he had done a good thing when a grim-faced farmer strolled up to speak to the perspiring orator. Mr. Fisher swiftly put on the smile with which he always receives his many congratulations. "Purty good speech, friend Fisher," the farmer drawled, "but thur wuz one thing you don't know. All them hosses you talked about wuz ox!"

Sectional Meetings

Vital Subjects Under Discussion

For British American Good Will

It was commonly remarked that the sectional meeting in the Old South Church, Wednesday afternoon, touched the high water mark of the Council. Under the considerate presiding of Hon. John M. Whitehead of Janesville, Wis., not only did the three program speakers present fine pieces of work, but the last hour was enlivened by six volunteers from the audience. This was an especially happy occurrence, for the topic, "Constructive Effort toward Mutual Understanding and Good Will between Great Britain and America," needed spontaneous discussion far more than prepared papers. Dr. E. Griffith-Jones treated the theme with both frankness and tact, appealing for a united front, because we were one family with a common destiny, dwelling on the fact that the British fleet kept the seas free for all, and declaring that the mother who had given all to shelter her children was rewarded by the colonies who leaped to her aid in the Great War.

Dr. Jones made a point that was cheered and picked up by all the succeeding speakers, that Great Britain owes this motherly attitude to our war of Independence. "George Washington was not only the Father of His Country, he was one of the founders of the British Empire." What America owes to Britain was also emphasized. The many occasions that the latter has come to the aid of the former were described. The refusal to allow Napoleon to thwart America in the acquisition of Louisiana and the episode at Manila, but for which the Kaiser said he "would have taken Uncle Sam by the scuff of the neck." In regard to the future, the long stairway would have to be climbed again, if the English-speaking people did not hold the balance of power.

Sec. Henry A. Atkinson explained to the British delegates that America deals with questions at short range, she demands to "see the blueprints" of the League of Nations. One reaction on the war is extreme conservatism on international relations. And yet a multitude of pygmies and trouble makers are too much in evidence. We ought to take time to keep our friendship with England in repair, after so many childish insults of the yellow press, as to who won the war, have passed. Two things are being corrected by this Council, the dignified aloofness of Britain and the provincialism of America.

Dr. Lyon of Belfast was recalled to the platform and spoke at length on the Irish question, urging Americans to invent a telescope that would enable them to see Ireland as she is, without trusting the words of every agitator.

Dr. Thomas of Manchester, said that President Wilson's proclamations during the war had done more to break the morale of Germany than all the guns of Britain and France, and Dr. Henry A. Stimson of New York, replied that no man had been prayed for as the President. Dr. Horton of London declared that British Congregationalists are just the same people as those who built the Old South Church three hundred years ago. Dr. Garvie thought that the heart of the American people was not yet revealed. F. B. N.

The Church and Her Message

A large audience greeted Dr. George A. Gordon of Boston when he arose to give his address at the sectional meeting in Central Church, on Wednesday afternoon. The topic was the originality of Jesus and the speaker put into the address so much of passion that he held the attention of every hearer to the last word. The full address is published in the July number of the Atlantic Magazine.

"Jesus was original within himself and stamped with his character unvalued truth. He had originality of character to the highest degree. There were none like him in the Old Testament and no other like him in the New. When we come to the most ardent of the early apostles of Jesus Christ and his greatest apostle, Paul, we meet more of contrast than of resemblance. John Stuart Mill is completely right when he says that Paul's 'character and idiosyncrasies were of a totally different sort.' Jesus had no predecessor and no successor. His message was original—his moral teaching absolute. If Jesus had been the product of his human environment the world would never have heard of him, nor would that human environment ever have seen the light of day. There is little or nothing in it to detain the modern man. He is in the sphere of the Spirit original in the profoundest sense; he is original in himself in his power to revive dead wisdom and put it in everlasting social circulation; he is original in depth of insight, in purity of vision, in the transcendance of his mind, in the universality of his appeal."

Said in the Council

By Rev. F. J. Day, "Those were the daring days when even a pastor dared rebuke his deacons."

By Dr. E. Griffith-Jones, "The weakness of Irish Congregationalism is a cause of Irish unhappiness today."

By Rev. C. S. Patton, "Our Baptist brethren appointed a commission last week to investigate whether light had broken into some of their educational institutions, and if so whether it would not be well to pull down the shades."

By Roger W. Babson, "As a business man I urge my associates to get behind the churches. They alone provide the only solution to the great problems facing us. Legislation, labor unions, employers' associations, and all these other things are mere shells of the egg. So I say that the need of the hour is not more houses or freight cars, not more factories or ships, not more legislation, education or banking facilities, but more religion. The need of the hour is religion."

Dr. Gordon's address made a most profound impression and is indeed a real contribution to the thought of our day.

Dr. William Horace Day of Bridgeport, Ct., spoke on "The Permanent and the Passing in the Church's Appeal." His main argument was that while methods may change the need of the people for the Christ is constant, so that the Church must steadily evangelize whatever methods may be used to get results. The plan may be to make use of professional, pastoral, parish, or any other mode of evangelism—whatever our plan our chief business is to reach the people for the Kingdom of God. Plans we must have for the plan-less church is like a drifting ship. The conditions of success are founded in a sense of universal obligation to serve and to pray.

Dr. D. F. Fox of Pasadena, Cal., spoke on "The Specialist in Evangelism, His Service in the Past and the Outlook for the Future." He indicated the prevalent feeling of many concerning the work of professional evangelists and believes that more and more each pastor will do his own evangelistic work. He would have pastors set apart periods for stressing religious education, the evangelism of youth and kindred themes, and holds that by these methods the Church may be evangelized, and that if it uses them it will not run the risk of having the reactions that come from the inflated work of professional evangelists.

Principal Ritchie of Montreal, who presided, closed the meeting with a short address, in which he called upon the brethren to exercise great charity in dealing with each other in the work of the Kingdom and he was especially anxious that ministers should refrain from labeling brother ministers as orthodox or heterodox because of mere technicalities of belief. He held that a man's attitude toward life was much more fundamental than any technicality. Dr. Ritchie made a fine impression because of the breadth of his outlook and the warmth of his brotherliness. R. W. G.

Education in the Church

The various aspects of the educational function of the church occupied the attention of the sectional meeting that convened at Mt. Vernon Church under the chairmanship of Rev. Arthur Hallock of London, on Wednesday afternoon. The four addresses set forth the need for Sunday school teachers, preachers, social workers and church officials, and pointed out numerous ways in which the church might gird itself to supply this need.

"Fifty years ago in Great Britain we had an age of great men but small movements; today we have great movements but small men." Quoting this epigram, Rev. G. E. Darlaston of London registered his conviction that only as the rank and file of the church are sanely educated in matters of faith can the Church's continuity of power be maintained. "I asked three learned professors of theology lately, 'How can we train and be assured of leaders for the future church?' And they all answered, 'God only knows'—one of them with an accent that implied he was doubtful if even the Almighty knew the answer to the question."

Marshaling many striking, but altogether pessimistic statistics, Rev. Jay T. Stocking of Upper Montclair, N. J., confessed the inability of American Congregationalism to keep full the ranks of its own ministry. During a period when the number of law students in the United States increased 1,000 per cent. to keep pace with expanding population and business, theological students gained only 238 per cent. "One may as soon expect doctors to be raised in Christian Science homes as to look for ministers to come out of homes where God is only a casual visitor." Liberty to prophesy and the reward of an adequate living wage must be furnished by the Church if the ranks of the preachers are not to be reduced to "thin red lines o' heroes."

The breezes of controversy, however, did not awaken until the third speaker, Rev. Herbert Atchinson Jump of Manchester, N. H., sounded vigorously the modern social note and called upon the Church to furnish preachers and laymen worthy to be called "captains of our social salvation." This social leadership must have honest knowledge of social facts, a passion for service and an unshakably optimistic faith. It will come only when reality characterizes the pulpit and common sense pervades our program of religious education.

This statement in particular provoked an interestingly warm discussion: viz. "the phrase 'preaching the Bible' frequently comes to describe the sort of conventional preaching that the Scribes practiced in the Master's time and that excited his indignation, whereas the mission of the pulpit today is to preach on practical social morality as did the great prophets of the Old Testament."

One of his critics was a delegate from Australia, who after fearlessly defending the faith sat down with this Parthian fling at an earlier participant in the discussion, a speaker who had lauded the work of the Connecticut Anti-Cigarette League: "But whatever happens, I hope the Church of the future will organize no anti-cigarette leagues."

The novel suggestion contributed by Rev. Charles E. McKinley of Galesburg, Ill., was that reading and instruction courses should be provided to teach their duties to church trustees, deacons, treasurers, etc. A printed pamphlet which he distributed laid down a skeleton plan for such a curriculum.

The opportunity for free discussion which was carefully guarded by the excellent chairman seemed to appeal to the delegates who for twenty-four hours had been asked to do nothing but listen. There were more than two hundred in the audience. H. A. J.

Current Problems of Religious Education

At the sectional meeting Friday afternoon in Mt. Vernon Church the theme was "Current Problems of Religious Education." Rev. A. J. Grieve of Great Britain gave the first address on "The Relation between Church and College." He contrasted the history of this relationship in his own country and showed how completely the leadership of Great Britain has been trained in the colleges and that this is especially true of the leadership of the churches. "All the revivals of Great Britain have come out of the universities." He explained that the problem of reaching students in England has been greatly complicated by the fact that since the Armistice the colleges have been overcrowded. The attitude of the students toward the Church is shown by the word that came out of a great students' conference, "The Church is dead, long live the Church." According to the speaker the problem in Great Britain is one of getting back to the family, so that religion may be vitally taught to the youth before he comes into the atmosphere of the college. He holds that the English churches must steadily send the best preachers to the colleges; that they must find means of getting into personal touch with the students; and of harnessing them to the great burdens and problems of the world by setting forth these problems in a gripping way. Apparently the student problem in Great Britain is the same as our own, but must be solved in a different way.

Pres. John M. Thomas of Middlebury College followed with an address on the same topic. He gave briefly a history of the New England College ideal and showed that in the beginning religion was central in our college life, but he believes that we have drifted away from this ideal and that we are not now making students face all the problems of life, both general and personal, in the light of the religion of Jesus Christ. He holds that we shall not do our duty by the student generation until we come back, making religion central in the college life.

Prof. Luther A. Weigle of the Yale School of Religion spoke on "How to Organize and Promote the Religious Life of the Christian College." He defined the Christian college as one not necessarily controlled by a creed, a synod, a conference, or by doctrinal tests, but rather one whose declared purpose is to so educate the youth that he shall live his life in the spirit of Jesus Christ. He holds that the Christian college ought to be the best sort of a college, that the spirit of Jesus ought to pervade the whole of its life, and that the leadership of the religious life ought not to be put into the hands of the students. He advocated so organizing the curriculum that Christian teaching will be direct, the daily program give large place to religion, and the faculty be made up of thoroughly Christian men and women. He would make chapel and church attendance compulsory and would arrange to bring college and community into the closest relationship and would have students accept student membership in local churches. To volunteer religious agencies he would not give the task of teaching, nor of conducting worship, but rather that of teaching students to serve. His address was one of the most thought provoking of the series.

Rev. John Andrew Holmes of Lincoln, Neb., spoke on Potential Developments in Religious Life in State Universities. He held that the students of our day are blasé and that they give off money rather than take on learning. He traced briefly the history of church work at state universities and indicated how loath the churches have been, and still are, to put adequate effort into this task. He protested against condemning the state universities unless we were willing to condemn the public school also, for they are of the same system. He gave statistics showing that a majority of students and members of the faculty in state schools are Christians and members of the church, and that many of them are office bearers in the church. He pleaded for help that would enable the Church to make religious teaching at the universities the peer of any teaching. His statistics showed that during the last few years the universities have been a fruitful ground for recruiting for Christian leadership and for teaching church union.

The discussion that followed the addresses indicated a deep interest in Christian education, not only in the denominational colleges, but also in state universities and was a promise of better things for religion in the schools. R. W. G.

The Church and the Nation

Opponents of the League of Nations have sometimes satirically alleged that the only kind of folks that wanted the League were parsons, women and such like! This charge was surely answered at the sectional meeting on that theme in Central Church Friday afternoon for the four speakers were an English cotton broker, an American editor, a Yankee lawyer and a Canadian professor.

Sir Arthur Haworth of Manchester, England, has long been a vigorous champion of the League in his own country and he spoke with erudition, deep earnestness and rare, convincing power. Let us admit that the plan of the League is not perfect—neither was the Old Testament an infallible document; but it was the best voice of religion the age was capable of producing. There are thirty unattractive iron pipes buried in the soil over back of my city, but through these unalluring pipes comes clean and sparkling water into our homes from the distant lake. Shall I refuse to drink the water because I do not happen to like the looks of the outside of the pipes?

There must be something analogous to family discipline among the nations of the world. In a home one lad is not allowed to fiddle all day while his brother needs to be studying his Latin grammar. So the nations must work out their policies with reference to one another's interests; and to the extent that the Church commits herself to the task of fostering this good will will she emerge from these uncertain days triumphant and honored as never before.

The editor was Frederick Lynch of Christian Work, long connected with various Carnegie Foundations and an ardent peace apostle. He informed us that five conventions in behalf of united Protestantism were to meet in Europe this summer. Doubtless these have been called in the consciousness that the mind of the world's Protestantism has not hitherto expressed itself very clearly or adequately. Declaring that the message of Jesus can be nothing but a message of peace, Dr. Lynch quoted a skeptical French baron with whom he had been sitting on one of the committees of the Peace Conference a year ago, who said as they came out together from a hearing on the Armenian and kindred questions where terrible tales of persecution had been told, "I've come gradually to this conclusion: Jesus Christ knew what he was talking about!"

Judge Epaphroditus Peck of Connecticut presented a comprehensive study of "The Puritans' Conception of Democracy." The purport of his discussion was to the effect that the Puritans really did not know very much about democracy at first either in old England or in New England. But gradually under the influence of the patron saint of Connecticut, Rev. Thomas Hooker, genuine democratic principles came to be understood. The first written constitution in the United States hails not from Massachusetts, but it was the "Fundamental Order of Connecticut," and behind it stands the vigorous and protesting democracy of Thomas Hooker who led the migration from Massachusetts to Hartford with much the same motive, and, as he felt, under much the same provocation as prompted the original voyage of the Pilgrims. Despite the high fame of the New England town meeting, Judge Peck pointed out the striking fact that none of the outstanding minds in the early constitutional development of the United States came from east of the Hudson River.

The concluding address was by Prin. D. L. Ritchie of the Congregational College, Montreal. Earnestly pleading for a religious foundation to all our programs of social and international improvement, he suggested that perhaps we believed too much in the God of things as they are and not enough in the God of the Kingdom that is to come. We have heard too much about the fatherland in the last few years and not enough about the Father God.

Judge S. P. Leet of Montreal was the graceful chairman of the meeting. H. A. J.

Production and Distribution

"The Christian Outlook upon Production and Distribution" was the topic which drew a great audience to the Old South Church Friday afternoon. L. R. Eastman of New York presided and Roger W. Babson of Massachusetts, the well-known financial adviser, spoke first on the church and the business man. Our real security is not material but moral; the church is the real guardian of our peace and prosperity. Service and prosperity are synonymous terms, likewise selfishness and depression. Being pressed for a forecast of the immediate future, Mr. Babson predicted "a Republican election in November, one year of prosperity, three years of hell, and a Democratic landslide in 1924."

Industrial relations in England, America and Australia were pictured by Rev. G. Shillito of Oldham, Rev. Nicholas Van der Pyl of Oberlin, and Rev. Stanley Morrison of Brisbane. Britons love a big rough game, said Mr. Shillito, and they carry the spirit everywhere. Even in the labor unions there is a great gulf between those who have and those who have not. There must be a new spirit of concession by both capital and labor.

Mr. Van der Pyl's clear-cut exposition of the various forms of organized labor was very informing. The present skirmishing indicates unrest yet neither side is quite ready to hurl a challenge. Industrial autocracy is going, industrial democracy is dawning. There is a new day coming because new employers are coming too. Mr. Morrison's burden was to make democracy safe for Australia. They do some things differently there. Adult suffrage has prevailed for years. The state takes care of one from cradle to grave, with maternity benefits, compulsory education, minimum wage and time laws, old-age pensions, etc. Democracy is there, the greatest in the world, but it must be spiritualized.

Pres. K. L. Butterfield of Amherst pictured the rural unrest, noting signs, causes and remedies. Farm bureaus and other agrarian movements indicate its existence. Dissatisfaction with the farmer's share, suspicion of the middleman, fixed war prices without consultation, habitual overlooking of the farmer, and the farm labor problem are causes of unrest. Hitherto machinery has counteracted labor troubles but machinery has nearly reached its limit. Organization for efficiency, agricultural education and the satisfaction of rural life by making accessible the substantial joys of civilization are some of the ways in which to avert what may be the worst catastrophe now dimly imminent.

Movements toward Unity

Prof. Williston Walker presided at the sectional meeting Monday afternoon in Mt. Vernon Church on "Movements toward Unity." Dean Herbert L. Willett of Chicago spoke in place of Rev. Charles F. MacFarland on The Federal Council of Churches. He gave a most illuminating address, showing how completely the Federal Council was a clearing house for the co-operative activities for more than thirty denominations and he indicated that its leadership felt greatly troubled over the misfortunes that had come to the sister organization, The Interchurch World Movement. His hearers were especially interested in the report that he gave showing the great progress that had been made in city federations.

Rev. K. L. Parry of Great Britain spoke on "Movements toward Unity in England." He gave a brief history of the movements up to date and was optimistic in his report not only for much of unity among the free churches, but also for a breaking down of the barriers between them and the established church. It is only fair to say that some of his brother Britishers took exception to his optimistic outlook and voiced their opinion that union is not so near as Mr. Parry seems to think.

The paper written by Rev. W. T. Gunn on "The Progress of Church Union in Canada" was read in his absence by Prof. W. H. Warrener of Montreal Congregational College. He set forth briefly the present situation in Canada regarding the union of Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists, and showed that other denominations, with the exception perhaps of one, are maintaining a fine relationship to union efforts. Apparently Canada is much farther advanced in church unity than is the United States.

Rev. Ernest Davies spoke on "The Outlook for Union in Australia." He paid high tribute to the Presbyterian Church of that country, which though the leading denomination in wealth and influence, had sought the closest co-operation with other denominations, and indicated that a large amount of unity had already been realized with the conserving of the things fundamental to the denominations involved.

The meeting closed with the paper of Dr. Raymond Calkins on "The Plan of Federated Union Now before American Protestantism." In the absence of Dr. Calkins the paper was read by Dr. Frank K. Samuels. This organization came into being as a result of the vote taken in the Presbyterian General Assembly two years ago and looks toward the organic union of the Protestant churches of America. The name of the new organization will probably be The Churches of Christ in America. The Presbyterians have already voted for this plan and it will go into operation when ratified by five other denominations.

This meeting on unity was one of the most interesting of the series of sectional meetings and indicates that Congregationalists are ready for the most advanced steps toward, not only federation, but organic unity. R. W. G.

The Plymouth Pilgrimage

To three score foreign guests, not quite a Mayflower load, it was given to "voyage" to Plymouth by automobile. One may hope they went by the picturesque and historic shore road. The bulk of the 1920 pilgrims went by the more prosaic railroad train. Swarming out from the Thursday morning session they swamped the near-by restaurants for boxes and bags of lunch to be eaten later and lined up for special cars for a devious underground journey to the station. The pilgrim train carried 879 people in eleven coaches and at the other end of the line the thousand visitors, almost, were fed in five churches and one or two other halls, at the close of the local program.

The long informal procession wound its slow way along from station to Rock, and when most of the visitors had arrived and perhaps had passed under the canopy and some had scattered, Dr. A. P. Pierce of Boston, "Able Friendly Pilot," and excursion manager, introduced Pastor Busfield, who felicitously extended Plymouth's welcome to its guests and bade them scatter for sight-seeing until 4.30 when speaking would be resumed at the Rock. They scattered. They overflowed the antique shops, they explored the churches; they drank deeply and appreciatively from Brewster's spring in its modern setting of drinking fountains on the main corner; they climbed Burial Hill and read old inscriptions and looked out upon the beauty of the bay in its peaceful summer setting; some even plunged into the ripples that substituted for the "breaking waves" of 1620.

It was a picturesque sight when the speaking got under way. The steep grassy slope of Cole's Hill was covered with pilgrims sitting gratefully in the lengthening shadows of the big linden trees at the top; a row of automobiles along the curb below and in one of them a bit farther out, like that pulpit boat on Gennessaret, the speakers stood and brought world wide and fraternal greetings. A great chief, not Massasoit but a policeman, kept the street free from motor traffic, like Horatius at the bridge, and compatriots of Horatius just across the street offered post-cards anl popcorn for a price.

THE SPEECHES

After prayer by Dr. Herring, the Moderator invited into his chariot Rev. Louis C. Cornish, secretary of the Unitarian Association, who brought the greetings of the "other" Congregationalists of America. His thought turned on a pilgrim suggestion that many more might perhaps follow the Mayflower trail to these shores. How many, Bradford never could have dreamed; but Mr. Cornish read the New England census of twenty-six nationalities with a thousand for the smallest group and a million for the Irish.

Rev. R. W. Thompson brought the English greetings. If America welcomed him for his honored father's sake, it will remember him for his own sake as one of the coming leaders. He said the great impression America makes upon him is that of a young country, full of promise and having room for millions more. If New England were the cradle of America he was glad to name his own land as the hand that rocked the cradle. He reminded his hearers of the deep ties between the two nations and pleaded for the day when history may be written without bias. Rev. Frank J. Day of Toronto, representing 35,000 Canadian Congregationalists, and Rev. A. R. Stephenson of Melbourne, for the island continent under the southern cross, added their voices in the international Anglo-Saxon refrain.

Further reports of the International Council will appear in next week's issue

Responding to these greetings America's word was spoken by Dr. C. H. Beale. Milwaukee is usually remembered for other things than a militant New England tradition, but Dr. Beale demonstrated in himself that one good thing at least can come out of the Wisconsin metropolis. His theme led him to consider what the Pilgrim fathers would think of us, and with his fiery abandon he voiced the moral ideals of the nation today even though too often honored in the breach rather than the observance.

Then the delegates scattered once more to the dining rooms of the churches, and in several of them postprandial remarks were evoked by impromptu toastmasters almost up to train time. Of special interest was the presence and prayer at the Church of the Pilgrimage of Rev. Henry A. Miner, long-time Wisconsin secretary, celebrating that day his 91st birthday. All in all, it was a jubilant jaunt for the visitors and full of historic sentiment and abiding memories.

Laying New Cable Lines of Friendship

An unexpected offshoot of the Council was the organization of an international league of good will designed to stimulate what might be called "transatlantic professional friendships." A hundred charter members adopted a constitution, choosing a few officers and committees, and now only time will prove whether or not Rev. W. Charter Piggott of London was a true prophet when he declared solemnly one evening in the banquet room of the Copley Square Hotel, "Men, I verily believe we are at the beginning of something very big." His sixty auditors from three continents voted their approval by enthusiastic applause.

SPEAKING AT PLYMOUTH ROCK
Dr. Frank Day of Toronto with Moderator Barton in Speakers' Automobile

Rev. Herbert Atchinson Jump of Manchester, N. H., and Rev. Leyton Richards of Manchester, England, sat at the head table of the international dinner party as chairman and secretary. They confessed that it was their own transatlantic friendship of a dozen years' duration that prompted the desire that every minister and layman might be blessed with a similar privilege. So with the help of counselors an invitation list was drawn up that resulted in some thirty Americans entertaining at dinner twenty-five Englishmen and Australians. They were sandwiched together at table as perfectly as mathematics would permit. They interchanged addresses, each man with his overseas neighbor, and pledged themselves to interchange of letters and periodicals. And considerable indignation was expressed against the chairman for interrupting the high speed conversations at each table by a set speaking program.

Felicitous expressions of international good feeling were voiced by Rev. W. Blackshaw, London; Rev. Ernest Davies, Melbourne, Australia; Rev. S. M. Berry, Birmingham; Rev. G. E. Darlaston, London; two laymen, Mr. C. H. Collett, London, and Mr. Alfred Woodall, Everham; and a British journalist, Arthur Porritt, London; and from the American side auguries were made by Rev. Frank Smith, Omaha, Neb; Rev. W. T. McElveen, Portland, Ore.; Rev. Percival Huget, Brooklyn; Rev. Stanley Ross Fisher of Paris, France; Rev. H. A. Bridgman of The Congregationalist, Boston; Rev. Clarence H. Wilson, Glen Ridge, N. J.; Rev. Frank Dyer, Tacoma, Wash.; Rev. Harry Drury, Minneapolis, and others.

A committee on organization, consisting of Messrs. Jump, Richards, Hugh Elmer Brown, Piggott, and Davies, presented to a second meeting a constitution and plan of work. The name of the new league will be the "International Congregational Fraternity," or in brief the "I. C. F." Governing power will reside in five national committees representing the United States, Great Britain, Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and in an International Committee to be constituted from these national committees. The basis of membership will be proposal by a member already enrolled and the annual payment of one dollar or its equivalent.

Numerous methods for fostering these international personal friendships were suggested. Frequent exchange of correspondence and periodicals, official pronouncements of the national committees on matters where the press or the government might misreport the real sentiment of the country, exchange of pulpits for a term of weeks or months, and other devices are mentioned in the constitution. The secretary of the American committee is Rev. Herbert Atchinson Jump, the treasurer, Rev. Hugh Elmer Brown, and these with Pres. Kenyon Butterfield of Amherst, Mass., Rev. W. T. McElveen of Portland, Ore., and Rev. J. P. Huget of Brooklyn, make up the American committee. The British committee organized with Rev. Leyton Richards of Manchester, secretary, A. E. Rodehouse of Northampton, treasurer, and Rev. W. C. Piggott of London, Rev. S. A. Berry of Birmingham, and Rev. T. Lewis of So. Wales.

It seemed to be the opinion of all present at these initiatory conferences that the personalizing of transoceanic good will made possible by the "I. C. F." might prove to be the most valuable single result of the Fourth International Council.

The Congregational World Exhibit

An Illuminating Feature of the International Council

By Rev. Frederick Brooks Noyes

The churches and missions of our order have never told their story so well as in the exhibition in Mechanics Building, Boston, during the International Council period. Most exhibitions play down to us, but this one certainly took us seriously and played up to us. A British delegate was humming as he emerged from one of the booths, "The Mayflower Still is Sailing On." Allen Cross' Tercentenary hymn must have inspired Fred Bunker as he displayed the fact that twenty-one American colleges had become responsible for missionaries and a rebirth of Puritanism in the Orient. It must have inspired Frank Brown, the Boston architect, to write those fine sketches of the colonial meeting-houses. George Butler must have felt under orders from those verses as he collected the history of the New England educational institutions. Don Ivan Patch so speeded up the individual churches that nearly every Massachusetts church edifice and church method was filmed for the show. It was Clifford Smith who conceived this great advertisement of Congregational work.

The challenge of this exhibition was so unlike the usual tearful appeals in our pulpits for money. The strong spirit of the Pilgrims seemed upon it. Visitors were compelled to come back again and again and question it. Many of the delegates felt that it required study and was not on the surface. Those who did drift into the booths the second time were persuaded that the work of Congregationalism had been worth while, as an investment.

THE HISTORICAL EXHIBIT

In the historical exhibit of Massachusetts, some human touches were found. A sermon preached in Worcester in 1812 looked down upon us from the wall with this statement of the publisher, "printed by the desire of some who heard it, and did not like it, and by the desire of others who did not hear it, but imagined they should not have liked it, if they had." A sentence from Nathan Holman's acceptance to the call of the Attleboro church, "Be pleased to remember that I am formed out of clay." A sentence from the records of the same church, "Voted that a committee of four be chosen to visit all members of the church, enquire into their spiritual state, and endeavor to excite them to the performance of their duty."

The pastor of the Lynn church in 1728 receipted his salary conditionally "if the Province Bills in their paying from man to man are in all regards equally valuable to current money as they were in 1719 when my annual salary was started."

All Andover students were drawn to the excellent grouping of the South Church pastors from Phillips to Bigelow. Grace Church, Framingham, produced an admirable photo of Dr. Emrich in his library. Sherborn presented a picture of a parish outdoor gathering on the nintieth birthday of Dr. Dowse. South Hadley exhibited a cut of the old white church associated with Mary Lyon. Beneath were the two hemispheres, lines of gold thread connecting the picture of the church with Japan, India, Turkey and Porto Rico, with the words, "Where our church is working." The mending of time is significantly emphasized in the exhibit of the Danvers church, with the house of Rebecca Nourse, the martyr of witchcraft, on one page, and the beloved face of Charles B. Rice opposite.

Connecticut had "A Canterbury Tale" to tell of Gen. Moses Cleveland, founder of the city of Cleveland. This Canterbury church also furnished a president of Union Seminary and principal of Phillips Andover Academy. Bridgeport's photo, including descendants of the nine charter members, the choir, deacons and Dr. Day in the center was impressive. Connecticut's claim to the first home missionary society was in evidence. "The Waterbury Way" of campaigning for team workers, the Hartford honor rolls of the Great War, were studied.

Maine boasted the most easterly church in the United States at Eastport, one of the oldest buildings in actual use at Kittery, the Tory Hill Meeting-house at Buxton, the scene of Kate Douglas Wiggin's dramatized novel, "The Old Peabody Pew," a church in the deep woods at Chesuncook Lake and a church twenty miles out to sea at Matinicus Island. Vermont's distinction in originating the campaign for better salaries for pastors was outlined. New Hampshire is proud of its Old North Church in Concord, where the decisive ninth state ratified the Federal Constitution. It is also mindful of the record of six pastorates here in one hundred and ninety years, and that the oldest Woman's Home Missionary Society in the world was there organized. The Newington church still shows traces of aristocracy in its wall, where once was a special entrance connecting directly with the pew of the local magistrate. Rhode Island's stately architecture was noted, and the extensive and intensive work of Rev. Clovis Silcox of Newport was disclosed in the photos of the boys of the U. S. Naval Reserve.

The most outspoken fact in the whole exhibition was the gift of the Allston church, representing the town in the West of 1920, side by side with the Plymouth village of 1622. The Mayflower stops nowhere, for when we reach the exhibit of Iowa, we find the words, "Grinnell in China." We cannot pretend that we know Congregationalism till we look at an exhibit like Northland College, the only institution that ministers to the great empire about Lake Superior. New families are here moving in on cheap lands, and the state missionary forces in Wisconsin, Minnesota and Michigan follow up this population and secure young men and women for students in this college. Piedmont and Fairmount keep the soul of the people alive, in their respective territories. The Chandler Normal School in Lexington, Ky., in the Blue Grass Region is the only school that ministers to the city Negro. It started two weeks after Lee surrendered. The boys here have become very apt in cabinet work, and the girls have made over the contributions of clothing from Northern barrels into "middies," as their test in passing from grade to grade. Taledega, Fisk and Atlanta displayed the latest word in furniture made by their classes in manual training.

Every church ought to possess a copy of the picture of the "Union Christian Picnic" in San Francisco, of the open-air services of the Union Church, Boston, and Bushwick Ave. Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

FROM MISSION LANDS

A page out of the world's best picture-book was the exhibits of India, Africa and China. The biggest educational plant in the world on the mission field is at Pasumalai. There was a message in the model of the city of Madura, with its one hundred and fifty thousand people in a fortified city around the Hindu temple. All who saw in this miniature, on the scale of twenty-five feet to the inch, what would be in America whole city blocks, began to appreciate the size of foreign missions. They will never again associate them with a group of children under a palm tree.

The only way that this exhibit really measured the size and strength of missions was through its exhibit of native workers. Here were Indians, Zulus, Chinese, who had been taking courses in Hampton and Columbia and who were now returning to their own people to share their higher training with the untouched millions. Thirty years ago there were more missionaries than native workers, but today the latter outnumber the former by more than three to one.

The specimens of the infinite patience of all Oriental work needed no labels. A woven picture of Mount Fuji in Japan should have been placed at the end of a single room, with a long corridor leading up to it, its shimmer was so effective. The native basket work in imitation of European style was most suggestive of the response of the African native to leadership. When the girls begin to wear high heels, they have to make baskets with handles, for they can no longer balance them on their heads. Little was left unsaid in the exhibit of the chain taken from the neck of an African slave girl.

If anything could change our careless attitude toward the reading of Scripture, it would be just such an exhibition as was given of the translation of the Bible by missionaries. Here were men who did far more than the standard dictionaries, they looked up meanings in the dictionary of the heart and they discovered, as we seldom do, the real spiritual value of accustomed phrases. Imagine the experience of the missionary from London, Robert Morrison, who printed at Malacca in 1823 a twenty-one volume edition of the Bible in the High Wenli dialect. This original Chinese version was handled by hundreds of delegates. It would be a cold heart that would not pray in such a moment. The autograph copy of the Burmese Bible of Adoniram Judson, printed in 1826, was also shown. Elias Riggs' working knowledge of twenty languages made an interesting exhibit. The influence of current literature seemed slight when the fact stared us in the face, in this Bible exhibit, that one book, outside the Testaments, had cut its title across the world as well as across the ages, and cut it deep. There were copies of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress in seven languages.

Leaving the exhibition on the eve of Independence Day, we read the motto over one booth, "Patriotism is not enough; a call from Edith Cavell."

One other tag will ever haunt us and impress upon us the truth of that motto. We found it in three places, over the cradle-roll of the Big Rock Illinois Church, where children were photographed in all poses and moods, with toy autos, hobby-horses and wheelbarrows. Again it appeared over a large group of Mormon children in a Christian training school, and again it was found over a most pathetic and yet fascinating multitude of orphans in that continent which is a world in itself, Africa. The tag read, "For such as these." The look on those young faces and the very human words above them must have entered into the memory of every delegate to the International Council.

Congregational World Movement Plans

Commission of 100 Meets in Boston

The Commission of the Congregational World Movement met in Pilgrim Hall, Boston, at the close of the International Council, the evening of July 6, and remained in session through the next day. It was voted to continue the forward movement of the denomination with a financial objective for the coming year based upon the actual imperative needs of our missionary societies and educational institutions. An attempt will be made to raise "a sum not to exceed $5,000,000" in 1921, but the exact amounts to be sought for every cause will not be decided until surveys of the various societies have been made and reported. It is expected that this will be brought out early in the fall. The other more important decisions of the Commission are indicated as follows:

A sum of not less than $100,000 shall be included in the next year's budget to assist in meeting accrued liabilities of older ministers not able otherwise to take advantage of the Pilgrim Fund, to be administered by the Annuity Fund Board.

The expense budget adopted provides for special efforts along the lines of missionary education and stewardship while encouraging and co-operating in all the other denominational causes and agencies.

For the coming year there shall be only one budget and canvass.

The Commission reaffirms its conviction of the exacting responsibility of the Congregational churches in the field of higher education and instructs the committee now engaged in the study of the situation to press its inquiries with all vigor, to make its report at the earliest feasible moment and to include in such report a plan by which the denomination may meet its immediate and continuing obligations in this regard.

The amounts promised to Fargo, Fairmount and Olivet Colleges at the meeting of the Commission held in Chicago in January, 1920, are considered a preferred claim against the amount raised in the financial campaign of this year.

The Commission recommends to the churches that so far as practicable they make the next financial canvass for the Congregational World Movement on some date to be agreed upon in the spring of 1921. It trusts a large proportion of our churches may see their way clear to adopt this arrangement. For those who prefer the December date, it offers all possible aid, especially in the case of whole states which may find the change undesirable. It recommends that churches which have hitherto canvassed in December and will change to the spring urge their people to continue the old pledges until such time as the new pledges become effective.

The Commission expresses its appreciation of the great benefits resulting from the Interchurch World Movement and its desire to go forward in fellowship with other denominations under such reorganization of the Movement as shall enable it to accomplish the major ends for which it was created.

It is proposed to continue the general form of organization and economical methods of promotion adopted by the Congregational World Movement last winter and spring under the leadership of General Secretary Swartz and chiefly in the hands of our regular missionary secretaries for the coming year.

Returns from the Congregational World Movement campaign from the churches are still incomplete and so mixed with gifts to causes not a part of the $3,000,000 budget that the exact amount raised is not known. However, it seems probable that about $2,225,000 will come in, according to the statements made by Secretary Swartz, Treasurer Kilbon and Chairman Warner of the Commission. Somewhat less than $2,000,000 are actually on record at this time, but more is in sight.

With the Schools and Colleges

Commencement at Pacific University

The year just closed was the best in all probability in the history of Pacific University. The attendance in the college department went beyond all previous records and the Conservatory of Music showed a considerable advance beyond that of any recent year. The college rejoices over the promise made by the Congregational World Movement of emergency aid of $20,000 during the next year. This aid is the more gratifying because it indicates approval on the part of Congregational leaders. The presence on the Board of a new member in the person of Dr. W. T. McElveen of First Church, Portland, Ore., has brought much encouragement to the College.

Congregationalism was well represented at the Commencement exercises. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Dr. C. E. Burton, General Secretary of the Home Missionary Extension Boards. His presence and his message brought inspiration to all who met and heard him. The address for the Christian Associations was delivered by Rev. J. H. Matthews of Seattle, District Secretary of the Education Society and the Commencement address was given by Dr. McElveen on the subject, "Serving Our Own Generation."

The Board of Trustees adopted an ambitious program, including substantial increases in salaries and the addition of a number of new salaries. This fact, combined with the encouraging prospect of about 100 freshmen for next year indicates a truly wonderful year for 1920 and 1921.

For Spiritual Fellowship

Following the custom of the past three years, in which ministers of all communions have gathered for spiritual fellowship, under such helpful leadership as that of Professor Fosdick, President Mackenzie and Dr. Coffin, the Pastoral Union and the Hartford Seminary Foundation have again issued an invitation for a Pastors' Conference to be held.

The meetings will be led by Dr. Hubert C. Herring, Secretary of the National Council and the theme will be "The Minister's Message to a World in Ferment." Prof. C. S. Lane is Secretary of the Conference.

President Warren's Anniversary

The 38th commencement of Yankton College was held on Friday, June 11. The speaker of the day was Dr. W. E. Parsons, a former president of Parsons College, Fairfield, Io., who recently returned from a two years' service as minister of Union Church, Kobe, Japan. His address was an illuminating discussion of the topic, "America and the Far East."

The most noteworthy feature of this Commencement was the celebration of the 25th anniversary of the assumption of the presidency by Dr. Henry Kimball Warren. Speeches were made by faculty members and alumni, paying hearty tribute to the tireless energy and the indomitable courage with which the President has met during the quarter century the countless difficulties of his work. An original poem of excellent quality was also read, which had been written for the occasion by Major Joseph Mills Hanson, the official historian of America's part in the World War, who was born and reared in Yankton and was once a student in the institution. The most important facts brought out regarding President Warren's administration were the following: At his coming the college had been in existence 13 years. The faculty consisted of 14 persons; now it numbers 30 members. The student body then numbered 241, of whom 37 were of regular collegiate rank; for the year just ended the total attendance in all departments was 511, of whom 165 are students in the college proper. At that time there were four buildings, the present Conservatory of Music; the dormitory for young women, then known as Dakin Hall; the Observatory, and Ward Hall, the main recitation building, a gift of Dr. D. K. Pearsons. During Dr. Warren's administration the following buildings have been added: the library, gymnasium, the central heating plant, and the splendid new women's dormitory built to replace Dakin Hall, which was destroyed by fire in 1914. There may be mentioned also the enlargement of the campus, its adornment by the planting and substantial growth of beautiful trees, and the addition of a fine athletic park equipped with a substantial grandstand. At that time the total resources of the institution amounted to about $150,000; now to about $580,000.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

Surely there are good people who do not go to church, but have you seen the third generation of such people?

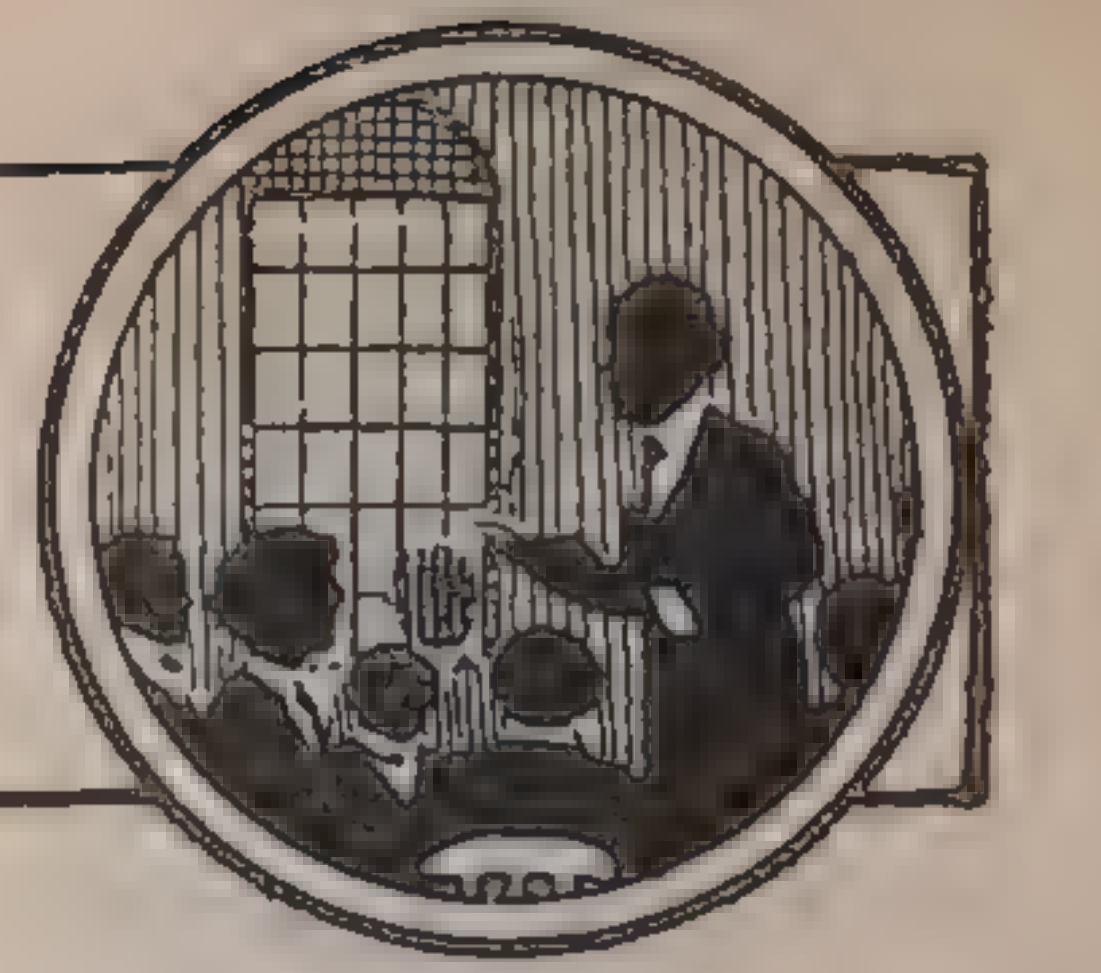
It is deplorable that the remaining years during which Dr. Warren may hope to continue his labors as president of the College seem destined to be marked by even greater problems than those that beset him in the years gone by. That they will be met with the same unconquerable determination and unquenchable optimism the large part that he is playing in the Interchurch and Congregational World and State Movements bears ample testimony. In the face of financial difficulties it has been decided to strengthen the faculty for the coming year and to improve the courses of study and of instruction. In spite of all discouragements there is sufficient ground for confidence that Yankton College will more and more become for this and adjoining commonwealths such a source of light and leading as was seen from afar by the prophetic vision of Joseph Ward, its great-souled founder.

W. J. M.

Commencement at Doane College

At the annual commencement exercises of Doane College the degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred upon 17 students. The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon Rev. J. H. Andress of Norfolk. The college is making rapid progress under the leadership of the new president, Dr. J. N. Bennett. The churches of the state are contributing very generously to the support of the college.

IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL



DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

David Succeeds Saul as King

International Sunday School Lesson for July 25. 2 Sam. 2:1-7; 5:1-5.

This is a lesson in the field of right and wrong. It proves from another example that it is impossible for the right cause or the true leader finally to be defeated.

1. David Crowned by Judah. David shows the secret of his wisdom and strength in the very beginning. He seeks to know and he is ready to do the will of God. Whatever his own desire might prompt or his judgment dictate he holds in subjection to the will of God as he might learn it. How necessary is this quality in the activity of our national leaders today? Do they seem to seek as earnestly as David did to find out God's will? If they did might we expect that it would be as clearly made known as was God's purpose to David? In what ways might they expect to discover God's will?

Hebron was an ancient city, around which gathered many a sacred tradition and memory in the minds of the people. It was in every way appropriate that David should go there. He brought with him not only his own family but also the households of the men who were loyal to him. Moving was easier under the conditions under which they lived than it is for us today. So David was crowned king by the men of Judah. It was called anointing, because it was distinctly understood that this involved the setting apart of one to a God-given office and holy purpose. The deep significance of the rite will appear when we recall the meaning of the word Christ, that is the anointed one.

David was anointed or crowned king by a section of the Hebrew tribes. Who is the true king of the spirit today, the real Christ of humanity? And do we and our households acknowledge our allegiance to him?

2. Reward for Benevolent Action. So far as the spirit of Saul was concerned it was a matter of indifference what was done with the human body in which it had dwelt; but those who honored the king and loved him were deeply concerned with the treatment which was given the corpse. Decent burial is one of the marks of a high civilization and of fine relationships between men.

Read the story of the treatment of the bodies of Saul and his three sons in 1 Sam. 31: 7-13. It was in accord with the custom of the cruel time. As if dishonoring the corpse of an enemy could do any good! When we think of the opportunity of Saul and the glorious beauty of his young manhood it seems incredible that his headless body should have been fastened to the walls of Beth-shan by the Philistines. Yet this is the place to which his pride and sin brought his remains.

Then appear the men of Jabesh-gilead. They were like the other people of the wild and warring towns so far as external appearance was concerned; but they had a different attitude toward the body of Saul and his sons. So they went out in the night, took down the corpses, and first burnt and then buried the final vestiges of them with honor. They made it all a religious act, too, fasting a week as a part of the ceremony. It was a noble and generous deed. It was prompted by the elementary instincts of humanity and was true to the noblest ideals of good men.

Such an action ought not to go unrewarded and David saw to it that the men of the city were thanked and given the blessing of Jehovah for their kindness. It is good to see kindness appreciated and honor rewarded as it was in this case. But if they had received no open reward, the men of Jabesh-gilead would have had the approval of their own consciences and this is the great reward after all.

3. David Crowned by Israel. Now comes Israel to Hebron to make David their king also. It is interesting to see the way in which they put the case. First, David had earned the honor by the way in which he had led the people in the past. So the valor and sacrifice of David in the past won for him the leadership of the people. He did not think, when he was undertaking danger or bearing great responsibility, that he was in training for the leadership of the united tribes of his people. But that is the best and surest way in which to prepare for any great civic or religious responsibility.

There was another factor in the decision of the people, however. They felt that it was the will of God that David should be their king. When the evidence of the divine purpose is united with human fitness and tested strength it is a fine proof of the rightness and wisdom of a choice.

A king at thirty! Of course it was not such an empire as that over which other rulers have exercised authority; but it was a great responsibility and a high privilege to come to one so young. He had shown his worth; he was in the prime of his young manhood. It is an inspiring picture that we see as the lesson closes, this young king of thirty among his loyal people. Will he keep his place and power? If not, what will be the reason?

Training for Service: A Word to Otherwise People—Mostly Young!

These suggestions are not written for people who know how! We would recommend that all wise persons turn to another page, or read Dr. Davis' comments upon the Sunday school lesson. Wise persons will be disappointed in this half of the page. It is for the otherwise—the young people who are willing to follow a few simple suggestions in the matter of getting a start in life service.

Let us not be afraid of the word "training." It is a word that suggests discipline and application rather than a complete knowledge of everything connected with the subject. That person is best trained who has learned discipline and application. This discipline and application seems difficult, and forbidding when demanded by persons who are our masters, but is cheerfully and heartily accepted when the love of Christ constrains us to prepare ourselves for his service. We remember that he is depending on us. Hence we shall welcome the discipline that prepares us for service.

The work of Christ can never be acceptably done by those whose only fitness for the task is that they have a desire for the work and are willing to undertake hard and difficult things. It is not so in the business world. A manufacturer does not let a boy or a girl handle expensive and intricate machinery just because they have a desire to handle it and do difficult things. Training is demanded, they must learn how! Willingness and desire are greatly necessary—but these alone are not sufficient. We must learn by discipline and application to do the difficult and ofttimes hard service of Christ. Life was a comparatively simple affair when Jesus first said "Go." And at best the going was necessarily slow and tedious. But today it is a complex affair. It is not sufficient to have a warm heart, we must have a trained mind. Of course there are those who say that the disciples were "ignorant and untrained men" and that it is such that Jesus can best use today. But it should be remembered that those first disciples had been to school. They had been daily companions of Jesus! In a peculiar way they had been under the inspiration of his whole personality. They had been trained in discipline and application. They were unschooled—as the term was used in that day—but they were trained men. If it were possible for Jesus to preside in physical presence over the training of every one of his modern disciples then we might consider turning our seminaries and colleges into garages! But until that time comes we shall find it necessary to offer ourselves for training in the schools and colleges established for that purpose. To be accepted by one of our great Missionary Boards—Home or Foreign—one needs the discipline of a trained mind as well as an enthusiastic purpose. The greatest missionary of ancient or modern times was Paul, the man with a trained and educated mind thoroughly consecrated to Chrst.

Probably we all look forward to the time when we shall be really doing our big task, the one really big thing we were called to do. That may be to be a missionary or it may be to do something at home. In the meantime the home task and the task of the home church seems difficult and uninteresting. Yet what we are doing in the Church school or the Endeavor Society is more definitely related to our ultimate life purpose than we realize. It is here we learn "how." Here we learn to work with others and we shall never learn to work for others until we learn to work with others. If we fail in the home task we may fail in the task elsewhere. We must learn our first lesson in discipline at home.

Meantime there are three definite things we may do in order to keep ourselves in training for the great task:

1. Reading and Study. Read some good book on how to do it. Read "How to Teach Religion," by George H. Betts. Take the "Pilgrim Training Course for Teachers." If there is no Teacher Training Class in your commu-

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

Christian Internationalism in Relation to China

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for July 18-24

BY WILLIAM E. STRONG, D. D.

Scripture Passage. Ps. 67; Ps. 72:11-19.

Influenced by America. Our relations to China are intensified by the fact that she is predisposed to be influenced by America. This situation is due in part to our national treatment of China; to the return of the excess indemnity received after the Boxer uprising; to our insistence on the maintenance of the open door; to our well recognized freedom from desire to acquire territory; and, more recently, to America's protest against the Shantung provision in the Allies' Treaty of Peace with Germany. China's friendly and teachable attitude toward America has been further and greatly developed by the acceptability of American missionary work there, particularly in the fields of education and of medicine.

Treatment Not Altogether Fair. At the same time, it must be recognized that America's treatment of China has not been in all respects fair, much less Christian. The Chinese have perhaps suffered most of all nations in the operation of our immigration laws and through the racial and national antipathies which they have expressed. Not only the Chinese laborer, but the Chinese student wishing to come to this country to study in our institutions of learning has been exposed to indignities and even hostilities that must shame our American pride. A revision of our immigration laws such as is now being pressed upon Congress is an effort which the Christian people should vigorously support.

Binding Two Countries Together. Among the forces to be reckoned with in America's dealings with China is the growing interest which American colleges and universities are taking in that country's welfare. Yale at Changsha, Oberlin and Carleton in Shansi Province, Grinnell in Shantung Province, Wellesley in its attachment to the Peking Women's College, and Smith to Ginling—these and other institutions in this country which are bringing the life of their student body into direct contact with the student body of China are doing an incalculable service in binding together the two countries.

Indirect Result of Mission Training. No single factor in China's life today is more significant than the influence of American missionaries upon the student class; directly in schools maintained by them, and indirectly through work among the students in government institutions. While not prompted or directed by the missionaries, while not approved in all of its demonstration and development by them, the student uprising of May, 1919, was an indirect result of mission training in Christian principles and ideals. Their sobering influence upon these students is the hope of China.

SEEKING THE BEST

But covet earnestly the best things, and yet show I unto you a more excellent way. 1 Cor. 12:31.

"I am come to give abundant life," says Christ, "and to give it here and now, and not tomorrow." Do you not see, then, how fellowship with Christ wakens a man's attention to the highest?—G. H. Morrison.

Let a man seek the good and he will find it in God. Let him ask what is better than he knows today, and the answer is the same. Let him seek the best and in God shall he be satisfied. For God gives himself according both to man's necessity and capacity.—I. O. R.

Leave me, O Love, which reachest but to dust;
And thou, my mind, aspire to higher things;
Grow rich in that which never taketh rust;
Whatever fades, but fading treasure brings.
Draw in thy beams, and humble all thy might
To that sweet yoke, where lasting freedoms be;
Which breaks the clouds, and opens forth the light.
That doth both shine and gives us sight to see.

Sir Philip Sidney. Abr.

One of the penalties of choosing a low aim in life is that one is in danger of outliving it. —Willard Brown Thorp.

Great is the power of a life which knows that its highest experiences are its truest experiences, that it is most itself when it is at its best. For it each high achievement, each splendid vision, is a sign and token of the whole nature's possibility. What a piece of the man was for that shining instant, it is the duty of the whole man to be always.—Phillips Brooks.

O God, in whom our hope of satisfaction hath its beginning, its continuance and its completion, help us to learn the true proportion of our lives and the true worth of gifts. Keep us from putting our whole hearts in aims and purposes which we are certain to outgrow. From day to day be thou our companionable friend, as well as the Father whom we reverence as the Source and Aim of all that is. Deliver us from pettiness of spirit, from making selfish claim of ownership in gifts which are but lent, from hindering discontent with our adventures and experiences in the way of training and discovery which we walk with thee. And crown our hearts with the enduring gifts of faith and hope and love by the ministry of thy Good Spirit. In the name of Christ. Amen.

Missionaries All

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for July 25-31

BY REV. D. BREWER EDDY

Topic: Every Christian a Missionary. Acts 1:1-9. (Missionary Meeting.)

A Great Hour

The present hour brings a great opportunity for the churches to prove what they can do to make the world better.

Every One a Missionary

There is no more direct way to affect the character of a group of Christians than to make each member of it a missionary. Make a careful study of this first chapter of Acts, the great verses and the great principles of the Bible missionary. Best of all select in the Acts the verses where the word "apostle" may be used, and some of the other Bible passages that emphasize the work of the apostle, and then read them aloud, changing the word "apostle" and inserting the word "missionary," for that is the exact translation—the one who is sent.

The Great Challenge

Our modern missionaries are the apostles of the church in that informal sense, and you and I are apostles in Paul's sense for we are missionaries of the Gospel of Christ, and of the Kingdom of Righteousness. If you have before you the outline map of the world, remember that the unoccupied areas which could be located there are the greatest challenge to the obedience and loyalty of every Christian.

Know the Needs

Write to the American Board, 14 Beacon St., Boston, Mass., and to the Congregational Home Missionary Society, 287 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y., for a statement of their needs and opportunities and point out to your society the work that could be done if means were available.

The American Board's Call

The Mission Boards are now challenging the young people with the message that thousands of Student Volunteers are needed to fill gaps in the missionary line. The American Board calls for 157 new missionaries this year, for many types of work. Let every earnest group of young people in our churches hear this challenge.

Either Go or Send

If the Christian Church caught the message of the great Interchurch Movement, increased income would be inevitable for all missionary societies at home and abroad. Our churches know more of missions in the present hour than ever before, because of the simultaneous campaign of thirty-one denominations begun last April. Remember that we are living in a missionary age and we are responsible to keep the missionary spirit alive. Your loyalty and your faith are under a heavy challenge. You must either go or send.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Saint Paul

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF SAINT PAUL, by DAVID SMITH (Doran). All students of Paul have wished for an up-to-date book like this which covered the same field as Conybeare and Howson's work did for the last generation. Dr. Smith is professor of theology in M'Crea Magee College, Londonderry. He began this book thirteen years ago in a remote Scottish parish. He is already known by his life of Christ, "The Days of His Flesh." The work is thorough, careful and painstaking. While not radical, the book is abreast of modern scholarship. The translations from the epistles are suggestive of and very close to the original, and constitute in fact a brief and illuminating exegesis of the text. As a biography it is both sympathetic and penetrating. It has the human touch as well as the scholar's instinct. The chronology of Paul's life is well worked out. The date of birth is put at 1 A.D. and the death at 67. The space between the two imprisonments is put from 62 to 67. The conversion of Paul in its outward aspect was a sudden thunder storm. "A dazzling flash enveloped the travelers and they all fell prostrate. The lightning was for him the Lord's minister and the thunder was the Lord's voice; and as he lay the glorified Christ manifested himself to him. It was no mere subjective phantasm but an actual vision."

The book is not controversial. It is not written to prove a theory or controvert an error but to reveal the man, the missionary, the servant of Jesus Christ, the wise and devoted counselor of the churches. It is done with a fine appreciation that makes you feel that "Paul was such a gentleman." Besides all this it will take its place on the shelves of the student as an authority. T. C. RICHARDS.

On Religious Themes

WHAT IS THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN? by A. CLUTTON-BROCK (Scribners). An interesting and important discussion based on the conception that the Church has ignored the great central theme of Christ's teaching of the Kingdom of God, with an interpretation and application of that doctrine. At points we may differ with the author but the argument as a whole is admirable and of utmost importance.

BIBLE TYPES OF MODERN MEN, by REV. W. MACKINTOSH MACKAY (Doran). A Glasgow minister's lectures to young men on men of today who exhibit characteristics, good and bad, illustrating Biblical types and teachings. A splendid example of practical application of Old and New Testament principles, showing keen knowledge and understanding of human nature.

THINGS ETERNAL, by REV. JOHN KELMAN, D. D. (Doran). Fifty-two short sermons by the pastor of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, following the order of the Church Year, beginning with the New Year and continuing on to Christmas and the last Sunday in the year. They are practical and abound in illustration.

TALKS TO SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS, by LUTHER ALLAN WEIGLE (Doran). An enlightening and valuable series of talks on child nature, under such titles as: The Child as a Discoverer, Children's Lies, A Boy's Loyalty, The Age of Hero Worship, When a Boy Wants to Go to Work, When Doubts Come, etc., and chapters for teachers on: Why a Trained Teacher? The Teaching Process, How to Excite Interest, Attention, etc. A splendid book for teachers and parents.

STORY SERMONS FOR CHILDREN, by REV. HOWARD J. CHIDLEY (Doran). Fifty-two short and practical talks that have actually been tried out in the author's own pulpit. Parents, teachers and preachers will find the volume very suggestive and helpful.

A PRESENT-DAY DEFINITION OF CHRISTIANITY, by LAURA H. WILD (Womans Press). A little book of sixty pages but full of helpful material, especially addressed to young men and women who need a new interpretation of Christianity as a matter of life and conduct rather than of metaphysical doctrines, "shifting emphasis from the Nicene Creed to the brotherhood of man." "To be a Christian means to be a follower of Jesus Christ and this involves a conscious endeavor to get at the underlying truth of Jesus' teachings."

NATIONAL IDEALS IN THE OLD TESTAMENT, by HENRY J. CADBURY (Scribners). "The narratives of the Bible," says Mr. Cadbury, "are intended to teach lessons from the past for the present." There is much sound advice in Old Testament records that is of permanent practical value. The purpose of the volume is to point out and apply the lessons from the biography and history of Israel which are needed for existing conditions today. The condemnation by Amos of ruthlessness in warfare, and no less of man's inhumanity to man in times of peace, is an example of the timely material included. The chapter on Jonah, "A Cartoon of Nationalism," shows that the book was "a parable, or tract, to meet the national exclusiveness and racial pride of the author's times." This, too, is a timely theme for American pulpits. We commend the volume to our readers.

APT ILLUSTRATIONS FOR PUBLIC ADDRESSES, by A. BERNARD WEBBER (Doran). Through many years the compiler of this volume has been collecting illustrations which might be of use in connection with sermons and other public addresses. A winnowed selection from this collection is presented in this volume.

STORIES OF THE SAINTS, by GRACE HALL (Doubleday, Page). An excellent collection of what we may venture to call the mythology of the Catholic Church, pretty stories connected with St. Patrick, St. Bridget, St. Ursula, St. Nicholas, St. Louis of France, and many more.

DIVINE OVERRULING, by W. SANDAY, D. D., F. B. A. (Scribners). These lectures, with an added sermon on the atonement, are Professor Sanday's farewell to his work as Lady Margaret Professor at Christ Church College, Oxford. They are a singularly interesting review of the results of modern study in comparative religion. He affirms in the strongest terms the value of the science and its independence of formal theology, to which, however, it is becoming a large contributing factor. If he seems far in advance of many Christian thinkers in this field, the sermon, dealing as it does with the central Christian message and mystery, keeps the balance true and reasserts a divine overruling and the spiritual values of the life of the world and the life with Christ.

Humorous Essays

ISN'T THAT JUST LIKE A MAN! by MARY ROBERTS RINEHART, and OH! WELL! YOU KNOW HOW WOMEN ARE! by IRVIN S. COBB (Doran). A topsy-turvy book. First you read one of these laughable descriptions of the other sex and then turn the book upside down and the other side around and read the other. Then your mind too is upside down and you don't know which writer gets the best of the fun. Both papers are irresistibly funny. Though there is much good sense, too, in both.

MINCE PIE, by CHRISTOPHER MORLEY (Doran). "This book is intended to be read in bed," says the author in an introduction. That fairly describes the type of the fifty or more brief essays. They are amusing and delightful descriptions of all sorts of people, events and happenings, mostly expressed in prose but occasionally in verse. To the reader who is familiar with Christopher Morley's work no more need be said. To others we say confidently, "Try this Mince Pie. You will like it and ask for more."

MR. DOOLEY ON MAKING A WILL AND OTHER NECESSARY EVILS (Scribners). Mr. Dooley and his friend Henessy are as funny as ever and as usual there is much philosophy and good sense in his conversations. Some of the things he talks about this time are, Going to See the Doctor, The Higher Baseball, Golf, The Orange Revolution of 1914, St. Patrick's Day, etc.

FIDDLER'S LUCK, by ROBERT HAVEN SCHAUFFLER (Houghton Mifflin). It is impossible to adequately describe this jolly, laughable and highly entertaining series of chapters concerning a 'cellist's adventures in France. Whoever has read "I Mislay the Band," or other chapters in the Atlantic Monthly, will need no advice. He will hasten to get this book and read them over again—and all the rest. Of course if the reader is a musician his interest will be redoubled, but there is fun enough for every one.

HOW IT FEELS TO BE FIFTY, by ELLIS PARKER BUTLER (Houghton Mifflin). A jolly little book by one who thinks "life is just beginning to be interesting at fifty" and gives the reasons.

Social Studies

LEADERSHIP OF GIRLS' ACTIVITIES, by MARY E. MOXCEY (Methodist Book Concern). This valuable little volume deals with the guidance of girls' activities in their leisure time, physical recreation, mental recreation, social recreation, commercial amusements. It appeals especially to teachers in Sunday schools to undertake this work for the girls under their care and advises them how to do it.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF DREAMS, by WILLIAM S. WALSH (Dodd, Mead). Not until quite recently has there been any real progress made in the understanding of dreams. This volume presents for the general reader a thorough discussion of the subject. It deals with the material of dreams and shows that they are always "founded on personal experiences." Dreams as Wishes, The Effects of Dreams, Prophetic Dreams, Nightmare, Somnambulism, Day Dreams, are some of the chapter titles.

THE SUPERSTITION OF DIVORCE, by GILBERT H. CHESTERTON (John Lane). Mr. Chesterton is the most mannered of our writers of distinction. But weariness of his turns and paradoxes is offset by the content of real thought in what he has to say. As a Roman Catholic, he naturally approaches this subject from the side of vows, which to those who regard marriage as a sacrament are necessarily irrevocable. His argument as to the necessity of vows as "order by volunteering" in place of "slavery by status," is interesting and cogent. When he begins to weigh the wrongs and disabilities for which divorce is proposed as a remedy, in spite of all his protestations of impartiality, he seems to us to refuse a full and fair facing of the facts. At this point his argument breaks down and is wholly inadequate.

WITH THE CHILDREN

The Comrade's Corner

Dear Comrades:

Now for the last letter in our prize contest with the subject, What I Like about My Minister. This is from Comrade Prescott F. Dennett, of Maine:

"A man once questioned himself whether he would like to have a minister who preached a great sermon on Sunday, and on week days would be shut up so that you could not see him; or one who would be a brother to his people.

"Mr. —— is rather a mixture of the two. He preaches good sermons on Sunday and he is also acquainted with the doings of the world and in that way he brings them in as wings to his sermon points.

"Mr. —— understands boys and is able to get a grip on the young people. I like his evening sermon topics especially because they help young people starting out in life.

"Our pastor stands ready to promote anything for the good and to hinder everything bad."

I wish I had space for good letters from some other Comrades but I am afraid it is impossible to get it. Among others from whom letters came are Clarice Luther, Massachusetts; Harriet Feich, Washington; E. A. Childs, California; and A. E. Herrick, Manchester, N. H.

In reaching my decision as to prize winners, I must say I have had a good deal of difficulty but my final decision has been that the first prize of six thrift stamps should go to Prescott F. Dennett; the second, of three such stamps, to Edith Clark; and the third, one stamp, to Millicent Childs.

I have just received the first contribution to our Corner from a Comrade across the seas. This is from Dr. J. E. Walker of Shaowu, China:

Dear Mr. Alden:

As to oddities in names, each missionary has to have a Chinese surname and name; the former come first and are usually monosyllables, while the names follow and are usually compounded of two monosyllables. Thus for a surname I took Hwo, "Harmony," under the impression that the word was pronounced Wa in Mandarin. Joseph became Yo-seh, "Like-harp"; and I was known as Mr. "Harmony Like-harp." Then in succession Henry Thomas Whitney, M. D., became Huei Hen-tung, Dr. "Kindness Successful." Rev. G. M. Gardner became Mr. Kia. "Fine"; E. L. Bliss, M. D., Fuh, "Happiness"; Rev. C. L. Storrs, To, "Much"; Rev. R. W. McClure, Kang, "Vigor"; Mr. C. H. Riggs at the head of our Industrial Work which includes Forestry, became Mr. Lin, "Forest." Dr. F. E. Clark in 1900 was named Kia, "Fine"; and at the time of the Eddy meetings his name was rendered by I-teh, "Promote-virtue." (Give all vowels their Italian sound).

Little girls often have only pet names, but in Christian families girls all have baptismal names; and Luteh, Ruth, is rather a favorite; for Ruth was a model daughter-in-law; also some boys have been named Io-peh after Job, who fills the Chinese ideal of the "Superior Man." In the case of "clan names," each clan has a set of words, one for each generation which must enter into the clan names of all the boys of that generation. We have an old Christian whose "milk name" was "Little Beggar"; but his clan name, Yung-tsan, means "Gory-Effulgence"; and all his own boy cousins on his father's side have this Yung for the first monosyllable in their clan name. A contemptuous milk name is often given to fool the envious little gods whom they worship. Little Beggar was the first born son.

Cordially, J. E. Walker.

I will just add a paragraph.

Some more odd names! I have received word that a church in Massachusetts has called Mr. Moses to be its minister. Can you think of a more appropriate name for "the leader of the people?" Also I have seen in the Year Book of our Congregational churches that Mr. Bull was pastor of the church at Oxbow, Me.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

Plucky

By Patten Beard

Her real name was—but that really doesn't matter, for her chums, Bab and Amy, always called her "Plucky." And, for the matter of that, the family did too—from Daddy and Mother to Norah, the cook. She really was plucky!

This is the story of how she made a game—and as it is a true story, perhaps among your very own games you may have seen it. Never mind about that, however, for I shall tell you how Plucky made the game and it doesn't much matter what its name is, does it?

It happened this way: one summer day that was all warm and lazy with clear blue sky, Bab and Amy and Plucky were swinging together in the couch-hammock upon the veranda, discussing ways and means of raising money in vacation days. Bab and Amy were blessed with broods of chickens that they cared for and raised—and sold to the markets. It was Plucky who had no way to fill her pocket-book. The three were discussing the problem when suddenly Amy suggested that they play a game.

"Nonsense!" returned Plucky. "What I want to do now is to have you two help me! I can't keep chickens or raise rabbits, for Daddy and Mother veto it."

"Well, it's the best thing I have to suggest," interrupted Bab. "We make quite a good nest-egg for our bank account." She put her hand into her pocket and drew out a purse. "Besides money for fun," she added.

Plucky sighed. "Well, go get the game, Amy," she said, finally. "Maybe we'll think of something while we're busy playing."

Soon the three were spinning the counter and full in the heat of contest. But right here, just as it came the critical moment and Plucky was winning, she jumped clear out of the hammock and upset the board. "My stars!" she cried, "I've got it—I know how I'll earn some money!"

Amy looked at her reproachfully as she picked up the fallen game. "What?" she asked.

"You wait," answered Plucky. "You just wait! The only real trouble is that I've never had many drawing lessons—but I can try anyhow!"

Nothing could persuade her to tell the secret of what it was. All she said was, "Wait!"

Next morning, bright and early, Bab and Amy hurried over expectantly. They rushed up to Plucky's door as usual, only to find it closed. And upon it was a large piece of paper marked with big letters:

UNDER PENALTY, DON'T DISTURB!
GENIUS IS BURNING!

Did that do any good? Well, of course not! The two pounded—and they besought entrance. Never a word came from behind that door! At last, after a long time, they went away more curious than before—and just a bit put out and cross. "She might have answered," Bab murmured reproachfully.

Well, this same thing happened next day and next, but nobody knew what was happening. If they had even seen Plucky sitting, Turk-fashion on her floor in front of a big piece of white cardboard, they would not have guessed—no, never!

How They Do It

An Exchange of Methods in Church Work

Combine Services of Church and School

OLIVET, ST. PAUL, MINN., during the months of June, July and August, is combining the services of morning worship and that of the church school. The service begins promptly at 10.30 and closes promptly at noon. The order of the exercises is as follows:

10.30—Opening Exercises.

11.00—Beginners' and Primary Department teachers and children dismissed to their rooms.

11.05—The Morning Message.

11.25—Bible School announcements.

11.30—Bible study by classes. Junior and Intermediate Departments dismissed to their regular class rooms. Senior and Adult Departments remain in the church auditorium.

12.00—Closing signal.

A Different Men's Class

A Men's Class that is different and that has met with splendid success has been in operation at Deansboro, N. Y., during the past winter, under the direction of its pastor, Rev. E. J. Ruliffson. The Deansboro church has had a regulation Men's Class for a good many years. If the conditions were favorable three or four men usually attended. The class was using the International Lessons, as they had been doing for years. The thought occurred to the pastor, Why always study about a people who lived thousands of years ago on the other side of the sea? Why not consider some of the things which Jehovah has done and planned for Smith and Jones in the United States of America, as well?

The section of the state in which Deansboro is situated is entirely rural; and Mr. Ruliffson determined to see if his men would not be interested in a real study of rural matters. So, from such odds and ends as were at hand, he began to work out a series of lessons on "The Rural Basis of the Kingdom." He writes:

"I have had to plan the course from the ground up; and that is what I am doing, for we began with the soil, taking up 'The Purpose of the Soil,' 'Man's Place on the Soil,' 'Hebrew Land Tenure,' 'Old English Land Tenure,' 'Later English Land Tenure,' 'Colonial Land System,' 'Later Land System,' 'Our Public Domain,' 'Social Meaning of the Land' and 'Physical Social Environment.' The lessons are based upon Scripture texts found here and there through the Bible. We apply the principles of social and economic justice revealed in these texts to the fundamental land problems. The main theme of the lessons has been that men are on the soil as the social trustees of the gifts of Jehovah."

The second quarter of the year dealt with "Pioneers of Rural Life," studies in the life, work and teachings of rural leaders both in and out of the Bible. Instead of three or four in the class, the attendance quickly rose to 15 or 20, bringing in men who had not been in the Sunday school for years.

Mr. Ruliffson is especially well fitted to carry on such an experiment for a Men's Class. He has a farm of his own, has made quite an extensive study of agriculture, is something of a farm adviser as well as preacher to the community, and has been editor of rural departments in two different publications. During the war Mr. Ruliffson was in the agricultural service, and while continuing his preaching, went about the country during the week, taking up with the farmers and communities war-time production and organization. He also taught agriculture in an army camp under the Y. M. C. A.

Mr. Ruliffson's guiding idea in this series of lessons is given in the following, which he calls "The Farmer's Creed":

> I believe that the soil which God made is our greatest natural resource; that the proper conservation of its fertility and the maintenance of a good home upon it are my most important social services as a farmer. I believe that work upon the soil is a co-operation with the Creator in a complete yet ever continued creation; that it is the oldest, most useful, honorable and enjoyable employment of man; and that when undertaken in the right spirit it calls forth the best that is in him. I believe that better farming should mean better living; that its most valuable product is the character it develops in the farmer; and that its greatest rewards are the satisfactions it gives. I believe in a better selection of both plants and animals; in a more perfect adaptation of crops to the soil; in a more rational rotation and diversification of such; and in more effective cultivation and fertilization.

A Newsy Calendar

FIRST, WILLIMANTIC, CT., of which Rev. H. S. McCready is pastor, carries on the first page of its weekly calendar the legend, "A Church of the Open Mind, the Warm Heart, the Aspiring Soul." It also has the suggestive title for its parish house, "The House of Brotherhood." This calendar is different from most, in that it prints not only church notices but items of news about the people of the congregation and also helpful quotations, as, for instance, this which appeared just before Easter: "The experiences of the war have demonstrated anew that the progress of humanity is dependent not alone upon social organization but upon the strength of the moral emotions and the discipline of character. Now that the war is over the Church should return to its historic functions of Christian nurture, evangelism and religious education, with new sanctions, and a sure knowledge that its ministry to the inner life and to the building of character is its greatest contribution to social welfare."

A Junior Church Service

ETIWANDA, CAL., always much interested in its young people, has an unusually efficient Church shcool. This year with some trepidation a junior church service was introduced. This has now passed the experiment stage and has demonstrated its real value.

Two hours are allowed for the morning religious service. At ten there is a brief opening praise service. Thirty-five minutes are given for classes and at 10.45 the entire church from primary to adults, joins in the service of worship. A junior sermon is the special feature of this part of the program. At 11.15 the children withdraw during the singing of a hymn. The Scripture reading and prayer follows; then the pastor gives his morning message to the adults. Meanwhile the Juniors have met downstairs for the remainder of their service. The faithful work of the pastor and his wife is clearly demonstrated in the Young People's organization which meets each Sunday evening. The program includes study groups and an open forum discussion of present problems.

Rev. C. W. Greenlee, after service overseas with the "Y," has continued with new effectiveness his five years' pastorate in this field.

A Missionary Palaver

A woman from each of the religious denominations in a town near Boston was recently asked to inform herself on the welfare and missionary work of her particular denomination in the vicinity. It was a rather large order, to be sure, but the women were given plenty of time to get the data together. The denominations which entered into this survey happened to be Baptist, Methodist, Episcopal, Unitarian, Roman Catholic and Congregational.

A union meeting of the women's organizations was arranged, to be held at the Congregational church, with Mrs. D., who planned all this, in charge. On the platform were grouped seven chairs, with a table at one side with some flowers on it to give the appearance of a living room. Mrs. D., the hostess, came in with Mrs. M., another Congregational lady, as her house guest, telling Mrs. M. she had invited in for the afternoon some friends who were interested in the same things she was and that they were going to have a missionary palaver. On being asked just what a palaver was, Mrs. M. was told that for them it meant a gathering for the friendly discussion of local mission work. When the guests arrived Mrs. D. introduced each lady and told what denomination each one represented. The Roman Catholic lady was an enthusiastic member of the League of Catholic Women.

By asking a question the hostess started one of the women talking. Each woman was given six or seven minutes to talk uninterruptedly, separated by a few minutes in which the others would speak about what their denominations were doing along similar lines. In this informal way an hour was easily filled, and at the close a number of questions were asked from the floor. Afterwards all were invited to have tea together. It was amazing to have it brought to mind so vividly how much work was being done by each group along similar lines. Every one pronounced the palaver a great success.

It was realized that the talk would be far better if it were spontaneous; therefore but one rehearsal was held at which the entrances and opening conversations were planned, and the ladies talked for awhile to see if the program could be carried out. It was soon seen that a question now and then from the hostess was all that was needed.

WASHINGTON

Rev. Henry M. Bissell

Rev. H. M. Bissell, for 18 years a missionary in Mexico under the A. B. C. F. M., died June 1, at the home of his sons, W. G. and A. N. Bissell, in Port Angeles, Wash. Rev. Mr. Bissell was born in 1848 at a mission station of the American Board among the Choctaw Indians in the then Indian Territory. He was graduated from Wheaton College, Ill., in 1873 and in 1877 married Ella Norwood of Harford, N. Y., who survives him. He was ordained to the ministry in the Congregational Church of Harford.

Mr. Bissell's missionary work commenced under the American Board at Guadalahara, Mex., in 1882, where he remained nine years. After a brief rest in the homeland he was transferred to Fuerte on the west coast of Mexico. In 1900 he left the foreign field, settling in Corning, Cal., and in 1909 was called to conduct home missionary work among the Mexicans in Pomona, Cal. Later he was engaged in like work at Bakersfield, Cal. In February, 1920, he removed to the state of Washington with Mrs. Bissell to spend his declining years with his sons. The end came after a three weeks' illness brought on by an attack of acute indigestion, followed by congestion of the heart. He leaves his wife, Ella Norwood Bissell, a daughter, Mrs. C. E. Crawford, of Vernon Center, Ct., and three sons, William G. and Alden N. Bissell of Port Angeles, Wash, and Rev. Henry M. Bissell of Gallup, N. M.

Significant Ingathering at Portland Church

Easter Sunday was a day of special significance for Atkinson Memorial, Portland, because more new members were received at this time than on any previous occasion. Nineteen came on confession and three by letter. The church feels much pleased with the work of the pastor, Rev. E. E. Flint, who has been there just a year.

CALIFORNIA

Pomona Young People

Pilgrim, Pomona, has added 39 members since Jan. 1. The working force has been increased by the appointment of Mr. Hubert Whitehead as religious and social worker among the young people. This work is being carried on at present through three organizations, two of them with good Congregational names—the Pilgrim Clan, the Mayflower Fellowship and the Camp Fire Girls. The Clan takes the place of the former Young People's Society, gathering for a religious service on Sundays an hour before the evening church meeting. The Mayflower Fellowship finds its membership in an older group and is chiefly a social organization.

Under the vigorous pastorate of Rev. W. O. Wark, this church at Pomona is making a large place for itself in the community. Many eastern visitors made Pilgrim their church home during their California sojourn. S. E. B.

Plummer Now Has Full Time Pastor

Plummer, under the ministry of Rev. F. A. Brown, is in a more flourishing condition than ever before. As a result of a revival, conducted by a lay evangelist, 25 were received into the church recently on confession. The people have more than doubled their subscription toward the support of the pastor, enabling him to give them his whole time instead of half.

Wallace Membership Almost Doubled

New life has come into the Wallace church through the ministry of Rev. T. C. Peterson, the attendance at church services and in the Church school having greatly increased. A flourishing Christian Endeavor Society has been developed, and the mid-week prayer meetings are well attended. The membership of the church was doubled Easter Sunday, with the accession of 40 new members. J. E.

Lewis Church Observes Sixty-Fifth Birthday

The 65th anniversary of the church at LEWIS and the 66th annual meeting of the Council Bluffs' Association was held recently in the Lewis Church. Ministers, delegates and visitors were present from out of town. The anniversary sermon was given by the pastor of Lewis, Rev. Samuel Unger, on April 11. Letters were read from a number of absent members and from two former pastors. These letters, together with reminiscences from Miss Harriet Howard, Mrs. Luella Cotton, both of whom are old residents, and Mr. J. C. Cary of Atlantic who at the age of seven years came to Lewis with his parents a few months after the church was organized, and reminiscences from a number of others, and addresses by Rev. B. F. Muers, who recently completed a ten-year pastorate with the church, by the present pastor, Rev. S. L. Unger, by Rev. B. F. Myers, and by Rev. H. D. Herr, made a program interesting, appealing and full of practical truth.

The general theme of the Association program was "The Interchurch World Movement," and was developed by well prepared and ably delivered addresses. Open discussions followed the addresses.

Marshalltown Church Open Each Day

MARSHALLTOWN, Rev. B. F. Martin, pastor, loaned its minister for two months so that he might become one of the five directors in the financial campaign of the Interchurch World Movement. The pulpit was supplied and the church assistant, Miss Clara Mable Nelson, was in charge of the work. The entire church coöperated in a splendid way and raised its apportionment in the canvass May 2. Twenty-five were received into church membership on Easter Sunday. Sixty-five young people have attained an average quarterly grade of 90 per cent. since the adoption of the scholarship standard last October, which includes the grading of weekly recitations and written quarterly tests. The church is open every day from eight A. M. to 5.30 P. M. and evenings.

INDIANA

Takes up New Duties at First, Terre Haute

Rev. J. W. Herring, who has just begun the pastorate of FIRST, TERRE HAUTE, came from Woodstock, Ill., where he rendered both church and community valuable service. He was particularly successful in strengthening the work of Religious Education in the church and planned and carried into successful operation a community forum and a community Institute of Religious Education. He has also been vitally interested in the social workings of the gospel and was able to take a leading part in the adjustment of a strike in Woodstock and the securing of an organization of a shop committee, a plan which was up to that time an innovation in the Woodstock factory.

Mr. Herring received his college training at Oberlin and at Columbia University and took his theological work at Oberlin and Chicago Seminaries. During his training, he served at Elyria, O., Courtland St., Chicago, and was assistant pastor of Bryn Mawr Community, Chicago. He is the son of Secretary Herring of the National Council.

Addition to Jacksonville Church

On the afternoon of June 15 ground was formally broken for the addition to the church at JACKSONVILLE. The officers of the various departments each dug one spade of earth. After the service, the work was turned over to the contractor and his men, with the request that the building be pushed forward as rapidly as possible in order to be ready for the fall work. The enlargement, which joins the present Sunday school rooms and is three stories high, is made necessary by the growth of the various departments, especially the social and club life and the work in religious education. After passing obstacles that seemed insurmountable, the church is happy that the actual work has begun.

In the Southeast

Dr. Keller New District Superintendent

Dr. L. H. Keller, formerly superintendent of the Wisconsin Conference, began his service under the Congregational Home Missionary Society for the district of the southeast on May 15. He has taken up his residence in Atlanta, Ga.

Since Dr. Keller left Wisconsin nearly two years ago, he has acted as pastor ad interim of Harrison Ave., Oklahoma City, and has served as Regional Director under the Congregational World Movement for the district of the Central South, with headquarters at Kansas City.

Dr. Keller brings to the superintendency of this great district a wealth of experience gained from fruitful years as a pastor and an unusual experience as an administrator. He is a graduate of Adrian College, Mich., and of Yale Seminary. His first work was at Edgerton, Wis., where during his pastorate a church was organized and a new house of worship erected. He then served as pastor of Lyndale Ave. Church, Minneapolis, successfully leading the church through a difficult period in its history, after which he was called to Pilgrim, Milwaukee, Wis. His work in Milwaukee was a period of fruitfulness and of steady growth in the membership and organization of the church. He next served at Fond du Lac, Wis., where he led in the erection of a beautiful, modern, well-equipped house of worship, the former building having been destroyed by fire. While in Fond du Lac, the State Conference of Wisconsin voted to launch out on a larger state program. Dr. Keller served on the committee of reorganization, afterward being chosen Superintendent of the Conference, where he served with acceptance for six years.

He is a man of unbounded enthusiasm and sane optimism. He reads widely and deeply. He has ever kept abreast with the times. As a preacher, he is vigorous in his thinking and delivery, careful in his preparation. While in the pastorate, suggestions of change, even though the rewards offered were great, did not tempt him. He remained at his post until his task was done. He built himself into communities and cities. He lived with his people until there developed the rich life friendships such as a minister can know. That he is an organizer and administrator of unusual ability and skill is evidenced by the development under his direction of Congregational activities in Wisconsin. While in that state, Ripon College conferred upon him the degreee of Doctor of Divinity.

In the South, he succeeds Dr. G. R. Merrill, who has given two most active years of service since the resignation of Rev. W. H. Hopkins, in 1918. Dr. Keller's loyalty to denominational ideals and program, his ability in dealing with weak churches and problems that require skill in organization, and his unusual qualities as brotherly adviser to the ministers in the smaller places, render him exceptionally well fitted for the responsible task. His district includes all that is commonly known as old Dixie. Not only will Congregational interests in the South be well looked after under his administration, but Interchurch activities will be furthered because of his broad and generous spirit and his belief in the fundamental principles which underlie questions of fellowship and comity.

HISTORY

"All that mankind has done, thought, gained, or been, it is lying as in magic preservation in the pages of books. They are the choice possession of men."
—Carlyle.

THE MAYFLOWER PILGRIMS

The author is a descendant of Alice Carpenter, wife of Governor Bradford of the Plymouth Colony, and has based this volume on the Bradford manuscript which was recovered from England in 1897 and is now sacredly preserved in the State House at Boston.

"Its easy picturesque style will refresh the memory, illumine some old disputed points and make vivid again that story which to some is unmatched because so full of human interest and social, political and religious 'beginnings.' These 'beginnings,' it will be remembered, had an influence which has imbedded itself into the lives of our American people."—The Churchman.

THE REBIRTH OF KOREA

The Reawakening of the People: Its Causes, and the Outlook
By HUGH HEUNG-WO CYNN, Principal Pai Chai Haktung, Seoul, Korea

"The entrance into English literature, and before the American public, of the Korean who wields such a facile and trenchant pen, is an event of no small importance in the literary and political, as well as the religious world. One of the elements of strength and durability, is the chastened self-control of the writer. The book is bound to be an epoch-maker and to bring the pressure of the world's enlightened opinion to bear upon Japan."

Live Prayer Meeting at Newark Church

That the prayer meeting is not a dead organization at Belleville Ave., Newark, is evident from the fact that the attendance for the past season averaged about 85. This record for good attendance has not been confined to the prayer meeting, for preaching services and Sunday school also have large audiences. The church received 15 new members up to the middle of March and since that time more have joined. Recently a prominent New York business man, looking for a church home, said he went about visiting churches and finally made up his mind that Belleville Ave. was the church he wanted most to join.

To show his appreciation of the good work being done by the pastor, Rev. R. F. Wicks, one of the members of the church presented him with a beautiful house in Newark.

Upper Montclair Pressing Forward

Upper Montclair, under the leadership of Dr. J. T. Stocking, is doing a splendid work. The following items give a conservative report of some of the marks of progress at this church:

1—Redecorating the church, thereby softening the color scheme.

2—Installing Tiffany windows which Mr. Tiffany says are the best that he has ever made, these in memory of those who served and fell in the war. These windows were dedicated Easter Day when three trees were planted on the church lawn to the three who fell in service.

3—Subscribing more than $52,000 to the Pilgrim Fund.

4—Subscribing between $11,000 and $12,000 to the Congregational World Movement. The quota was about $8,000.

5—Receiving 51 members at Easter this year, making 70 since the new year. The membership is now 800.

The treatise here published for the first time from a MS of the Bodleian Library not only contains the answer of John Robinson's friend but also quotes a large part of Robinson's own argument in defense of his separation from the Church of England. It is full of sharp and learned discussion, and may well be the only document of any length relating to the Pastor of the Pilgrim Fathers left hitherto unprinted.

Mr. Champlin Burrage's discovery of the work has made it possible to bring it out at this appropriate time of the Tercentenary of the Landing of Robinson's flock at Plymouth.

Plainfield Again Wins Banner

At the annual meeting of Plainfield reports showed the church to be in a strong condition. It oversubscribed its quota of $2,200 for the Congregational World Movement by $2,100. A larger budget has been adopted for the present year, with special new appropriations for the Boy Scouts and Young Women's Missionary Society. The minister's salary was raised $750. A Campfire group, started recently, now has its full quota of members.

Plainfield has received 33 new members since Jan. 1, 1920. The Sunday school has recently won the 1920 Tercentenary banner for all schools of the country for the third year in succession, which signifies that it leads the country for the largest per capita contribution to missions.

Large Increase During Mr. Blyth's Pastorate

Eight persons were received into Archwood Ave., Cleveland, Rev. R. B. Blyth, pastor, on June 27, three of them on confession. This makes a total of 128 received during the first six months of this year and 403 new members since the beginning of the present pastorate less than three years ago. Approximately three-quarters of this number have been received on confession of faith, and for the most part they have been people over 20 years of age.

A New Property for White Plains Church

The White Plains congregation of Westchester has just completed arrangements for the purchase of the property of Mr. B. H. Fancher, contiguous to the church, at a cost of $40,000, most of which has already been subscribed. Although the property would have brought a much higher price in the open market, Mr. Fancher, who is a member of the White Plain congregation, offered the house and land at this low figure, besides making a substantial contribution toward the purchase price himself.

The Fancher property consists of one and a quarter acres with frontage on both Ridgeview and Midlands Aves., and a large, well-built residence. While the ultimate aim is a group of new church buildings which will adequately meet the social, educational and religious needs of the church, for the present the house can be used to provide the much needed space for the Sunday school and social activities of the church.

The directors of the Church Building Society have made it possible, through a substantial loan at a low rate of interest, for the church to acquire the property at once, even though a good part of the subscriptions toward the payment will run over a period of five years; and possession will be taken on Sept. 1. Two Memorials Dedicated in Brooklyn

Tompkins Ave., Brooklyn, recently paid special tribute to the life and ministry of Dr. R. R. Meredith, builder and for 15 years pastor of the church, by unveiling a portrait memorial bronze tablet in his honor. Among the congregation which taxed the large church to its capacity, were parishioners and friends of Dr. Meredith from all over the city, as well as 300 members of the Sunday school and a delegation from U. S. Grant Post, G. A. R., of which he was a comrade.

The tablet was unveiled by Mr. A. G. Cooper, president of the Board of Trustees, who paid a beautiful tribute to Dr. Meredith, dwelling at length on the great work which he had done through the church and the deep admiration and affection in which he was held by all who knew him. The dedicatory address was given by Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, whose address was a splendid description of the character of Dr. Meredith, who, he declared, was "a commanding figure in church affairs with a reputation for clear thinking and courage, and whose every utterance contained a challenge which was recognized by friend and foe alike."

Others taking part in the ceremonies were Dr. J. P. Huget and Rev. A. C. Church, pastor and assistant pastor of the church, Rev. W. D. Street of White Plains, and Dr. J. M. Farrar.

On the same afternoon at Plymouth Church a stained-glass window was unveiled in the Sunday school room in memory of the late Dr. R. W. Raymond, for many years superintendent of the school; this was followed by the dedication of four trees in front of Plymouth Institute in memory of the four Plymouth men who died in service during the World War. Dr. Hillis spoke at both exercises. B. A.

CONNECTICUT

United, Bridgeport, Near Its Goal

At the time of the union of the two Bridgeport churches, First and Second, a thorough revision of the rolls was made. At one time 112 names of absentees were placed on the retired list. On Jan. 1, 1917, the membership of United Church was 888; on Jan. 1, 1918, 900; Jan. 1, 1919, 1,062; Jan. 1, 1920, 1,292, and on the 225th anniversary, June 13, 1920, 1,444, including 106 in the Italian Branch as well as those who will ultimately become members of the Bethany Branch. On Jan. 1, 1919, the Men's Membership Committee suggested as a membership goal 500 additions in two years. So far 439 have been received.

East Woodstock Has Missionary Pageant

East Woodstock, Rev. H. M. Lawson, pastor, received 14 into membership at an impressive service July 4, 12 on confession. The church has not only raised its full missionary apportionment but has also subscribed its full quota for the Congregational World Movement, making a contribution of $550 to missions from this rather small church. It also oversubscribed to the Pilgrim Fund last year.

Contributions are still flowing steadily into the office of

The Pilgrim Memorial Fund

The record of the week, June 19 to 25, was $11,987 received in new pledges, of which $6,000 came from New York, $3,909 from the First Church, Washington, D. C., thereby carrying the District of Columbia over the top, and $310 in the form of 16 pledges from the church at Valdez, Alaska. Massachusetts and Connecticut each contributed over $500 in new pledges and Southern California $375.

Every dollar contributed to the Pilgrim Memorial Fund will help to make the old age of some minister of the Church of Christ contented and comfortable. Those who love the church and its ministry can send their gifts to the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, 375 Lexington Avenue, New York City, or place in their wills a generous bequest as an evidence of affection.

The four Congregational churches of Woodstock and two Baptist churches are holding union evening services occasionally with large attendance and great interest. A parade of all the Sunday schools in town was held June 20, when about 300 went about town in automobiles and drew up at Woodstock Hill where a beautiful missionary pageant was held.

Resolution on Sunday Sports

At the annual meeting of the Worcester Central Association, held in May, a resolution concerning Sunday sports was introduced by Rev. W. W. Jordan of Clinton. When an adequate opportunity for presenting the views of those who were inclined to disagree with the resolution was denied, a motion to lay on the table until a future meeting was defeated by a vote of 32 to 28. The resolution was then called for by the proponents and was carried by a vote of 42 to 27. Whether the vote actually represents the sentiment of the churches of the Association may be uncertain, inasmuch as the delegates, as is usually the case in such meetings, were chiefly from the older and more conservative element of the churches. The resolution is as follows:

> We, the members of the Worcester Central Association of Churches, believe Sunday sports to be contrary to the clearly expressed divine will and law, and to the highest interests of our Christian churches and religion. We also believe that to give sports public approval by legalizing them, is both wrong, and an especially unwise action in the present disturbed and threatening condition of the world.

Dr. Hooke at Second, Chicopee

Second, Chicopee, had a memorable service Sunday, June 27, when Dr. Burford Hooke, a delegate to the International Council and at one time Chairman of the English Congregational Union, was present and preached the sermon, a stirring discourse based on the rich experience of his life. After the sermon 19 new members were received into the church, the service ending with the observance of communion at which Dr. Hooke and the pastor officiated. The pastor of Second is Rev. T. P. Haig, a young Scotchman, who is endowed with power as a preacher and possesses an intensely sympathetic spirit.

Anniversary of Union, North Reading

Union, North Reading, observed its 200th anniversary during the week of June 20–27. The exercises included a church supper, followed by a good-fellowship meeting, when greetings from the mother church at Wakefield, from sister churches, and from the denomination were received. On Sunday an historical address was delivered in the morning by the pastor, Rev. F. W. Walsh. At the evening service the anniversary sermon was preached by Rev. H. J. Chidley of Winchester.

This church was organized June 29, 1720. While not having made remarkable achievement by way of expansion numerically speaking, and while most of its history has been that of a struggling church it has, nevertheless, during the two centuries been a force for righteousness in the community. It has been served by 18 ministers during its long history. The first minister was Rev. Daniel Putnam, whose successor was Rev. Eliot Stone. Direct descendants of both of these men still live in North Reading.

In 1892 the Methodists and Congregationalists of North Reading consolidated to form what has since been known as the Union Congregational Church The church has grown in proportion as the town has grown in population, which growth has been gradual, but it has always been aggressive in spirit and has held a worthy place in the confidence of town and state. For the first two years it has nearly doubled its apportionment and last year it exceeded its quota for the Pilgrim Fund. It expects in the fall at least to raise its quota for the Congregational World Movement. The past year it has made extensive improvements in the church and parsonage grounds and has redecorated the interior of the vestry.

MAINE

Among the Portland Churches

Stevens Ave., Portland, Rev. Herbert McCann, pastor, dedicated its new vestry June 11. A new kitchen has been included and a beautiful scheme of interior decoration has been carried out. The remarkable thing is that all has been done by the actual labor of members of the church, with the exception of only eight days of paid labor. The church has been making progress during the past few years and has a good field for future development.

St. Lawrence, Portland, Rev. Robert Bruce, pastor, has been trying out the motion picture idea, as a wholesome week-night recreation for the Munjoy Hill part of the city. The church is rendering a community service by this means, and making friends for itself, and the enterprise is more than self-supporting.

The new pastor of West, Portland, Rev. Roy Packard, has taken strong hold of the situation and has been especially successful with his social program for the young people. The outlook for West seems particularly encouraging.

F., who resigned from Oak Hill and Bryn Hyfryd, O., to take up work at Suttons Bay and Omena, Mich., was tendered a farewell reception and presented with a generous sum of money as a small token of the esteem and affection with which the churches and community hold him and his family. Mr. Davies has been the Moderator of the Central South Ohio Association.

DEKAY, G. H., has been appointed Director of the Service Club at Ft. McDowell on Angel Island, San Francisco Bay. Mr. DeKay has been with the Interchurch World Movement as Director of Survey work and more recently as District Director of the Financial Campaign in Nevada and several mountain counties of California. Previous to this he was in war work with the "Y," serving as Transport Secretary for two years. It was on his record and experience in this service that he was appointed to the welfare work which is now conducted under government auspices.

FISHER, C. W. pastor of First, Stockbridge, Mass., recently received a gift of $200 from his church.

HITCHCOCK, L. P., has resigned from Neighborhood, Pasadena, Cal., at the close of ten years of service with this church, to fulfill a resolution he made with himself some years ago, namely, that he would give at least two years of the most active years of his life to service in the Home Mission Field. At the farewell reception given by the church, Mr. and Mrs. Hitchcock were presented with a purse of $1,428, $1,018 of which is to be invested in a paid-up membership in the Pilgrim Fund. This generous gift of the church is made in addition to its gift to the Pilgrim Fund which amounted to 33 1-3 per cent. more than its quota.

HODGDON, T. M., West Hartford, Ct., was the recipient of $1,135 at the recent annual meeting—the gift of his people to a well-beloved and highly esteemed pastor. It will be used to secure for him an annuity in the ministerial annuity fund.

ISAACS, L. M., has recently closed a seven years' pastorate at Orwell, Vt., to take up rural work in Collbran, Col., for which he has developed special fitness. The membership at Orwell has increased 40 per cent., and a community program has been created that has attracted attention through the country.

MAKEPEACE, F. B., has recently filled an engagement for three months as interim pastor of the church at Collinsville, Ct. On Easter Sunday five persons joined Collinsville and 13 were proposed for membership in the Young People's Society.

POPE, H. W., has resigned his position at Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, after 13 years of service. Eight and one-half of these years were spent as superintendent of the Men's Department.

RAHILL, J. W., and MRS. RAHILL, Central, Topeka, Kan., were recently given a reception in the church parlors at the beginning of Mr. Rahill's pastorate of Central. In the receiving line were Rev. and Mrs. C. M. Sheldon, whose presence served to give cordial welcome and promise of hearty good will to Mr. and Mrs. Rahill. Rev. and Mrs. E. M. Umbach and the deacons and officers of the church also welcomed the guests of the evening. Mr. Rahill commences his ministry in this important church under happy auspices, Dr. Sheldon vying with the church to give him every consideration and hearty support. A favorable impression has been made upon the church and city by Mr. Rahill, and it is confidently expected that the significant ministry of Central to the denomination and the city of Topeka will be continued under his efficient and happy leadership.

Object for Intercession

For the People Who Have No Vacation:

Remember, O Lord who hast made the world as it is and not as we might dream of it, those who are under great responsibilities and have little rest. Make their sleep sweet. Give them courageous and contented hearts, assured that they are in the great partnership of thy purpose. And cheer them with thy presence, Thou who art the companion of all needful toil and the helper of all to whom others look for help. Bless especially the weary mothers in their care of helpless children and those who work to make home possible for wives and little ones. And teach us how to shape our life so that there shall be better opportunity and more of needful rest for every one. And these things we ask in the name of him who toiled to make possible the home in Nazareth where his mother might be in peace and his brothers and his sisters grow to strength.—R.

Our Ten-Thousand-Dollar Ministers

Dear Mr. Editor:

A keen man of affairs and a good Congregationalist was telling of the success of his church, financially and otherwise. He said, "The thing for a church to do is to get a five-thousand-dollar man, and the business end of the work will go all right!"

I began to wonder whether we must have that kind of a minister in all the little towns and big cities of our country before the church can prosper. So I began to look over my past five months of travel in the campaign of the Pilgrim Fund, to see if I had met any of the five-thousand-dollar variety of Christian ministers. The review resulted in the surprising discovery that a majority of our quietest and least known Congregational ministers may be classed as ten-thousand-dollar men!

Men should be classed, not by their salaries, but by their gifts and sacrifices. About three-quarters of the ministers I have met in the parsonages of Massachusetts are men who, besides giving seven years of time to the preparation for the ministry, and sacrificing the first ten thousand dollars of life's earnings by going without those earnings, have deliberately renounced several times ten thousand dollars by refusing to leave the ministry for better pay.

When men of business fully comprehend the size of the gift that ministers make to the church, they will stop betting on the "five-thousand-dollar man" in the pulpit, and will look with more favor upon the ten-thousand-dollar variety—backed by a self-appointed band of business men who are willing to cultivate the same spirit of sacrifice.

It is hard for any one of us to be publicly classed with the five-thousand-dollar pastors and still keep up the genuine ten-thousand-dollar quality. I like the attitude of my old pastor—the only pastor I ever had—who never let his wage be known outside of the cabinet of his officers. He was a priceless man! I like those reports in our Congregational Year Book where a cipher stands in the column of salaries, leaving the impression that the pastor of that church cannot be had for gold.

Country Parson.

Action is the affirmation of belief, but also its begetter. I believe because I act.—Sedgwick.

It is good for us all to refrain from harsh and hasty judgment of our fellow men and to imitate what Francis of Assisi calls "the great courtesy of God, who maketh his sun to shine and his rain to fall upon the just and upon the unjust."—Henry van Dyke.

Along the Council Trail

Some impressions of America gleaned from conversation with our overseas delegates. "America must be an awful place to be poor in." "Your country is nothing but a ferocious series of new impacts upon my consciousness." "I love the Boston streets more than anything I have seen over here. They have atmosphere."

Among those who rendered important valuable and much appreciated service to the hundreds of church delegates to the Council were Mr. Albert W. Fell, the business manager of the Pilgrim Press, as chairman of the Hotel Committee. He and his Pilgrim Press associates helped in many ways to get delegates located and aided in solving a great variety of their personal problems.

Principal Garvie's speech has a pronounced and altogether delightful burr to it as heard by American ears. Hence this anecdote can be appreciated that came over with the British delegation to the effect that on one occasion in connection with his professorial duties he was criticizing the sermon of a student in the theological college. "You have an accent" he said, "a very pronounced accent. You must work on that, my boy. And you mustn't get discouraged. If you work hard, you can conquer it. I know from experience. I once had an accent myself."

Henry A. Atkinson of the World Alliance of Churches, who sailed for the Balkans the day after his address at the Council in the Old South Church told this story to illustrate the strange readiness with which sometimes we criticize our friends. There was an Italian fruit vendor. One morning the policeman had to interfere in a rumpus that was inaugurated as another Italian came up to the fruit stand and soon was pummeling the proprietor right merrily. "Here, what's the matter, you guys?" he roared as he pulled off the assailant. "Has he assaulted you? Have you had any trouble?" "No, no," swiftly and amazedly answered the Italian. "No trouble. No 'sault. No nothin'. Why, he's my frien'!"

The story delightfully involving the president of the Council was going the rounds of some of the American delegates at the expense of a bright young parson in Connecticut. He went to Yale Divinity School Commencement with a desire to be affable and Christianly courteous to all the alumni brethren young or old. Finding himself in juxtaposition to an elderly gentleman of distinguished appearance at a reception one afternoon in a professor's house, he said to himself, "I'll try to put him at ease." So he opened conversation with the perfectly safe remark, "Good afternoon. I'm glad to meet you. And let me see; where are you now?" The gentleman answered quietly, "In the same old place. I am still Dr. James L. Barton, senior secretary of the American Board."

Rev. W. Blackshaw of London tells of a cattle dealer who became mayor of his town, but who both before, during and after his official incumbency was generously addicted to strong drink. On one occasion our American ambassador, Mr. Bayard, came to this town to make some official presentation. The cattleman-mayor having in the morning appropriately and bibulously celebrated the honor of welcoming an American of high station, was hardly a perfect master of his tongue by the time afternoon arrived. So with confused recollections of the speech he supposed he had committeed to memory, he arose and solemnly extended his congratulations "to our illustriated guest, Mr. Bayard, the American ambassador!"

The fitful flame of Scotch humor burns in none of our overseas visitors more deliciously than in Prin. A. J. Grieve of the Theological College at Edinburg. When I was entertaining him with a genuine American shore dinner and was trying to explain to him what a clam chowder would be, he instantly responded, "Ah, I see. It's just an old-fashioned Irish stew but with mussels in it." One of his stories is of the two Scotch preachers who set about the ungracious task of preaching against each other. The Baptist brother had the first move and attacked the Congregational parson and church from the text, "Beware of dogs." The next week it was the Congregationalist's turn and he based his polemic masterpiece on the text, "Beware of divers!"

Dr. R. F. Horton is youthful at sixty-two years of age. Recently he plunged for the first time into a matrimonial adventure when he took unto himself with arithmetic appropriateness, a charming English girl of twenty-six. Not long after they were married, so the tale runs, he started out to meet some preaching engagement on a very rainy day. His careful spouse prevailed upon him to don a pair of long lumberman's rubber boots coming up to his hips to protect himself from the wet. He arrived, went into the pulpit and delivered one of his inspiring sermons without taking off the glistening pantaloons of rubber. As he came down out of the pulpit some one asked him, "Why did you keep those boots on in the pulpit?" "Why?" he replied with charming naïveté, "I suppose it was because my wife had asked me to wear them."

Raymond Robins told of a conversation he once had with Henry Ford wherein the automobile manufacturer illustrated his social conviction that the way to make more profit in business is to render more service. "Did you ever go tobogganing, Robins?" When Mr. Robins admitted that he had, Mr. Ford continued, "And as you were just ready to push off down the hill, if there was a boy or girl standing nearby, didn't you sometimes ask them to jump on and have a ride?" Mr. Robins again pleaded guilty. "Why did you do it?" After thinking a moment, Raymond answered, "I suppose I wanted to do them a good turn." Instantly the shrewd master of industry snapped out, "No you didn't, Robins. You took them on because you knew that the more load the toboggan carried, the farther she would go. That's the way with my automobile. Every time I get more folks into my Ford, the bigger success she is. And whenever I lower her price twenty-five dollars, I get a new layer of folks into her."

But with ruler, pencil, paints, Plucky was working hard and it was no easy work either! Her cheeks were flushed and her fingers were smutty. But for a whole week she worked like this and then suddenly, on a late afternoon, she came racing over to the house where Bab and Amy were feeding their chickens. "It's done!" she panted. "I've finished it! It's a game and I'm going to try to sell it!"

The two stood transfixed. "A game!" they echoed.

"Sure! I thought of the idea when we were all playing that day. It's all drawn and painted like a real game! I'm going to sell it, if I can, to the same firm that made the one we had that time." She stated the fact as if it were really quite probable that the game would sell, but Bab and Amy had doubts.

"Whoever heard of anybody's making a game to sell?" they questioned. Their minds seemed to run wholly upon chickens! They doubted if even Plucky could make a game, though she was known to have ideas and also known to have taken a modest drawing prize at school.

But when the chickens were in the coop safely, then the three went over together to view the game. And what is more they took it down upon the porch and actually played it! Yes, it went all right and it was surely fun! The two, Bab and Amy, declared that Plucky had made a fortune and the family, who also heard about the game—they said they thought it would sell, too.

It was a great day when the game was expressed to the game publisher. And it was like years and years while they all waited for a letter that should send the check, of course!

But at last when everybody had almost given up hoping, except Plucky, perhaps, the letter marked with the firm's stamp arrived. Plucky tore it open. Her face fell for this is how it read:

> "The game has interested us but we are returning it, nevertheless. In its present form it is far too expensive to publish. A game of this shape would not pay us to publish, but you may be interested to know that your game is one of the most attractive ever submitted to us."

Hot tears struggled in Plucky's eyes but she wiped them off hurriedly. "It's nice of them to have said that," she smiled. "Anyhow, I had the fun of making it and we can always play it here at home." She took the game in its brown paper wrapping upstairs and somehow nobody wanted to undo it. Plucky gave it a boost under the bed where it was quite out of sight and the three turned to other things that day.

But there is no knowing how many times Plucky re-read that letter. When she went to bed, she saw the game lying there and it started the tears again, but after a while, maybe because she was really plucky, she thought of other things and went to sleep.

When she woke with the birds, there came the impulse to look at that game again. She slid out of bed and cut the cord—it did look like a good game! Why not write to the firm and ask that they let her change the shape if that was what was against the game? Why not, indeed! It would be quite possible, she reflected. And it didn't take long for Plucky to write that letter, I tell you! She was out before breakfast to mail it, though nobody knew where she had gone and nary a word did she breath concerning the game and its sad fate!

Four days passed and then came the reply:

> "We shall be glad to reconsider our decision and shall be glad to have you make your game into an oblong shape instead of a round one, like the enclosed lithograph we are sending you. We will pay our usual rates."

Well, that was just becauce Plucky was plucky, so Bab declared. Anyhow, the sign went back on the door and stayed there for another whole week while Plucky worked hard upon a new piece of cardboard and got her fingers all smutty and her cheeks all flushed while "genius burned."

The game was played again when done, and it was all right! It was sent off with jollifications too! The three celebrated with chocolate ice-cream soda and then returned to the hammock to talk about the event.

"I tell you," said Plucky, "what I'll do with the money. Half of it is going into the bank for a nest egg and with the other half—guess?"

They waited.

"Daddy and Mother are going to let me have the chickens," she beamed. "I'm going to have a splendid coop and the very best stock and I hope you'll teach me how to take care of the enterprise. Won't we have fun!"

Yes, it surely was fun when that check came, and lots more work when the independent business venture started. But one thing I know: the bank account grew that summer, and lots of children played Plucky's plucky game. There were others, too, after that, but that is another story!

nity tell the Superintendent of the Church school that you will be one to take the work if he will arrange a class. Or if that is impossible get the books anyway and study in your own home. The Educational Department at 14 Beacon St., Boston, will be glad to give you the tests and credits for work done. Write Rev. Frank F. Sheldon about it at the above address. Read little children. One little child companion is worth a thousand volumes on child nature. The writer owes it to a small brother who came into his home and for whose training he was personally responsible, for any working knowledge of child nature which he may possess.

2. Observe. Watch how other folks work. Sit in at some successful Church school class with a discerning eye for the failures as well as the successes.

3. Go ahead and do some one thing that lies within your powers. Do the next thing. Waiting for the big task is a lonesome job. Just go to it and do the thing that lies next to you waiting to be done. Don't wait to be asked. It may be to open a window and let a little air on the preacher's sermon! It may be to do a very simple task. But the main thing is to do it! It may be to prepare a room for a meeting. But it is sure to be that thing which nobody has thought worth while doing, the thing which everybody thinks somebody else ought to do. Let that "somebody else" be you! There is real distinction in doing all the left over and forgotten jobs in a Church school or Endeavor service. It is the man who has done the small task well who wakes up some day to find himself "in a large place" and is never conscious just how he got there!

The Kansas City Creed

Dear Mr. Editor:

The Apostles' Creed is recited by millions of persons every Sunday as a part of their church worship. Many Congregationalists have wished that the so-called Kansas City Creed might be similarly used in our churches. The objection has been made that the Kansas City Creed has no rhythm and cannot be recited successfully by persons speaking together. At a first reading of the creed, that seems correct, yet my old preceptor drilled into his pupils the belief that all prose has rhythm or, at the least, a sequence of emphases, which can be made apparent by arranging the words in rhythmic lines. I have tried to do this with the Kansas City Creed, and the result follows:

We believe in God the Father, infinite in wisdom,
goodness and love;
and in Jesus Christ, His Son,
our Lord and Saviour, who for us and our salvation lived and died and rose again, and liveth evermore;
and in the Holy Spirit,
who taketh of the things of Christ and revealeth them to us, renewing, comforting and inspiring the souls of men.

We are united in striving to know
the will of God,
as taught in the Holy Scriptures, and in our purpose to walk in the ways of the Lord made known or to be made known to us.

We hold it to be the mission of the church of Christ to proclaim the gospel to all mankind,
exalting the worship of the one true God, and laboring for the progress of knowledge, the promotion of justice,
the reign of peace,
and the realization of human brotherhood.

Depending,
as did our fathers,
upon the continued
guidance of the Holy Spirit, to lead us into all truth,
we work and pray for the transformation of the world into the Kingdom of God, and we look with faith for the triumph of righteousness and the life everlasting.
Amen.

The fact that I think this arrangement would make the creed easy for a congregation to recite does not prove that such is the case. The real test would be for some church to have this printed and pasted in the hymn books, and given the actual test of use as part of the worship.

The Talk of the Sanctum

In the Circulation Department—

Our readers who were not privileged to attend the International Council in Boston will be interested to know that an attractive souvenir of the great meetings may be secured by sending 25 cents to the Circulation Department. We refer to the Official Boston Guide Book, which was prepared especially for the delegates. It contains a complete program of the meetings, a list of the official delegates, and a brief résumé of the three previous councils, as well as an excellent alphabetically arranged guide to historic Boston and a map of the city. Attractive illustrations of places of interest in and about Boston appear frequently throughout the book. You will find it a useful help whenever you visit Boston, and undoubtedly many of you will be led to the home of the Pilgrims during this Tercentenary year. We would call your attention to our special announcement on page 24.

Next Week—Our Annual Education Number

This, like its predecessors through the years, will open many windows into the broad field of education, both as it relates to the public school system and to the higher institutions of learning the country over. Some of the features are:

EDUCATING THE NATION'S CHILDREN, by Frank E. Spaulding, recently superintendent of schools in Cleveland and now called to be head of the new Department of Education at Yale University.

PRESIDENT BURTON GOES TO MICHIGAN UNIVERSITY—a little study of an interesting career.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE, a page or two of fresh and interesting news, with special emphasis on institutions associated with Congregationalism.

WHAT I HAVE GOTTEN OUT OF MY COLLEGE EDUCATION, a broadside from our readers.

Our Council Reports

The International Council has been such a major event in the life of Congregationalism that we are sure our readers are appreciating the space we are devoting in current issues to material relating to the gathering. Our staff of writers has sought to give something besides a routine report, but along with the record of what was said and done, to suggest the color and personnel of the remarkable gathering. Special credit is due Rev. Henry L. Bailey, of Longmeadow, Mass., a veteran convention reporter of The Congregationalist, for his day-by-day running story that has constituted the backbone of the report. Other writers who, either under their own name or anonymously, have sketched various phases of the assembly include Rev. Herbert A. Jump, Rev. F. B. Noyes, and Dr. H. J. Kilbourn. So much of the spice and permanent value also of the Council disclosed itself in the smaller gatherings of a social character that we have included brief statements concerning a number of them in our review of the week.

In this week's issue we print our English correspondent's impressions of the gathering; and in an early issue we shall publish a little broadside, entitled "The Best Thing in the Council," in which several delegates will set forth what it meant to them personally.

Will the Spirit of The International Council —The Spirit of Brotherhood— Survive after the Great Meetings?

Only as you keep in touch with your brothers and keep intelligently informed regarding the forward movements in all our churches.

English and American Preaching

To all who listen to preaching, to those who train preachers and to preachers themselves, the subject of the content of the pulpit message is one of perennial interest. It has been freshly accentuated by the presence in scores of American pulpits of men from England, Scotland, Canada, and Australia. Only once in about twenty years does a chance like this come to compare the manner and matter of English and American pulpit discourse.

When the International Council of 1899 met in Boston, attendants upon the sessions commented upon the warmly evangelical character of several of the outstanding addresses, notably those of Principal Fairbairn, Dr. Forsyth, and Dr. J. D. Jones. At that time our American churches had hardly emerged from controversies over Biblical criticism. Our English brethren, further advanced than we and fully accepting the method and many of the conclusions of the higher criticism, were not dwelling upon it in their pulpit or platform work. As they went from point to point in this country, they helped to stabilize the thought of the younger men and to clarify anew the Christian message.

Will English participation in the recent Council have the same salutary effect upon American church life? We hope so, and without undertaking any elaborate and invidious comparisons, we wish to point out what seem to us to be the leading notes of English preaching today. We base our characterization upon addresses at the Council, sermons preached in Boston, New York, and elsewhere, and upon conversations with English delegates concerning their pulpit methods and ideals.

The typical English sermon today is a message, not an essay.

Our English brethren preach as men who have found out something important about God and man and life, who have found it usually between the covers of the Bible, who have tested it in their own experience, and who therefore pass it on with authority. You would seldom mistake an English sermon for a Forum address or a popular magazine article. It is a spiritual message, to the preparation of which much careful and scholarly thought has been given. It has substance and the component parts are blended with the single purpose to win the attention and the adherence of the listener. These English brethren do not draw their bows at a venture. They shoot straight at a target.

The Gospel for the individual as well as for society is central in English preaching.

Our Congregational brethren from across the Atlantic are not indifferent to the grievous injustices connected with our present industrial and social order. Many of them voted the labor ticket at the last election. At the same time, English preaching has not become a one-sided plea for socialism or semi-socialism. It reckons with the fact that after you have secured fair wages, decent homes, a just distribution of profits, and the right treatment of the customer, the preacher still has to deal with humanity, man by man, each with his own hopes, fears, yearnings, temptations, and struggles. Our English brethren conceive it to be their business to help the individual hearer to win his fight with circumstances and temperament, with the monotony of toil, with youthful lusts, with the responsibilities of parenthood, and the loneliness of old age. They do not cease to cry from the housetops, "Let the oppressed go free," but they try to show the freed man what to do with his liberty and his opportunity.

The English ministers preach Christ.

The present generation of English preachers, if we may judge it by the hundred men who have been going about in this country, believe as deeply as did any preceding generation that Christ himself is the source and center of effective pulpit speech. He gives color and direction even to sermons in which his name may not be frequently mentioned. It is true that variations in Christology appear. Not all of these English visitors would put the accent precisely where Dr. J. D. Jones put it in his beautiful Council sermon, but all of them find ample and congenial pulpit material in the teachings, character, career, and cross of Jesus Christ. Everything in the way of literary embellishment is subordinated to the effort to bring the hearer into vital contact with the mind of Christ, and to lead him to reckon seriously with the fact of Christ in the background of human history, and the great force in the life of the modern world.

It is quite possible that the American pulpit, speaking broadly, is more brilliant today than the English pulpit, but it would be more influential if preachers all over the land should make it their deliberate purpose to edify and feed Christ's sheep and Christ's lambs. They want and need the personal message that goes straight home, that makes Christ real.

An English delegate in private conversation spoke of the series of sermons which he preached last winter on the Personality of Jesus. It included these topics: The Hands of Jesus, the Eyes of Jesus, the Face of Jesus, the Feet of Jesus. The congregations steadily increased from the first to the last of the series, and when it was over, his Boys' Brigade sent him this message: "When are you going to preach another exciting series of sermons?"

There is no class of subjects available to the modern preacher that compares in interest, richness, and suggestiveness with those suggested by the life, the teachings, and the death of Christ. May the visit of our English brethren put new meaning and power into the stereotyped injunction: "Preach Christ."

EDITORIAL

Electing the Right Men to Congress

In the concentration of interest upon the presidential campaign, the importance of choosing the best men to the Senate and the House of Representatives should not be overlooked. Congress is still an influential factor in American politics, as the present occupant of the White House has found out to his own surprise and sorrow.

Two issues in some form or other are likely to face the next Congress. With regard to them it should register the convictions of the great majority of the American people. We assume that most of our unselfishly minded citizens desire two things; first, the speedy participation of the United States in an effective League of Nations, and second, the continuation of national prohibition.

If the election were to be held this month, it would not be easy for those who consider these two issues paramount to decide which man to support for President. We must await Senator Harding's formal letter of acceptance before deciding whether he is really for a genuine League of Nations; but his statement issued July 14 hardly satisfies those who have been fighting for a League. It harks back to the old and selfish excuse that America may be involved disastrously in all the petty disputes overseas. It is cold toward the idea of a mandate for Armenia, and it is totally lacking in constructive suggestions. We hope Mr. Harding's letter of acceptance will be more explicit and satisfactory than this preliminary statement. On the other hand, Governor Cox has indicated his strong approval of a real League.

But when it comes to the prohibition issue, up to the present time the Democratic candidate is distinctly at a disadvantage. It seems to be clear that he owes his nomination at San Francisco largely to the wet forces. They are evidently banking much on his sympathy if elected, even if he now says, as all candidates do before the voting begins, that he is in favor of enforcing all the laws on the statute books.

With this present stand-off between the nominees on the two outstanding issues of the day, it becomes all the more important to scrutinize the record of the candidates for Congress and to ascertain by direct inquiry how much they personally care for a League of Nations and the continuance of national prohibition. Every man who aspires to a seat in Congress ought to be willing to be catechized and on the public platform to announce his position. Of course, if he faces one way on the League and another way on prohibition, the voter who thinks the world will get on much better if it is a sober world and if the nations associate themselves for the purpose of reducing armaments and preventing warfare will be in a quandary. But it ought to be possible to find in every Congressional district in this country capable and honest men who take the larger and more progressive view and take it sincerely and earnestly. If we are to have such men in Congress, it is none too early to be looking out for them and for their election.

A Shadow of Forgotten Years

Not many of us are old enough to remember much about the days of power and grandeur which came to the former Empress Eugenie of France, who died in her native Spain last week at the age of 94. A good many of us, no doubt, had quite forgotten that she was still alive. The Second Empire seems as remote almost as the First, and the second emperor only a vague shadow. But Eugenie was much more than that. A Spanish lady of noble blood, in which there was a Scottish and even an American strain, she came to Paris to find her place in life by a brilliant marriage. France, weary of war and unstable government, had turned to the Prince-President, Louis Napoleon, for rest and security, and at last accepted the tinsel glory of his new empire. He was at the time negotiating for a wife from some royal house, and negotiating in vain. He fell in love with the Spanish belle, the most beautiful woman of the moment in Paris, and made her his consort. Eugenie had better brains than he. She gave the glory of social leadership to his court. The world has even forgiven her the absurdities of crinoline in laughter at the pictured figure of its own grandmother topping a balloon skirt. The tragedy of defeat at the hands of Prussia and the greater personal tragedy of the death of her son in a skirmish with savages in South Africa touched the heart of the world. She made her refuge in England, and will be buried there.

It is a tribute to the real but unexpressive sympathy of the English people, and of Queen Victoria in particular, that Eugenie felt at home there in the days of her sorrowful retirement. Her death seems the final closing of a chapter of European history, a hint that we must turn our attention to that future which looms in such threatening wise before us. Her brief splendor and power, her deep sorrows, her errors, and even her absurdities, are matters for the historian and the moralist. France, perhaps, will feel her passing least of all, for the victorious and strenuous France of today is strangely unlike the frivolous imperial France in which she reigned and shone.

They are still lynching people down in Texas and burning them at the stake. We wonder whether any of the presidential candidates can find time to tell us what they think of this continuing barbarism in a community which calls itself free and American. We note that the Texas sheriff is reported as saying of a particular brace of burned Negroes that one "was not the right one" and that he was not at all sure about the other. We believe that the best Christian people in the South are as opposed to lynch law as they are in the North. It is a common problem how to make that sentiment effective.

On Asking Too Much at Once

A temptation to be fought against is that of despair in regard to the world or to the essential good will of humanity. We are to trust in God, who has his own plans, both for men and events. In our work for better times we are to count ourselves his instruments and co-operators. But we are neither to fall into the error of hurrying God nor of thinking that we know as much as he about what ought to be done and the possible ways of forwarding righteousness at this stage of the proceedings. For our own conscious sense of imperfection should be a warning to us of the difficulties with which God has to work in us and other men.

We know men who are tripped up and hindered in practical work for righteousness by the inflexibility of their own idealism. They ask too much at once. They wish to make the world over completely by day after tomorrow, at the very latest. And because men do not share their ideas of what the world should be and the lower aims of other people seem to put a drag on progress, these uncompromising idealists are ready to play the part of Job on the dunghill and despair of their age and generation. The disenchantments and disgusts of good men are in themselves a part of the hindrance which holds back the millennium of which we dream.

The answer to such doubts and disillusionments comes with the remembrance that Christian faith lives and works in the sphere of personal relations. No one of us is strong enough, even in his imagination, to get under the whole burden of the wrongs of his own time. There lies the opportunity of faith in God. But that faith is not something to lie down upon: it is an urgent motive for endeavor. And it is a motive also for co-operative endeavor. The first thing a Christian who begins to despair of the world and of humanity should do is to make sure that he is sufficiently engaged in co-operative work for the bettering of the world. Is he making the most of his church opportunities? Is he investing time and money to a sufficient degree in Christian co-operative undertakings? If we put ourselves, at any moment of the progress of the world, into the place of the idealists who were living then we shall discover that the people who counted for progress were not those who lamented because they could not make the world over at once into the image of their ideals. Philip of Spain had an ideal for the world and did his best to impose it on everybody. Suppose he had succeeded! We would not compare the ideal of our despairing Christian man today with that of Philip; but there have been more Christian ideals than his which might have cramped the life of the world. The people who counted then, and who count today, are those who by God's help try to make themselves over in the image of their ideals, and who also strive to help others to fulfill themselves at their highest and best. There is work enough here for everybody—work which ought to keep men cheerful. Suppose we try it when we are discouraged and leave the ordering of other things to God.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of Heroes and Heroines

There came to me a man and a woman, even an Husband and his Wedded Wife, and they said, We are weary one of the other.

And I said, Why is it thus?

And they said, We have grown commonplace to each other. Once we were to each other an Hero and an Heroine, but now we are Neither.

And I said, Napoleon did not look heroic to Josephine after she had seen him with his Suspenders hanging down his back; neither did Joan of Arc look heroic when she held her Front Hair in her mouth while she did up her back hair.

And they said, But he was an Hero and she was an Heroine.

And I said, Heroes and Heroines cannot appear heroic all the time. Cæsar did not look heroic when he had pushed his slippers too far back under the bed, and he had to get down and fish them out with an umbrella; but that be a necessary thing, even to Heroes and Heroines.

And I said to the woman, When the Baby was sick, eight years ago, did not this thine Husband watch with thee day and night?

And she said, He did.

And I said unto the man, When thou hadst lost half thy money in a Fool Speculation, did she not stick by thee like a Little Burr, and cheer thee up, and never say, I told thee so?

And he said, It is even so.

And I said, Go down on your knees.

And they knelt.

And I said, Join hands.

And they did so.

And I prayed to God on their behalf, till there came to their eyes tears of Memory and Love.

And I Smote them lightly on the back, and I said, I dub thee an Hero; I dub thee an Heroine.

And I sent them forth.

And they lived happily ever afterward.

In Brief

Rats have killed more people than wars, the health authorities tell us. Now that we are quarantining ships in our ports and reports of bubonic plague come from a few of our cities, the advice remains urgent: "Kill rats!"

The men who push the chairs on the board walk at Atlantic City are on strike, demanding that their wages should be doubled. We suppose a tariff by weight is not feasible, but they certainly seem to earn fifty cents an hour in wheeling some people up and down.

A great deal more than most of us realize depends upon the struggle in Japan between a military autocracy and the democratic spirit which is aroused among the people. Japan as a helper and friend of its weaker neighbors means peace in the Far East and in the world. Japan has renewed its treaty with Great Britain for a year on the old terms of a strict alliance. But the fact that the British Government was not prepared to renew it for a longer period now is eloquent of the unsettled and difficult conditions in the whole Asiatic world.

Long-standing differences of ideals and methods between the secretary and directors of the Lord's Day League of New England and their New Hampshire representative, Rev. Edward A. Tuck, a Congregational minister, have now culminated in a severance of his connection with the League and a prompt acceptance of his services by the New Hampshire Sabbath Conference, a recently formed and more broad-gauged organization. Patriculars appear on page 133. We think the Lord's Day League makes a mistake in adhering to a too restrictive policy. Its present attitude tends to divide rather than unite the real friends of the Sabbath.

A telegram from our Chicago editor announces the sudden death of Dr. John P. Sanderson. He was one of the faithful attendants upon the International Council meetings, and while in Boston had an attack of neuralgia of the heart. He returned to Chicago Thursday and died July 11. The burial was at Springfield, Ohio. Dr. Sanderson has filled a large place in Congregationalism. In Michigan, where a large part of his ministerial life was spent, he was counted a leader, both in counsel and action. Since removing to Chicago, where he has been Western representative of the Church Building Society, he has exerted an even wider influence. In the national assemblies his advice on questions of polity was especially valued. Somewhat retiring in temperament and never seeking public recognition, Dr. Sanderson, by the sheer force of his character and abilities, won his way to leadership. He was a royal companion and friend, and will be missed by many.

We have received one or two letters criticizing the non-appearance of certain men scheduled among the leading speakers of the recent International Council in Boston. The real reason why Ambassador Geddes and Mayor Peters did not meet the expectations engendered by the printed program is not as yet apparent to the unitiated. But in the case of Dr. Cadman it should be understood that he was in no way responsible for his failure to speak Monday evening, when one of the largest evening audiences had assembled, partly in his honor. A week before he had sent to this office a copy of his address written in his own hand. So he was fully prepared to meet the expectations of his auditors, but on the eve of starting for Boston he met with an accident that incapacitated him temporarily for platform work. He sent at once to Dr. Herring a telegram, whose delivery was delayed on account of the holiday. Dr. Cadman is always so scrupulous about fulfilling his engagements that this word of explanation is due him.

In his article on the Republican Convention in Chicago and conventions of previous years, Dr. Barton stated that in 1860 there were no lengthy nominating speeches; that Mr. Judd of Illinois, in nominating Abraham Lincoln, placed his name before the convention in a single sentence without eulogy. This statement has been challenged, with the suggestion that Mr. Judd nominated Lincoln as "a man who could split rails and maul Democrats." Dr. Barton replies that his original statement was correct, and that the other declaration is not wholly wrong. Mr. Denio, of Ohio, in a second seconding of the nomination of Lincoln, used those words, which comprised the whole of his speech. The same brevity characterized the nominations of Seward and the other candidates of 1860. The other type of nominating speech was of gradual evolution, and reached its zenith in Ingersoll's "plumed knight" speech for Blaine, and Roscoe Conkling's famous Appomattox speech nominating Grant for the third term. It very nearly reached its nadir in the speech that nominated Johnson in 1920—which was everything that such a speech ought not to have been.

The free world owes a considerable debt to Admiral of the Fleet Lord Fisher, the British naval administrator and commander who made the British Navy efficient for the protection of the seas against the German sea forces. A soldier's son, he entered the navy as long ago as 1854. When he came to authority, he collected the scattered squadrons, scrapped obsolete ships, planned and built the famous battleship Dreadnaught. His recent book of reminiscences showed the enormous force and courage of a man who broke precedents, overrode conventions, spoke his mind directly, was loved and feared and hated. He never concealed his convictions or minced words in criticism. A man of the highest character and individuality, he stands out as one of the great men of the war period. His counsel as to military plans was not taken—fortunately, perhaps, for he was nothing if not bold. Whether the attack with the whole British naval force on the Baltic shores of Prussia in conjunction with a landing force of Russians would have won in the early days of the war must always be a matter of conjecture. For the future he prophesied that wars at sea would henceforth be fought by submersibles and overhead by airships.

The Promise of a New Social Order

The Message from Two Recent Books

By Dean Charles R. Brown

Yale University

Here are two readable books—"The Bible As a Community Book," by Arthur E. Holt, Secretary of the Social Service Department of the Congregational Education Society, and "The New Social Order," by Harry F. Ward, professor of Christian Ethics in Union Theological Seminary. They are both suggestive, hopeful, forward-looking expressions of the dominant interest in this day of rebuilding.

DR. HOLT'S BOOK

The first is admirable as a compilation and as an interpretation of those passages of Scripture which bear directly on the age-long task of social reconstruction according to the pattern showed us from above. It has in it almost as many quotable sentences as the Sermon on the Mount. It will furnish to the preacher intent upon the proclamation of a social gospel the very best sort of method. The Bible itself offers us the best kind of field for the grounding of those principles and ideals which can be effectively applied to modern conditions and problems. It offers us a much better point of departure or line of approach than is to be found even in so noble a statement of principle as that contained in the program of the British Labor Party to say nothing of the more radical utterances in the Constitution of the Soviet Government in Russia.

The Bible has been from the start, is now, and in the judgment of many will continue to be "a book of final values for all who would live nobly." There is an unapproached primacy in its ability to declare with power the deeper meaning of everyday life. Its words are "spirit and life" in a sense which cannot be predicated of any other single volume of literature. And all this is brought out with remarkable clearness and cogency by Mr. Holt in his splendidly arranged exhibit of the Bible as a Community Book.

Two of the finest chapters in it are those in which he portrays the social ideals of Nehemiah and of Jesus. "The first person to attempt to carry out in terms of community reconstruction the vision of the prophets was a young man named Nehemiah. Many mourned the loss of the ancient city of David but he alone mourned to a purpose. With a crowd of exiles he had gone as a pilgrim to the city of Artaxerxes in the valley of the Euphrates. He had all the likeableness of youth and culture and had been appointed cup-bearer to the king. He could have had for the remainder of his life a position of security and ease but the ruin of the city of his fathers tugged at his heart-strings. His sorrow showed in his countenance and to the courteous inquiry of the king he replied, 'Why should not my countenance be sad when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste and the gates thereof are consumed with fire. If it please the king, send me unto Judah that I may rebuild it.'"

"The king granted his appeal, gave him letters of safe conduct and orders for the necessary supplies. Upon arriving at Jerusalem he keeps his mission secret. He does not flood the community with advance notices of what he proposes to do for its upbuilding. He goes about the city at night, taking stock of his task and of his resources. He will not allow the wishes of a good heart to be a substitute for the knowledge of a good head. Accurate information is the price he proposes to pay for leadership in community building. He returns from the survey with definite information. His first problem is to arouse in the people a mind to build. He calls them together, presents his case, outlines his plan, paints for them the glory of the city that can be." And the success of the undertaking is promptly underwritten in the response they made—"The people said, Let us rise up and build."

What a capital syllabus for a course of lessons in social reconstruction! What a royal scriptural basis for a series of sermons in a day of industrial and political rebuilding! The man who wrote this little book has studied to show himself approved unto God, a workman that need not be dismayed, rightly dividing and rightly applying the word of truth.

Here also are his words about the method of the Master: "Jesus had drunk deep from the springs of Hebrew idealism. He had a vision of a community held together by something stronger than the compulsion of force and fear. With true social insight he saw the coming disintegration of the Roman Empire due to the hatreds which it inevitably bred. His critique of the old order was severe. It was wrong in principle and must ultimately break down."

"Ye know that they who are accounted to rule over the Gentiles lord it over them and the great ones exercise authority. It shall not be so among you. If any would be great among you let him serve—the greatest of all is the servant of all, even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to serve and to give his life a ransom for many."

"The builders of the new order will seek as their main concern in life the righteousness of God, confident that the other privileges and necessities of life can be secured by a social order which has paid the price of a right attitude between man and man. A world now facing starvation because of the disruption, through war, of the forces of production and the channels of trade may well heed Jesus' thought that the maintaining of right relationships among men is the key to the solution of the problem of food and drink. The price of the new community was the high price of self-discipline in the giving of justice. All depended on whether he could secure men to follow him who loved justice enough to give it and give it first and who would give it for the sake of its faith-creating power in society."

These are samples! The reader who tastes them will want another helping and when he reads the little book through to the end he will be repaid. He will thank God and take courage.

PROFESSOR WARD'S OUTLOOK

The book of Professor Ward is a larger and more ambitious book but not nearly so interesting or suggestive to a man with a nose for social and spiritual values. The author would greatly increase the number of his readers and add to the force of his appeal if he would give more attention to the acquiring of a good English style. He splits his infinitives and sins against many of the established canons of good literary form with a high hand and an outstretched arm. He writes long, involved, obscure sentences with no consciousness apparently that he is thereby defeating his own ends. He does not "veil his meaning" by his lack of good style—he often hangs a blanket between his ideas and the minds of his readers. If this book were compressed into one-third of its present size the volume of ideas need not be in any way curtailed and it would add immeasurably to the interest and effectiveness of his presentation.

Furthermore, for a useful social document there is altogether too much of the abstract and altogether too little of concrete fact. It smells of the lamp rather than of life. He does not adduce anything like a proportionate amount of actual material to illustrate and support his wealth of fine-spun theory. His head and his heart may have been among the stars as he produced these pages—the generous impulses which here find expression makes one feel sure that it was so—but his feet were all too rarely on the solid earth.

However, if one has the patience to make his way through this thick forest of verbiage he will be repaid by finding many wholesome and stimulating aspirations for a new and better social order. For example, "One of the great migrations of history is happening. It is not as in days past a people swarming out to find new pastures and new lands to till: it is a movement of the race in search for more space for the development of the human spirit." Here is another! "To diffuse economic power throughout a community is not sufficient. It is only a part of the next step toward equality. It simply clears the road for social development. There remains to be developed the discipline of education and the spirit of good will which will make effective this diffusion of power in general standards of living. There remains also to be achieved the general understanding of life as a process of unceasing development."

He has very little use for the ideas of "the official circles of the American Federation of Labor." They seem altogether too tame in the light of the more radical programs he would espouse. He also shows scant regard for the Christian Church even though he is a professor in a theological seminary endowed by the gifts of churchmen for the training of young men for the work of the ministry in the church of Jesus Christ. Many of us who are in hearty sympathy with his social ideals at their best would draw back from such expressions as these: "Among all social institutions the church pre-eminently preserves the past. Its creeds and ceremonies prolong the power of the dead hand with greater power than the majesty of the law. . . . The church more than any other institution tends to perpetuate the ignorance and fears of the past."

How far this is from the atmosphere of that other volume which shows The Bible to be a Community Book! Upon what meat have the mighty social leaders of the past been fed if not upon the great truths of religion as spread abroad throughout the world by the organized efforts of the Church! From the days of Nehemiah or of Jesus down to the days of Washington Gladden and of Walter Rauschenbusch where have the prophets of a better social order been born and bred if not within the life of the Church of the Living God!

The men who get beneath the surface of current indications are not for the most part looking to see the kingdom of God come with power and great glory as the result of some new and clever device in economic or political organization. The problems are too vast and too grave to be settled off-hand by an Act of Congress. Here at this hour we have in our own land resources enough, brains enough, man-power enough, organizing and administrative ability enough to cover the country with industrial peace and prosperity as the waters cover the sea. But the sad fact stands that we have not character enough. We have not enough of the sense of social justice, enough of regard for the interests and welfare of the other man and the other class, enough of the insistent spirit of good will. So the solution waits for a wider and a more thorough regeneration of the human heart by the grace of God manifested supremely in the work of His Son, our Saviour, Jesus Christ.

International Council Aftermath

An Overflow Meeting with a Feast of Good Things

The Conference on Church Music

In Paul Revere Hall on Friday afternoon was held one of the most interesting sectional conferences on "Pilgrim Songs and Their Sequels," under the Chairmanship of Rev. Charles H. Richards. A large and intensely interested audience appeared for this event. Prof. Waldo S. Pratt gave a piece of hitherto unexplored historical research in his account of the very first musical utterances of the Plymouth Colony, as expressed in The Psalm Book of the Pilgrims, showing how, in that time when there was no such thing as a keyboard instrument, and no instrument of any kind was allowed in the house of God, the Psalms were sung in unison; and giving, with the piano, some of the more worthy of those ancient Psalm melodies.

Dr. Charles F. Carter of Hartford gave an aeroplane view of the "Stages of Development" of spiritual music in America through the three past centuries. He showed that although the Puritans had made something of a reputation as organ-smashers, and "had chased musicians from the organ gallery," yet the animus was more against the use of music in the church than against the art itself—for it is remembered that Milton, and Cromwell himself, had a degree of musical skill. And the Pilgrims sang, and the fact that they could sing, standing there on the bleak New England coast, will always resound as a note of comfort and joy. So long as they could sing there was courage and hope. With a few copies of the Ainsworth Psalter the old, mighty words were memorized, and were far more important to the fathers than the tune. It took real and sometimes bitter controversy to establish singing by note and with instruments. For the first hundred and fifty years Thomas Ravencroft's collection was the leading one.

From these beginnings the speaker showed the march upward, group by group, of our American hymnody, taking on the great worship harmonies of Europe and adding from generation to generation the tunes which have lifted men's spirits with the name of Christ and the sounds of his coming kingdom—such as the works of Lowell Mason, Oliver Holden with "Coronation," Thomas Hastings with "Rock of Ages," "Retreat," and "Peniel;" Organist George Webb of Old South, who furnished our "Webb," of "Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus;" the work of Bradbury, Emerson, George F. Root and many others.

Dr. Carter sums up with the cheering assurance that, out of the great volume of religious music of today a sifting process is going on, in which the cheaper and less worthy tunes are being quietly dropped and harmonies founded in accurate scholarship, built to last for the ages, are taking their rightful place.

PROF. H. AUGUSTINE SMITH
Music Director

Following this paper came Prof. H. Augustine Smith with his "Pilgrim Hymns Visualized through Art." Dr. Smith put forth with convincing enthusiasm a plea for the united use of picture and music in presentation of the Gospel teachings. He then gave a concrete illustration of his proposition by putting on the screen an exquisite series of pictures of the life of Christ while he led the audience in the hymns suggested by the successive scenes, and ending with the triumph of the risen Redeemer. It may well be expected that this form of Christian teaching will win a permanent place in our churches.

The Normal and Abnormal

At Central Church on Monday afternoon a sectional meeting was devoted to "The Normal and Abnormal in Religion," with Rev. John Gordon of Rockford, Ill., presiding. Severe criticism of the Christian Scientists, praise for the Emmanuel Movement, and a statement of faith in Hickson, the healer, marked the address of Dr. William T. McElveen of Portland, Ore., who spoke on "The Relation of Religion to Bodily Healing."

"Those who have tried to imitate the healing of Jesus," he said, "are charlatans—among them the Christian Scientists, the Lydia Pinkhams of religion, whose goal is the dollar, and whose motto is not 'come all ye and be healed,' but 'come ye and buy a copy of "Science and Health" at $6 a volume.' Eddyism is neither Christian nor scientific, and its pretending that there is nothing to fear in the world is bravado, not bravery."

On the other hand, the speaker characterized the Emmanuel Movement as neither bombastic nor commercial, and added a word of praise for Mr. Hickson, the faith healer. Though of the opinion that there was much in the Gospel not yet utilized for purposes of healing, Dr. McElveen concluded by advising preachers to leave that art to men of the medical profession, who were infinitely more qualified to teach it.

After a short discussion Rev. Morton Stanley of England read a paper written by Capt. J. A. Hadfield, an English preacher, formerly a physician, on "The Meaning of Current Spiritualistic Movements," in which the author pointed out how the great healing forces of the soul are always ready to spring to life for the curing of both moral and physical disease.

Speaking on the same topic, Rev. Hugh Elmer Brown of Evanston, Ill., admitted the value of psychic research as a science for experts, but disapproved its popularization in the form of spiritism, terming Sir Oliver Lodge a mere eager layman. "At the present rate," he said, "we will soon slip back to witchcraft, demonology and the bane of the 'evil eye.' Let us have more faith and less inquiry, for communion through prayer is better than communication through mediocre mediums."

Rev. Stanley H. Fisher of the American Church in Paris outlined the plans for a united Protestant church and a social service building for American students in that city, and announced that already over one-half of the required $2,000,000 had been pledged.

The Ethics of Liberty

The stately arches of Old South Church rang on Monday afternoon with a passionate discussion of our rights in freedom of speech and the press, a theme which lies at the tap root of the life of democratic peoples. Here found expression a protest against sundry violent actions by our authorities, both during and since the war, in suppression of radical utterances in press and public gatherings.

The presiding officer was William Shaw of the United Society of Christian Endeavor. Bishop Frederick B. Fisher of the Methodist Episcopal Church opened with "The American Idea of Freedom." He showed that we had fairly achieved the religious freedom for which the fathers came in the beginning, as well as the political freedom won in 1776 and defended since. We are now summoned to the period of economic liberty, inseparable from which is the power of public utterance for the whole people.

The Bishop cited the Christian ideals of certain leading Socialists, who, though accustomed to repeat from memory entire chapters of the Gospels, had turned against the entire Church, as one of them asserted, "Because the living Christ has left your churches." Bishop Fisher voiced the vigorous demand that "we must let all the people know all the truth, and let them make their individual judgments."

Principal Garvie of England, heartily greeted by the audience, gave an inspiring address on "Free Speech in England," which, he said, England owes to the presence of her free churches. Freedom must not be construed to mean doing just as we please—only that men shall be free to obey the voice of God in their own consciences.

Paul U. Kellogg, editor of the Survey, came to grips with the task of "Bringing Free Speech down to Date." Recognizing that we are becoming a nation of wage-earners, he stressed the primary necessity for such a nation of freedom of speech and communication. But fundamental to freedom of speech and communication is the literacy of the people. Having taught all to write and read we must look to the control of our cables, telegraphs and newspapers. Government control of any of these is subversive of liberty. The people must have the power to get the facts. Here the Church can function. We should and can see to it that the press rings true to freedom of speech. "There are today in prison in this country Porto Ricans, not because of any criminal act but because they had not abandoned the hope of a nationality like that of Cuba; Socialists, for speaking that which they had been saying for the last thirty years, and pacifists for believing that war is wrong. I would like to know what the Congregational churches think about that."

At the climax of this discussion came Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, lately become the editor of the Christian Herald, with his clean-cut, absolute and uncompromising views on "The Newspaper and the Moral Health of the Nation." He stated frankly that the modern newspaper was a non-Christian institution. It is what the papers do not say that constitutes their failure to be the moral leaders of the nation. There does not appear to be a single Christian daily newspaper in America. There is a universal fear to mix business, politics and religion. Newspapers should choose their reporters with as great care for their Christian character as a church would use in choosing a minister. The voice of the author of "What Would Jesus Do?" pleaded with emotion as the ending of his address: "Oh, that the great Christian denominations would establish daily newspapers that would urge the settlement of our great national and industrial questions by the principles of Jesus. They could abolish war, secure world-wide prohibition and bring the universal brotherhood."

Immediately an intense discussion opened by delegates from the floor, both British and American and several startling searchlights were thrown upon the press situation, showing the need of some means whereby the great news-gathering agencies and individual papers can be held to responsibility for a full and truthful rendering of all the facts to all the people.

CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE IN BOSTON
Decorated for 1920 International Council

Noon Meetings at Park St. Church

On Wednesday Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon of Stamford Hill, London, spoke on the facts and fallacies of the Tercentenary, asserting that we have a misconception in speaking of "good and bad times." Men give the times all their quality. If present times are bad, bad men make them so. We have no immutable fate to fight against, only to deal with men very like ourselves. God or the devil do things mediately. The devil inspires with hatred but man kills. The present situation in our expensive living costs, makes us talk of the "good old times," and the kindness of men, when no one sold anything, but simply gave it away over the counter. The war did not fall from the sky like a bomb, weak and foolish men made the war. Dr. Gibbon was warmly applauded when he alluded to those who have lost the spirit of sacrifice of the war, that they are trying to make the Church over into a commercial proposition. "Their speech is like the wheezy talk of old men in clubs, about their physical complaints."

This ex-chairman of the British Congregational Council closed by calling for a tonic that would satisfy the heart's thirst and not for "meek and mild meetings for mothers and pleasant afternoons for the people."

On Thursday, Rev. H. H. Proctor of Brooklyn, N. Y., spoke. He believed that it was the Pilgrims who had made the American Negro, the "Negro American." Before coming to Park Street Church he had just taken his two daughters to what he called the greatest spot in America, the corner of Congress and Water Streets where Garrison began the publication of the Liberator. He deplored the view that there was "any race in brain" and called his own people "the Pilgrims in bronze." After quoting the Southern orators who drew the pathetic picture of the "men who came back from the lost cause," Dr. Proctor contrasted the sad condition of the ex-slave. And yet the largest single contributions to the Liberty Loan in Louisiana and Arkansas were by Negroes. Turning from the thrift to the patriotism of the "Pilgrims in bronze," he pointed to two monuments in the city where he was speaking, that to Crispus Attucks and the Shaw Memorial. He touched upon the movement of Negroes to the North as the beginning of an international movement back to Africa.

On Friday, Rev. Frederick F. Shannon of Chicago spoke, alluding to Independence Day and drawing attention to the historical fact that independence always completed itself in interdependence and dependence on God. One atom is always beckoning another. No one ever heard of an independent flower, or apple except the one Adam ate.

If in the large congregation which filled Park Street Church Monday noon were either those who have been opposing the League of Nations or who have grown lukewarm in their devotion to it, Rev. A. C. Hill's torrential and cogent eloquence must have swept away their objections and revived the drooping courage of many others. For this Abraham Lincolnesque Scotchman was as logical as he was passionate. He was also noticeably courteous and intelligent in his allusions to counter-considerations raised in this country because of our historic policy of isolation. Nevertheless he asserted that, whether we like it or not, the nations of the world are forever one. He did not think that America would be the loser if it conceded a small fraction of its national sovereignty. The address came to a moving climax as Mr. Hill pictured the tremendous aid America could bring to the League in the direction of open diplomacy and of shaping the future of the world.

In closing the meeting Dr. Conrad said: "We have been listening to one of the sanest, most significant and most instructive addresses since the Gospel began," and all the people said, "Amen."

Australian Morality

At the noon meeting in Park Street Church on Tuesday the speaker was Rev. C. B. Cockett of Melbourne, Australia. He spoke on the topic, "Battles for Public Morality in Australia." He said in part: We are very free in Australia because we can profit by the battle of the old world with its sins, and also by America's battle, still we have many of the old forms of wickedness still with us. Our churches are united in the battle upon gambling. We keep after the police department and thus obtain a good enforcement of the law. Our great trouble comes from the fact that in some places the municipality or commonwealth shares in the profits of gambling so that we find it difficult to make headway against it. We are, however, constantly battling and are doing a great deal to overcome the gambling spirit engendered by the war.

Practically all of our motion pictures come from America and on that account we must censor them more closely. Putting joking aside, many of them are silly—few of them are bad. I go myself often and enjoy many of the reels. In Sunday observance we seem to be far ahead of America. There are no theaters open in our country on the Sabbath and in some provinces there are no trains and no tram service; in others the tram service is maintained at the church hour for the sake of the church people. It is only fair to say, however, that the desecration of the Sabbath is on the increase and we shall find ourselves fast coming to a state of affairs that makes the Sabbath practically a holiday.

We are making a great fight against the liquor traffic through our various organizations. We find our best arguments come from America. We are indebted greatly to some of your foremost leaders, among them Rev. Howard H. Russell. We are going out to destroy absolutely the liquor traffic.

The speaker then made one of the plainest and most searching of appeals against the growing impurity and lowering of sex standards. His report of conditions in Australia was not entirely reassuring, although his account reminded us of our own situation.

In the fight for industrial freedom he reported that the Labor influence and Capital were well-organized fighting forces, and between them the middle class was suffering greatly. The many associations, however, organized in Australia for collective purchasing promise much for the future. There is also much significant welfare work in industry. The churches in Australia are emerging from the middle-class spirit. Illiteracy is practically unknown. The schools are free clear through the university period. Religious education is at the minimum, although the Bible is in use in some of our schools. We have no race question. Our country is practically a white man's country.

Mr. Calkins paid a high tribute to women and believes that all industry, so far as they are able to meet the conditions, should be open to them and that they should receive equal pay for equal work. He said some caustic things about indecency in the dress of women at the present time and the extravagant use of cosmetics.

He also reported that the churches in Australia have united to become a force in politics and to drive out of power the gangster and the dirty politician.

International Council Jottings

First prize for resonant, effective and agreeable articulation: Sir Robert Falconer.

"Quit you like men," quoted Professor Buckham, and instantly the buzzer echoed "Quit."

"I thought this note was a warning to stop," said Miss Addams, "but I find it's a warning to go on; the next speaker isn't here."

Perhaps the name most frequently on the lips of English speakers—and some Americans—was Dale, whereby he being dead yet speaketh.

Andover Seminary men joined with members of the Boston Monday Club in entertaining at luncheon a group of English and Scottish delegates. Later in the afternoon a reception was tendered them at the Seminary building.

The automobile in its numerous varieties of type undoubtedly helped to swell the attendance. Some of them came from beyond the Mississippi and one of these trans-Mississippi cars was driven by Hon. Henry M. Beardsley of Kansas City, a former Moderator of the National Council.

Judging from his address the battle against intrenched wrong in every field, in Australia, is going forward amazingly well. Mr. Calkins in his manner of public address was more like an American reformer preacher than any one of his British brethren. He is what the small boy would unhesitatingly call "a live wire," and received generous applause as he made his red-hot statements. R. W. G.

The Council with Film and Stereopticon

Not least among the inspirations of the Council was the series of moving pictures, stereopticon lectures and plays in Paul Revere Hall, showing many phases of Congregational service in many lands. These were under the immediate management of Rev. H. B. Catlin, a young missionary, graduate from New Hampshire State College, Hartford and Union Seminaries, who with his wife, née Miss Laura Cristeson, graduate of the Philadelphia Conservatory of Music, is to sail for the South Africa Mission this fall.

REV. H. A. MINER, D. D.

Celebrated his 91st birthday on July 1, by going on the International Council pilgrimage to Plymouth. Dr. Miner has attended three International Councils. He was formerly Home Missionary Superintendent of Wisconsin.

Among the reels was the story, "Miracle Money," showing the work and the love story of a young medical missionary in China; "The Conversion of Magan Lal," an episode from the wonderful mass movement in India from Hinduism to Christianity; also the Hoover reels, shown by Rev. William F. English, Jr., illustrating the present conditions in the Near East, with a vivid story of the American relief work among the Turk-harried Armenian populations. With this came a play, "War Days in Turkey," by twenty actors from the Currie School of Expression, reproducing an actual occurrence from the school at Marsovan. "A Motor Missionary Trip Through New Mexico and Arizona," with reels shown by Mr. Franklin Warner, gave a most interesting view of the work of the five American Missionary schools in Northern New Mexico, and scenes from the life of many of the Congregational churches in New Mexico and Arizona, all of whom Mr. Warner and his wife visited last summer.

With slides were shown, by Rev. F. C. Laubach, many of our Congregational results in the Philippines, where the Island of Mindanao, covering one-third of the territory of the archipelago, is given wholly to the Congregational body for a parish.

Mrs. Ida Vose Woodbury inspired and entertained large audiences with stereopticon lectures on "The Grandchildren of Uncle Tom" and "Americanizing Americans." Dr. Henry J. Kilbourn gave "American Congregationalism in Picture." Pres. Howard M. Briggs furnished moving pictures on the daily life of students at Straight College with classes at their regular work, the trade school activities, home-making in all its branches, as well as the students at play. The college owns a picture equipment for showing the life of the school in homes as well as in churches and other auditoriums. The pictures of the school at play tell the story of a day in celebration of the successful drive in the interest of the Congregational World Movement. The school was asked to raise $350. Entirely on student initiative more than $600 was raised. Because of this effort President Briggs declared all regular work suspended.

Rev. Frank C. Laubach, Ph.D., gave an illustrated address on the great work which the United States Government has already done in the Philippine Islands, resulting in the magnificent system of roads, disease-infested regions given healthful and beautiful cities, stable and honest government established, and, above all, the excellent system of education. One thing, however, the government cannot do, and that is, to teach religion. This must be done by the church. For this work the islands were divided among the denominations. The Congregational body was given the Island of Mindanao, which comprises one-third of the territory of the Philippine Archipelago. There are three classes of inhabitants. (1) The more civilized on the northern coast; (2) In the interior the pagan tribes; (3) On the western and southern shores the Mohammedan Moros, 350,000. On the north coast congregations are growing rapidly. Among the pagans a hospital has been established and religious education is going on. For want of an adequate missionary force no missionaries have yet been sent to the Moros although these people constitute the most serious problem in all the Philippines.

There was also an hour of choral singing with illuminated slides, led by Prof. Augustine Smith; lectures on "The Black Man in White Man's Africa," by Mr. Stick; "The Japanese Prodigal Son," by Rev. Mr. Allchin; "What Shall We Do with the Children?" by Mr. Sheldon of the Congregational Education Society; "My Native Land" (Africa) illustrated, by Mr. Kamba Simango, and "Personal Experiences in Turkey Today," a cinema by Mrs. Richards of the Near East Relief. H. J. K.

Delegates at Play

A Council Postlude

By H. A. B.

Those who did not see some of the International Council Delegates from overseas on occasions when they had demitted official responsibilities missed something. So here follows the true, unvarnished tale, of a Post-Council excursion participated in by a highly favored few, the memory of which will abide for many a day.

The summer morning was in its earliest stages, when two capacious cars honked away from a Back Bay hotel. We, the occupants, were speeded on our way by the Secretary of the Congregational National Council, who generously wished us good luck, and then turned sadly but heroically away to resume for the next two days his customary diversions in connection with important denominational and interdenominational committee meetings.

Over the Harvard Bridge we went, past Harvard University, and a little farther on the childhood haunts of our noble host, who instigated the party. We delayed long enough on Andover Hill to recall some of the famous worthies of an earlier generation and to realize that it is Phillips Academy today and its substantial group of buildings, and not the ancient school of the prophet, that gives distinction to the town and its sightly summit. But we had no time or inclination for regrets. The New Hampshire and the Maine beaches were calling us. How clean and invigorating they looked, and what a splendid strip of sea and shore it is from Hampton, on through Wells, to the beautiful wooded slopes that girdled Casco Bay.

The season at the beaches was only just beginning, but enough people were visible around the little cottages and the more pretentious estates to give that human touch to the scene that constitutes Nature's finest and most irresistible appeal.

The Maine border crossed, we were soon threading the streets of Portland, than which there are few more attractive cities in America, and a little later caught a passing glimpse of the Bowdoin College buildings and campus. Then another fifty-mile stretch, the last fifteen of which constituted the climax of the journey. We were off the line of travel. The road wound up hill and down dale, affording us entrancing glimpses of uplands and meadows, of coves and inlets, and now and then of the shining sea itself. We should have wept to have the ride end had we not known that the "best was yet to be," in the shape of a little island, only a short row from the mainland, which for the next seventy-two hours became to us an Isle of Avalon, or perhaps a combination of Avalon and Patmos.

It has been the summer home of our host ever since he was in knee breeches. There he learned to swim, to row, to sail and to fish. And there, though now a grandfather, he continues to pursue these avocations, especially the piscatorial art. He calls his own modest cottage, one of less than a dozen scattered over the little island, "The Parson's Paradise." Within, for many summers past, traveling brethren from different parts of the United States and overseas have found a princely welcome and refreshment for mind and body.

We were all tired after the strain of listening to one hundred and thirty-four addresses, and the excitement that went with the crowded Council days. It was good to "let down." Our delegation included three Englishmen, one Scotchman, and one Australian. And how they did enjoy themselves! Talk about American exuberance and kiddishness! We steady-going New Englanders were hardly in it compared with them. From the moment they caught their first glimpse of the island until they waved their last farewell they were breaking out every now and then with "I say now," "My Word," and other such rapturous expressions into which the stolid Britisher condenses the deepest emotions of a heart that may be always the warmer because it isn't worn on the sleeve. They put on their "White Flowers" as they call their flannel suits, got out their pipes, for an Englishman at intervals does indulge in a smoke, to relieve the war tension I suppose, and gave themselves over to ease and jollity.

It was hard at times to recognize the modest London correspondent of The Congregationalist in the nattily costumed youth, who one moment would be putting up a joke on his fellows and the next would be feigning seasickness with the success of a skilled actor; to identify in the portly, round-faced man, with his string of funny Scotch stories, the dignified principal of an Edinburgh College, and to realize that the sunny, gentle soul, capering over the grass, was the same man whom we had heard a few days before in Boston electrifying a large audience with a carefully studied address.

Nothing was quite as enjoyable as the evenings around the big fireplace, when banter and story-telling gave place to serious talk on the attitude of Christian men, toward war, toward internationalism and other deep-going subjects. Nor shall we ever forget family prayers, as the head of the house, blessed with sons and sons-in-law in the ministry, and with daughters and daughters-in-law who have grown up to noble and useful womanhood, sat in the midst of his big household, while a London minister read most interpretatively from the chapter in Mark, the passage beginning, "So is the Kingdom of God upon the earth," and the host himself read the eighth Psalm, and we were led in prayer by others of the group, who knew the way to the Throne of Grace, and how to conduct seeking souls thither.

Would that many more Americans and Britishers could have had so rich an experience! Perhaps there were other Post-Council gatherings of this type up and down the Atlantic Coast. If so they must have cemented powerfully the ties between America and England, between American Congregationalists and their brethren from other lands.

Certainly those were glorious days of fellowship! Concerning them we can say with Lowell, "Such days are not the prey of setting suns."

Theological Seminary Reunions

Yale

The men of Yale got together in Copley Square Hotel, ninety-five strong, under the chairmanship of Prof. Williston Walker. The effervescence of student days came back in a number of songs, with words by Dr. E. G. Guthrie and music by Dr. Jason Pierce. The principal speech was that of Dean Charles R. Brown, in which he rejoiced upon the present evidences of the Yale fellowship and urged an increased recruiting of men for Christian service and a strong perpetuation of the faith of the Pilgrim Fathers.

Bangor

Bangor drew forty men to the tables in Garrison Hall, where, after a sufficient number of salads had entered the ministry, Toastmaster Asa Merrick Parker presented as speakers Pres. David N. Beach, Professor Moulton and Professor Denio, whose presence is always a pleasure at Bangor anniversaries. Dr. Beach showed that while doing its work on one-thirteenth of the average resources of the other seminaries, Bangor has given in men and service one-sixth of the aggregate work of the Congregational body.

Canada

Our Canadian delegates met at one on Tuesday in the Savoy, nearly forty, and the largest number of Congregational leaders from across the line that have ever attended a Council in the United States. Chairman Dr. Frank J. Day rapped the tables to order and introduced Dr. William H. Warriner, of the Congregational Theological College in Montreal, Principal Ritchie who has come from England to serve that institution, and others. In their own gathering, as well as in other more public moments, our Canadian brethren clearly struck the note of desire for increased confidence and co-operation between America and Canada.

ANDOVER AND THE MONDAY CLUB

The sons of Andover assembled on Saturday, July 2, in the Copley Square Hotel together with the members of the Monday Club, under the chairmanship of Dr. William R. Campbell, with Rev. Russell Boynton as toastmaster. They had as guests a number of our British brethren. It was a most happy occasion. For the Andover Trustees spoke Dr. C. F. Carter, and for the Faculty, Dean J. W. Platner. For the Britishers, Rev. Dr. A. J. Grieve and others spoke in heartiest response. Following the luncheon a number of the men repaired to Cambridge, by invitation of the faculty, for a visit to the halls and grounds of Andover Seminary.

The International Council

A Britisher's Impressions

By Our London Correspondent

The time has hardly arrived for classifying one's impressions of the general work of the Council. Possibly not until we are homeward bound, calmed by the vast silence of the Atlantic Ocean, shall we Britishers be in a fit state of mind to survey quietly and dispassionately the spiritual and intellectual contribution which the Council has made to our minds and souls. We shall have to revalue things before we can assess that side of things. At the moment, writing before the end of the Council has arrived, one hesitates to generalize. But without hesitation I can say that the abiding memory of "Boston 1920" will be, not of the sessions of the Council nor of the sectional meetings, but of the splendid fellowship we have enjoyed and the sacramental intimacy which has been ours with men inspired by the same spiritual ideals and gropingly thrusting forth toward the Kingdom of God, which is the goal of our work and hope.

The very composition of the program made it almost impossible for us to move toward any crescendo of thought and feeling. We have been bewildered by the infinite variety of the dishes on the menu till we are in a state of acute intellectual dyspepsia for which rest is the only safe cure. Once restored to mental poise we shall feast again, in memory, on the dishes that reflection will prove to have been most satisfying.

Not willingly would one criticize the program of the Council. Its compilation must have been a gigantic task and those responsible for it must have agonized in soul over their labors. Perhaps now we all nurse the egotistical notion that we could have prepared a richer feast by omitting much rich food that seems only to have made a crude surfeit of the banquet.

BOSTON HOSPITALITY

I may be forgiven for saying that after all the intervals between the sermons have made the Council an ineffaceable thing to us all. The hospitality of Bostonians has swept us off our feet. We have been overwhelmed by kindness and affection. We were conscious that nothing was being spared to satisfy our every wish. Over festive boards at dinner and supper we have had feasts of reason and flows of soul that will stand out like Himalayas in the days on the plains that await us as we return to our daily rounds and common tasks. Boston will be the spot that whenever our eyes catch it on the map will flood us with joyous recollections of fellowship, merry and grave, and of exchanges of deepest feelings which will be forever rich and abiding experiences within our souls. Our hearts are full of gratitude for goodness and mercy and for tables spread before us with lavish love.

IMPERISHABLE MEMORIES

A few things will be imperishable in our memories. We shall never forget that communion service in Tremont Temple and we shall be forever debtors to Dr. Maurer for the prevision that must have gone to the making of that service. How long we shall discuss from our differing standpoints that amazing speech of Mr. Raymond Robins I dare not speculate. The passion for humanity that gave the speech its thrill gripped us. Through the crudities—and parts of the speech did certainly strike us as crude—we saw a brave, self-sacrificial soul living out the Christ impulse and fighting the cause of the crushed and dispossessed of the earth. Another speech which will abide with us was Dr. Carl Patton's coruscation upon reality and religion.

The certitude with which Dr. Patton pricked bubbles and nailed down the counterfeiters reminded us of Dr. Parker in his best days. Again we shall remember—but not I fear so well as we could wish—that address on the place the Congregational college has taken in American educational advance, made by Dr. Cowling. We shall turn eagerly to that address when the official volume of the Council's proceedings is published. Dr. Gordon's weighty utterance on the originality of Jesus impressed us as one of the mountain peaks of the Council. And then Dr. Boynton, the Great-Heart we all love in England; did not our hearts burn within us when he spoke in memory of our glorious dead on Independence Day?

It would be invidious to institute comparisons between English and American speakers and I shall not do it. But we were proud of Dr. Garvie for his brave treatment of the vital issues in present-day theology—so sound in its essential evangelicalism, so ready to scrap the unessential lumber. If I were asked to say what was the choicest British speech I should have no option but to give it as my opinion that Rev. W. S. Hampton's chaste after-dinner speech at the joint meeting of the L. M. S. and the A. B. C. F. M. at the City Club. That speech was a cameo, exquisite in thought and perfect in expression. We cannot conceal either our pride in Rev. Sidney Berry's fine address at the Sunday afternoon meeting. That gathering was in every respect the climax of the Council's program.

The Plymouth Thrill

The excursion to Plymouth Rock provided the supreme thrill of the week for some of us. We have a historic stone of our own over in England—the stone of Scone upon which Scottish kings were crowned when Scotland was an independent kingdom and over which the royal throne has been placed whenever English monarchs have been enthroned since the Act of Union with Scotland. But we see that stone without a thrill. It stands for kings and dynasties and is remote from our most cherished things. But Plymouth Rock sent a quiver through the very soul of us. It lies there, a symbol of a people's upsurging craving for liberty on the basis of the liberty by which Christ makes us free. Reverently we stood beside it, feeling—in the words of Jesus discovered on the papyrus found by Hunt and Grenfell at Gayrhinchus, that "Cleave the wood and there you find me, lift the stone and there am I."

We could have wished that the pilgrimage to Plymouth had been less of a picnic and that the jocularities had been omitted from the speeches. Why had we no ceremonial around the stone? If we could have moved in sober procession from the station to the Rock, and then passed it, two by two, an American and a Britisher clasping hands over the sacred stone, an ineffaceable memory would have been registered. Of course, it would have been a little histrionic. But is there no place for the dramatic in a great international commemoration?

Future Councils

Ought there to be any more International Councils? Of course there should. We know that the continuance of the sequence depends on Boston, 1920. If it had failed, the Fourth would have been the last International. But it has not failed. If the formal sessions have seemed like the bombardment of each other with essays from which perhaps neither has learned greatly from the other, the informal gatherings have brought us very near to each other. And if in the providence of God our nations—American and British—should link hands in an English-speaking moral leadership of the world, we shall need constant renewals of our vows of spiritual oneness.

Finally, I have been asked if I have found Americans very different from my own fellow countrymen. I have not. There are outcrops which are different, but beneath there is a common strength, deriving from a common faith and a common idealism, upon which the feet of both peoples are firmly ground. And it is upon that rock that we Congregationalists of the world have to build the Church which shall, in the years to be, usher in the Kingdom of Heaven on earth. A. P.

Religious Drama During the International Council

Conducted by Dr. Mary Alice Emerson

The most notable dramatic offering of the International Council was "A Pageant of Pilgrims," written and directed by Esther Willard Bates, of Roslindale. This was given twice to capacity audiences in Jordan Hall on the evening of July 1, under the auspices of the Pilgrim Press, which recently published the text in attractive book form.

The cast was made up of young people from Boston University and Union Church, except the dancers who were the pupils of Mrs. Lilla Viles Wyman. Mrs. Wyman directed all the dances except the Indian dance, which was in charge of Miss French. Mr. Raymond C. Robbins of Boston University directed the choruses, and Miss Elizabeth Lobdell, the orchestral trio. Mr. Munroe R. Pevear supervised the light effects, which were of unusual artistry. Dr. Mary Alice Emerson had charge of the casting and the costumes, and Mr. Wilbur Davies of the properties. Rev. Oliver W. Bell of Union Church was business manager.

Hearty applause and the later congratulations proved the appreciation of the audience for this gift of the Pilgrim Press to the visiting delegates. One of the many delegates who hastened from the Pilgrim excursion to the second performance of the pageant said, "This is a fitting 'end of a perfect day' of beauty, patriotism and inspiration."

This "Pageant of Pilgrims" was outlined in The Congregationalist of May 6 but it may be reviewed again here. The Questioner and the Interpreter, two symbolic figures on each side of the stage, hear the slow tread of Pilgrims moving across the face of continents. The Interpreter bids his companion note the impulse for religious freedom that sends the Pilgrims of 1620 on their way.

The first episode is laid in the Inn upon the Old North Road in Scrooby where William Brewster keeps the post. The meeting is broken up, and Brewster is led away to jail. In the darkness an angel appears to Bradford, telling him to seek a Commonwealth of God in another land.

The Questioner and the Interpreter relate the journey into Holland, and the later embarkation for America. The crossing of the ocean is represented by a dance of wind, thunder, rain, lightning and the stormy sea, which oppose the passage of the Pilgrims. The angel prophesies safety and great achievement.

The second episode shows the landing and the treaty with the Indians. Famine, Cold and Pestilence, representing the hardships of the first winter, thread their way among the savage Indians, and haunt three somber Pilgrim men who sow corn upon the graves to hide their losses from the Indians.

In the third episode the Pilgrims celebrate a Thanksgiving Day. Priscilla and her girl friends remain away from church on the pretext of preparing the meal, and are discovered by Myles Standish while they are prancing gaily about with Squanto and his friends, led by the music of Degory Priest's smuggled fiddle. Their punishment is interrupted by the arrival of the ship Fortune with supplies, new colonists and the longed-for charter from the king.

Adventurous Spirits, dressed in the colors of the sunset, dance while a procession of gold-seekers, pioneers, Puritan clergymen, woodsmen, trappers and Jesuits, led on by Indians, follow the lure of unseen voices. The Interpreter announces the coming of the Pilgrims of a later day. The Goddess of Liberty, mounts a pedestal, is joined by the Spirit of Brotherhood, and the two are surrounded by immigrants from all nations. The Interpreter says,

"The wheel has turned full circle and the road
The Pilgrims trod now winds about the earth,
A way for all the people of the earth,
A bond of brotherhood for all the world."

The name of the author and director, Esther Willard Bates, is sufficient guarantee of the artistry of the production. The story is significant in theme and compelling in human interest. There is a simple but well-knit plot, coming to a strong and legitimate climax. The same unity that is seen in the plot is evident in the proportioning of music, tableau and light effects. Great emphasis is laid upon beauty, but not merely for spectacular purposes. It is by no means easy to keep beauty of detail properly subordinated to a great idea, and much credit is due the artist who works to that end. Though art is not didactic, and "beauty is its own excuse for being," yet a religious pageant should be first of all meaningful.

The attractive and illuminating short plays of life in India, China, Japan, Turkey, Africa and other foreign lands, given in Paul Revere Hall every day during the Council, under the auspices of the Missionary Education Society, must be reserved for a later article.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

On Religious Themes

The Use of the Story in Religious Education, by Margaret W. Eggleston (Doran). Mrs. Eggleston is instructor in story-telling in the Boston University School of Religious Education. She is also an artist and past master in the art. What is more, she has a faculty for telling others how to do it. The book is a course in itself—for teachers in community schools or church schools, recreational leaders or mothers. The whole field of story telling is covered in a fascinating way, and there are some valuable samples of original stories.

Plans for Sunday School Evangelism, by Frank L. Brown (Revell). The Sunday school furnishes between eighty and ninety per cent. of the new church members. This statement is enough to show that it ought to be the chief field of evangelism. To McKinley's epoch-making phrase of "educational evangelism," the author adds "graded evangelism." He indicates that the time of decision is in the intermediate department and that there the appeal should be "to follow Christ as the world's greatest Leader and Guide, who meets the need of life for an ideal Saviour and Comrade." It is a sane, sensible book for pastors, superintendents, teachers and parents.

Summit Views, by John Edward Russell (Revell). The author of this volume of sermons is a Presbyterian pastor in Minneapolis. He has a faculty for framing titles—The Cross in the Crisis, The Bitter Sweet Year, Is America Discovered Yet? Inspiration to Date. The text for The Secret of the Offensive is Galatians 1: 16-17. Paul says: "I conferred not with flesh and blood, . . . but I went into Arabia." There is a sympathetic heart tone in these messages as well as a fine interpretation of the themes.

Pre-millennialism, by George P. Mains (The Abingdon Press). A sharp and sane criticism of pre-millennial claims. The author shows that they are based largely on a single book, the Apocalypse, and on an unscientific use of Scripture. Pre-millennialism is Jewish, not Christian, is unscientific and is based on a false psychology of history. Dr. Mains says that he thoroughly believes that "it represents a false and harmful philosophy of Christ's spiritual plans for the human world, therefore have I written." The little book is clear, concise and conclusive. It needed to be done.

A Short History of the Doctrine of the Atonement, by L. W. Grensted (Longmans). As this is the latest so also it is the best brief survey of the varying interpretations of the Atonement held by theologians of the Christian Church from the beginning to the present time. Nearly every writer of importance is considered, including such modern authors as Edwards, Hodge, Shedd, Bushnell, G. B. Stevens, among Americans, and Dale, Denny, Lidgett, McLeod, Campbell, Jowett, Maurice, Westcott and Moberley among English writers, Schliermacher, Ritschl and Sabatier on the continent. Well-chosen quotations are employed from each writer, the interpretation is remarkably lucid and the presentation interesting. The volume closes with several pages on R. C. Moberley's "Atonement and Personality" concerning which Dr. Grensted says in his closing sentence: "Few recent writings are at once so sane and so constructive, and, despite much misunderstanding, it is in such attempts that the hope of the future lies." We commend the volume to all ministers and students of theology.

St. Luke, the Man and His Work, by H. McLachlan (Longmans). A scholarly and exhaustive study of the great apostle. Some chapter headings will indicate the sometimes unusual method of treatment: The Man of Letters, The Linguist, The Editor, The Theologian, The Humorist, The Letter-Writer, The Reporter, The Diarist, Luke and His Friends, etc. This is not a "popular" volume, but all who care to study the subject will find it exceedingly suggestive, informing and helpful.

The Problem of Evil, by Peter Green, Canon of Manchester (Longmans). An elaborate study of a persistent problem, the theme of the Book of Job and of innumerable subsequent discussions. It contains much of theory, such as the statement, "Christ took human nature, we must believe, before the foundation of the world"; and this, "The Fall must have occurred, if at all, in some state of being very different from our present state." At many points the reader may take issue with the author. Nevertheless the treatise is thought provoking, and in its general trend, as well as in many points in the discussion, will probably be satisfactory to most readers who have given any careful thought to the subject.

A More Christian Industrial Order, by Henry Sloane Coffin (Macmillan). An admirable little book presenting the practical workings of real Christianity, the kind that has not yet been tried, the kind that will prevent social war as well as military war. It considers the Christian as Producer, as Consumer, as Owner, as Investor, as Employer and Employee, and the final chapter is on Democracy and Faith. There cannot be too much of this kind of preaching. At last men are asking, "What is the matter with our Christianity?" And here it is answered, not in a system of dogmas, but in the practical application of the fundamental teachings of Christ, in a God who is paternal and a Christ who makes all men brothers.

Short Stories

Ships Across the Sea, by Ralph Paine (Houghton Mifflin). Nine short stories of the American Navy in war time. Life on a destroyer, submarine battles, merchant marine, the British "Q Boat," German plots on the Maine coast, are some of the themes of these thrilling tales. Every one is a gem. No one can write a better sea story than this same Ralph Paine.

The Ruling Passion, and The Blue Flower, by Henry van Dyke (Scribners). These are volumes V. and VI. in the admirable Avalon Edition of Dr. van Dyke's works. The first contains eight short "stories and romances," among them being "The Keeper of the Light"; and the second contains nine stories, among them are "The Blue Flower," "The Other Wise Man" and the "First Christmas Tree." This edition is sold only by subscription.

In Lincoln's Chair, by Ida M. Tarbell (Macmillan). Another beautiful story, similar to "He Knew Lincoln." This relates what the man who knew Lincoln said about Lincoln's faith in God and in the righteousness of his fight against slavery. It is a fine interpretation of the religious side of Lincoln's nature, and it is undoubtedly true. One sentence quoted from Lincoln contains a message for our time: "What it seems to me He's trying to do is to get men to see that there can't be any peace or happiness in this world so long as they ain't fair to one another."

History and Travel

Adventurers of Oregon, by Constance Lindsay Skinner (Yale University Press). Miss Skinner was born at a fur-trading post and spent her childhood in the wilderness. Therefore she is able to give a spirited account of the persistent courage and the romance which belonged to the old days of the dominant fur trade. The life with all its ramifications was strange and barbaric in its toilsomeness, its wild pleasures and its fierce rivalries. There is a fine chapter on the Lewis and Clark Expedition, a topic not often so well treated, with just enough detail. The voyages of Gray and of Vancouver are described and also the struggles of the Astoria Overlanders, heroic but marked by "deplorable ignorance and inefficiency." All in all, this is a picturesque piece of writing. It is Vol. 22 in the Chronicles of America.

The Fight for a Free Sea, by Ralph D. Paine (Yale University Press). Vol. 17 of "The Chronicles of America" takes up the half shameful, half glorious record of the War of 1812 and does full justice to both phases. Unpreparedness was more excusable then than recently, but, with no allies to hold the front while we made ready, the consequences were fearful. The war as waged on land and on the Great Lakes has due attention without encroaching on that belonging to "The Navy on Blue Water." Elsewhere the same author has dealt with the great history of the Yankee privateers. In the navy the ships and the men were of the same caliber. That we had larger and better ships is a fact often used to excuse British failure. "But it detracts not at all from the glory these ships won to remember that they were larger and of better design and armament than the British frigates they shot to pieces with such methodical accuracy." The racy description of the capture of Washington is balanced by the masterly account of the Battle of New Orleans. To read these two gems with care illuminates the mind as to democracy in general and the American variety in particular.

Wanderings, by Richard Curle (Dutton). An entertaining book of travel to many lands, familiar and unfamiliar. There are unusual scenes near at hand, like "Summer on the Isle of Sark," and "London Sidelights," but most of the chapters take us to remote places like British Guiana, the Victoria Falls, the Heart of Swaziland, In Peru, Winter in Rhodesia, etc. The record covers many years and some of it is reminiscent of a departed past. The author has a discerning eye and a pleasing gift of description.

The Shadow-Show, by J. H. Curle (Doran). Adopting as title a phrase from the "Rubaiyat," the author in this book of travels, also assumes the appropriate manner of cynical aloofness. The least pleasing passages are those which exhibit his own brand of philosophy. Yet many of his comments by the way are shrewd, such as his criticism of the Turk as a ruler and his views about the modern woman. He seems to have been everywhere, in regions known and unknown. A love of travel, the power to absorb impressions and a facile pen are gifts which produce an entertaining book.

VIII. The World the Pilgrims Knew

By Isaac Ogden Rankin

Ours is the first generation in history without an unknown land of promise, a fairyland of expectation and tradition somewhere on the earth. Such a title as "The Indies" can never mean to us what it meant to the people of the Pilgrim time. Our opportunity of exploration is nearly at an end. The world is mapped. English-speaking men have stood upon the ice at both the poles. What remains for the adventurer is merely the filling in of small details of knowledge in Arctic and Antarctic seas and continents—in the dripping forests of the Congo and the Amazon, among the homes of the head-hunters in the hot islands of the China seas, and in the deserts of Asia, Africa and Australia.

It was otherwise with the Pilgrims when in Leyden their leaders looked about the world to discover a refuge and an opportunity of witness for Christ. There was a great background then of unexplored territory in the world. India was the fairyland of the Pilgrim time, as it had been for centuries before them. But India was out of the range for settlement for the Pilgrims because it was an occupied and a dangerous land. In this direction there were plenty of old tales of travel to fill the imagination—tales from the crusades and from books of travel, half experience and half legend, like those of Sir John Maundeville and Marco Polo. The latter of these lived long in China and even tells us of the existence of Japan. But his first interest as a Venetian trader, like that of Maundeville, the traveler, is with India.

From the painting by Sir John Everett Millais

THE BOYHOOD OF RALEIGH

This love of adventure, this craving to know more of the world and to explore its unknown places, was in the air of the whole century which revealed America and the southern path around the African cape to India. There was a glamour in these tales which appealed to boys and men alike, as it does to the two lads who in Sir John Everett Millais' imaginative picture of The Boyhood of Raleigh are listening to the adventures of the sailor on the pier.

India

Now what did India mean to the Pilgrims and their generation? Very much what it had meant for nearly three hundred years, back to the time of Maundeville, and earlier, to all Western Europe. It was to find a way to India that Columbus went west and Diaz south. To the romantic and the imaginative it meant gold and jewels. But to the practical man, and to the merchant class especially, it did not mean that, it meant chiefly pepper and spice and silk and calico. That was the trade of which the Venetians tried to keep a monopoly. In the "Merchant of Venice," the stone of which the church is built reminds Antonio's acquaintance

> "Of dangerous rocks
> Which, touching but my gentle vessel's side,
> Would scatter all her spices on the stream,
> Enrobe the roaring waters with my silks . . ."

And Shylock tells us of Antonio's ports of call for argosies: "He hath an argosy bound to Tripolis, another to the Indies; I understand moreover upon the Rialto, he hath a third at Mexico, a fourth for England, and other ventures, he hath squand'red abroad." This was written in the Pilgrim time and gives us an intelligent Englishman's estimate of the scope of Venetian commerce. Venice, you might say, was mainly built out of pepper and spice. As long ago as the time of Alaric, the Goth, 1,200 years before the founding of the Pilgrim Church, the ransom demanded of Rome by the barbarian army included gold and silver and 3,000 pounds of pepper.

Pepper and Spice

Pepper was a luxury, you see. And so were nutmegs and cloves. In his famous voyage around the world—the first one made by Englishmen—Francis Drake, you may remember, robbed the Spanish ships and ports all the way up the coast of Western America from Chili to California. Then he crossed the Pacific to the spice islands. His ship, first called the Pelican and then The Golden Hind—a ship much smaller than the Mayflower—ran aground one night on a rock off the coast of Celebes; "Where we stuck fast," writes Francis Pretty, the chronicler of the voyage, "from eight of the clock at night till four of the clock in the afternoon the next day, being indeed out of hope to escape the danger." But Drake was not a man to be beaten. He proceeded to lighten his ship on the rocks. And the very first thing he took out of her was "three ton of cloves." When the ship floated they put back the cloves and the cannon and sailed on to the Island of Batjan, of which Pretty says: "Their fruits be divers and plentiful; as nutmegs, ginger, long pepper, lemons, cucumbers, cocos (cocoanuts), etc."

One explanation of all this interest in pepper and spice is simple and has already been stated. The people of Europe had no ice. Nothing would keep in its natural state. They ate salted or pickled meat and fish most of the time. And they craved pepper and spice and had to send to India to find them.

Many legends grow about the hot lands where the pepper vines grow: Here is what Maundeville says about one of them: "In that country are many kinds of serpents and other vermin, in consequence of the great heat of the country and of the pepper. And some men say that when they will gather the pepper, they make fires and burn thereabouts, to make the serpents and cocodrills to fly; but this is not true. But this they do: they anoint their hands and feet with a juice made of snails and other things, of which the serpents and other venomous beasts hate the savor; and that makes them fly before them, because of the smell, and then they gather in the pepper in safety."

Much more sane and sensible is Marco Polo's description, more than three hundred years before the Pilgrims came to Holland, of the Indian kingdom of Malabar, a name which has survived through all the centuries: "In this kingdom there is vast abundance of pepper, ginger, cubebs, and Indian nuts; and the finest and most beautiful cottons are manufactured that can be found in any part of the world."

Why India Would Not Do

Now it happens that we know a good deal about India just in the Pilgrim time. The great Mogul, Emperor Akbar, was reigning and conquering during the reign of Elizabeth and died only two years later than she. India then was a poor country with rich rulers who sucked their people dry with taxes. Akbar was perhaps the wisest and most considerate monarch India has known until the English came. But Akbar demanded a third of all their crops from the farmers. India is one of the poorest of all countries now. But it did grow pepper. And one of the first things first the Portuguese and then the Dutch did in India and further India was to set up a monopoly in pepper and spice. And that monopoly passed to Spain when the Spanish king took Lisbon.

India, then for all its romance of treasure and spice, lay quite outside the Pilgrim purpose. For it was already fully occupied as well as wholly out of reach. Neither the Dutch nor the English, much less the Portuguese, encouraged European settlements in the East. And what was wanted was a place to settle and not first of all a place to trade, a place with abundant elbow room, though not without missionary opportunity.

The Glamour of Guiana

The inquiring Pilgrims came next, for a little time, under the spell of one of the most remarkable romances of travel and inventive imagination the world has ever known—the book they knew as Raleigh's "Discovery of Guiana." I have called it a romance, for it is neither more nor less than this, as those who have read the book will remember. Raleigh explored widely in what is now the territory of Venezuela, in the valley of the Orinoco. He had come upon the tradition of a golden city, the famous city of El Dorado, and he had pursued this tradition among the Indian villages very much as wanderers in the desert follow a mirage.

Now Raleigh in the days of Bradford's childhood was a great man in English common talk. He had been for a long time a favorite in Queen Elizabeth's court and then a sailor and explorer, about whom every Englishman had heard. His book is all expectation and invitation. His Indian geese of village chieftains are all royal swans as he tells the tale. And he makes an eloquent appeal for taking possession of this famous empire of the kings of El Dorado by Englishmen. "To conclude, Guiana is a country . . . never sacked, turned nor wrought. . . . The graves have not been opened for gold, the mines not broken with sledges, nor their images pulled down out of their temples. It hath never been entered by any army of strength, and never conquered or possessed by any Christian prince. . . . Besides, by keeping one good fort, or building one town of strength, the whole empire is guarded. . . . And I am resolved that if there were but a small army afoot in Guiana, marching toward Manoa, the chief city of Inga, he would yield to her Majesty by way of composition so many hundred thousand yearly as should both defend all enemies abroad, and defray all expenses at home." And the curious thing about the story, is that, for one reason or another, Raleigh expected none of his native allies to care about having any of the gold.

Raleigh's credulity is rather surprising but it is not at all wonderful that his geography is wrong, for the whole interior of South America was then quite unknown. By modern knowledge the site he gives for his golden city would be somewhere in the Amazon forests, perhaps near that hitherto unexplored river which Roosevelt navigated. The wonderful stories of Mexico and Peru were surging in Raleigh's brain. In Guiana he finds no pepper nor spices; but abundant fruits. He tells of the beautiful valley of Amariocapana, "Whose plains stretch themselves some sixty miles in length, east and west; as fair ground and beautiful fields as any man hath seen, with divers copses scattered here and there by the river's side, and all as full of deer as any forest or park in England, and in every lake and river the like abundance of fish and fowl." Raleigh's adventures are the basis on which Charles Kingsley built his romance of "Westward Ho!" though he takes his adventurers over the mountains into what is now Columbia and brings them home with a captured Spanish galleon and a cargo of gold.

No wonder many of the hard-working Pilgrims liked this picture of an easy life and that the weaker heads among them ignored the winters that suffered from torrential rains and the discussions of a cure for poisoned arrows which the Spaniards had never been able to extort by promises or torments from those who shot them. The cooler and wiser heads dismissed the thought of Guiana, and Bradford tells us the reasons why: "Those for Guiana aledged yt the cuntrie was rich, fruitful & blessed with a perpetuall spring, and a flourishing greenes; where vigorous nature brought forth all things in abundance & plentie without any great labour or art of man. So as it must needs make ye inhabitants rich, seing less provisions of clothing and other things would serve, then in more coulder & less fruitfull countries must be had. As also yt the Spaniards (having much more than they could possess) had not yet planted there, nor were anywhere very near ye same. But to this it was answered, that out of question ye countrie was both fruitfull and pleasante, and might yeeld riches & maintenance to ye possessors, more easily than any othere; yet, other things being considered, it would not be so fitt for them. And first, yt such hot countries are subject to greevuos diseases, and many noisome impediments, which other, more temperate places are freer from, and would not so well agree with our English bodys, Again, if they should live & doe well, the jealous Spaniard would never suffer them long, but would displante or overthrow them, as he did ye French in Florida, who were seated furder from his richest countries; and the sooner because they should have none to protect them, & their owne strength would be too smale to resiste so potent an enemie, & so neare a neighbor."

Here again it was the Spaniard who closed the door, quite fortunately for the Pilgrim Church. For if more than half of them died of scurvy and lack of food and shelter in the icy New England winter few would have been likely to survive the malarial fevers and the poisoned arrows of the Orinoco. The history of Venezuela is comment enough on the wisdom of this refusal of Guiana. And yet it was only three years after the Pilgrims landed in New England that the first permanent English settlement was founded in the little island of St. Christopher (St. Kitts).

Florida

The story of Florida was evidently well known to the Pilgrim leaders. There too discovery, by the Spaniards, followed after a mirage—the story of the Fountain of Youth, which Ponce de Leon sought. The troubles and the destruction of the French Huguenot settlers at Port Royal and on the St. John's River served the Pilgrims as a warning. No Englishman would deliberately choose the Spaniard as a neighbor. Even farther north Raleigh's first settlement at Roanoke did not last a year and the second and third attempts were just as unsuccessful.

Virginia

Virginia was the first successful British colony, and even Virginia very nearly failed. Jamestown was founded in 1607, the year when the Pilgrims under persecution were trying to escape from Scrooby to Holland. The next year the infant colony was set in order by the famous Captain John Smith. In 1610, when the Pilgrims were settling down quietly in Leyden, the Jamestown settlers were so much at the end of their resources and their courage that they packed up their possessions and abandoned the colony—only to be turned back at the river's mouth by the arrival of reinforcements and supplies under Lord Delaware. There was famine in Virginia. There was sickness. There were wars with the Indians. But by the time the Pilgrims were making their arrangements to cross the Atlantic, 20,000 pounds of tobacco were exported in 1619 from Virginia to England and the beginnings were made of the importation into the colony of Negroes from Africa and "indentured Servants" from England. Two years later the home people sent them a shipload of English wives. It took twelve years to make the Virginia colony self-supporting; the Plymouth colony was on its own feet in a year. If we wish to read about conditions in Virginia at about the time of the founding of Plymouth, Mary Johnson has given us a powerful and truthful imaginative picture of them in her story, "To Have and to Hold," the action of which begins the year after the landing of the Pilgrims.

Captain John Smith

The most powerful single figure in the Virginia history is that of Captain John Smith. The story of his rescue from death by Pocohontas is probably quite true. He gave a new lease of life to the dying colony. But he immediately concerns the Pilgrim Fathers by his voyage of exploration up the coast of North America in 1611, in the course of which he visited and named the port of Plymouth and gave the name of New England to the whole territory which ever since has borne it. Smith's map and book were in the hands of the Pilgrims while they were considering the place of their settlement, though neither Plymouth nor Cape Cod much interested them then, for they did not intend to settle where they finally did.

It would be interesting to follow the career of Smith, perhaps the most adventurous man of his generation and one of the great pioneers of the America we know. Half a century ago it was the fashion to set him down as a braggart and a liar, but cooler study of the evidence has convinced historians that he underwent the adventures of which he himself tells, fought as champion of Christendom against a Turk in the tournament between the camps, was slave to a Turkish Sultana and escaped to Russia, saved the Virginia colony in its first feeble anarchy and was saved by the Indian princess, named and mapped New England. His force and skill as governor of Virginia in handling the suspicious Indian tribes preclude a judgment that he was an empty braggart. And it is enough to quote his own words about the qualities needed by a colonist to show that he was both clear-seeing and wise. It is in his "Description of New England" that he says: "But it is not a worke for every one, to manage such an affaire as makes a discoverie, and plants a Colony: It requires all the best parts of Art, Judgment, Courage, Honesty, Constancy, Diligence and Industrie, to do but neare well."

And he adds, thinking, no doubt, of what he himself had seen and done: "Columbus, Cortez, Pitzara, Soto, Magelleanes and the rest served more than apprentiship to learne how to begin their most memorable attempts in the West Indies; which to the wonder of all ages successfully they effected, when many hundreds of others farre above them in the world's opinion, beeing instructed but by relation, came to shame and confusion in actions of small moment, who doubtless in other matters, were both wise, discreet, generous and courageous."

How far the Leyden Pilgrims measured up to this high estimate by a great captain and colonizer the next few years were to show. But we may imagine Robinson and Brewster, Bradford and Carver, and Winslow and Cushman and Fuller, stopping at this passage to consider whether the Pilgrim Church were equal to these things and could provide these high qualities in some new venture of faith. It was not for lack of warning, both from history and precept, that the Pilgrim leaders hesitated as to how they should use their small resources for the great ends they had in view.

The next article in this series will be: What the Pilgrims Knew about New England.

From Day to Day

By Allen Chesterfield

I spent a delightful half hour recently inspecting the old First Parish Church in Deerfield in the Connecticut Valley. The organization dates back over two hundred years. The present edifice was built in 1824 and represents the finest type of colonial architecture. The massive, high pulpit is at the end of the structure nearest the street, so that late-comers have to face the reproachful gaze of their more punctual fellow worshipers. The old-fashioned box pews, the white walls and the quiet, churchly atmosphere conduce to the spirit of reverence. In the vestibule are tablets to the memory of former pastors who figured prominently in the ecclesiastical affairs of their day—a Mather who was a pioneer missionary in the Connecticut Valley, John Williams, whose capture by the Indians in 1702 after his wife had been murdered and whose return to Deerfield after several years of exile constitute one of the romantic episodes of New England history. A third tablet commemorates the labors of Samuel Willard, whom an orthodox council found too heretical for fellowship, but whose statement of belief by which he was judged and condemned is said to be stiff enough for Mark Mathews of Seattle and R. A. Torrey of Los Angeles.

This is certainly one of the shrines the existence and attractiveness of which should be more widely known throughout New England this Tercentenary year. Parties motoring through the lovely main street of old Deerfield often pause to look into this historic sanctuary. Tours now being planned for this and next summer, should certainly include an hour's stay within the walls of this most beautiful and impressive temple. If a service of prayer and praise could be arranged for a specific afternoon each week, so much the better. Even motorists tearing from town to town with no other motive than to see what time they can make might be induced to tarry a while and rest and pray. Our fine old New England edifices should not only be centers of interest for the curious but fountains whence the waters of life should continually proceed.

Speaking of John Williams, the heroic and almost martyred Deerfield minister of the early eighteenth century, I was interested to find that the house set apart in the first days of the settlement by vote of the town for the parish minister is now the abode of a dozen lively boys in their teens, who constitute a part of the membership of Deerfield Academy. The house itself has been preserved substantially in the form in which it was built more than two centuries ago, but a large addition in the rear and the introduction of those modern touches which do not sacrifice the beauty of the ancient finishings make it a delightful dwelling-place today. The academy itself has come to be an important institution in the life of the town and of the Connecticut Valley. For many decades it has fulfilled the functions of a town high school, as is the case in so many other old-time New England academies, but its broader service was gradually being contracted, until about twenty years ago, Mr. Frank L. Boyden, a young Amherst graduate, took the principalship.

A most interesting experiment it is that Mr. Boyden and his competent associates on the teaching staff of the Deerfield Academy are working out. Indeed, it may be said to have passed the experimental stage, for the institution is stronger today in its hold upon the community than ever before in its long and honorable history. The distinctive feature about the school is that it ministers with equal effectiveness to two classes of pupils. One class consists of twenty-five boys from fourteen to eighteen, who come from places at a considerable distance and who room and board in the dormitories. The second comprises one hundred or more boys and girls in their later teens who come from up and down the Connecticut Valley and who are registered as day pupils only. But the boys in both classes of students spend the late afternoon together on the athletic field, or in the winter enjoy indoor sports, with Principal Boyden as their coach. All the school teams are made up jointly of boys from the two classes of pupils. Consequently the old line between "town and gown," so to speak, is practically obliterated. Boys and young men from other parts of the country find all the advantages of a first-class boarding school, with unusually careful personal oversight and direction in forming habits of scholarship, while the town itself and other neighboring villages are altogether satisfied with what the academy offers to their own boys and girls. The combination is so unusual that the Deerfield idea has been made the subject of several magazine articles and the method is attracting the attention of educational leaders in many places. A school like this is doing much toward increasing the attractiveness of rural life and thus helping to solve the oft-debated country problem. Mr. Boyden's personal popularity is as great among the townspeople as among the students and he has held numerous civic offices including that of Chief of Police, the duties of which in this well-behaved, conservative New England town are not onerous. He represented the town in the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention. The good will of the community was clearly shown in connection with the recent alumni banquet, which was attended by three hundred persons and addressed by President Meiklejohn of Amherst and C. L. Underhill of Somerville, a prominent former member of the Massachusetts Legislature. The way the townspeople flocked in and the eagerness with which they listened to the after-dinner speaking, as well as the subsidy which they grant the school every year, all go to prove that it is far better for some New England academies to reconstruct their methods rather than go out of business entirely.

The Rose Beyond the Wall

Near shaded wall a rose once grew,
  Budded and blossomed in God's free light,
Watered and fed by morning dew,
  Shedding its sweetness day and night.

As it grew and blossomed fair and tall,
  Slowly rising to a loftier height,
It came to a crevice in the wall,
  Through whch there shone a beam of light.

Onward it crept with added strength,
  With never a thought of fear or pride;
And it followed the light through the crevice's
    length,
  And unfolded itself on the other side.

The light, the dew, the broadening view,
  Were found the same as they were before;
And it lost itself in beauties new,
  Breathing its fragrance more and more.

Shall claim of death cause us to grieve,
  And make our courage faint or fall?
Nay, let us faith and hope receive—
  The rose still grows beyond the wall,

Scattering fragrance far and wide,
  Just as it did in days of yore,
Just as it did on the other side,
  Just as it will forevermore.

Speaking of the commencement season, I am sorry for any man who does not take a day or at least an evening off to attend some graduation exercises, even if they be those only of a grammar school. There is nothing quite so inspiring in these days when many causes for discouragement can readily be found than the sight of fresh young faces and the words and bearing of those who have completed a given course and are just being speeded forward to begin a new chapter in their careers. It is hard to be pessimistic as you listen to their cheers and songs or catch the tenor of their essays and orations, or see them produce a pageant or a play in such a fashion as to do credit to their appreciation of poetry and art, and which reveal sometimes unexpected capacities for acting and interpretation. Even better it is to mark the response which the youth of today seldom fail to make when a baccalaureate preacher or commencement orator or after-dinner speaker appeals to that which is deepest and best in young life. The youth of today may not speak or feel or even think exactly as their elders do or would like to have them speak or think or feel, but as I have seen them on more than one graduation platform these fair summer days, the sight has refreshed my confidence in the youth of America and given me great hope that they will come up in due season to better the record of the generation which they will so soon succeed.

American Boarders of Japan in Annual Meeting

By M. E. Hall

The American Board's Japan Mission held its annual meeting at Arima from May 19–24. Those attending the session this year were struck with one thing above all others, the thinned ranks of the Mission. How meet the extraordinary situation that now exists in Japan with a depleted force is indeed a question. One encounters in Japan today on every hand a feeling that the nation has not bettered itself through its commercialism and that the Gospel of Jesus is the only hope of this country. To meet this need and to fill the empty places in the ranks, the Mission is asking for seven new families and some 15 single men and women to invest their lives in Japan.

The annual report by Mr. Beam was a sort of "Educational Film," picturing the varied interests and activities of the entire Mission. It was hopeful and stimulating. It showed the Mission fillng an important place in the work of the Kingdom and further showed some tremendous openings here for consecrated leadership. Japan still has its sections of a million souls without a single worker! This is a real challenge for pioneer work.

Returning from a tour of investigation of the Board's work in the South Pacific Islands, Dr. and Mrs. Pedley gave the Mission a look into the work of another world, a work showing that the days of heroic missionary effort are not things of the past. An interesting light was thrown on the work among the natives. After taking over the rule of these Islands the Japanese Government immediately financed an undertaking of sending a score of Christian workers to the new possessions as missionaries of the Gospel—footing the entire bill and promising continued support.

The new President of the Doshisha University, Dr. Ebina, left his work and came to the Mission meeting to give a stirring appeal for support of his recently assumed office and for the forward movement of the University.

The Mission faces a new year with hope and courage. It would be hard to conceive of a time when the Gospel of Jesus had the opportunity that it now has to meet the growing consciousness of this people, to turn its commercial spirit into the spirit of righteousness and to place in the hearts of the nation the spirit of Jesus as the only hope of true greatness. To this end the Mission pledges itself to renewed action and consecration.

Knockabout Paper—No. 4

By George Lawrence Parker

Now in this "Knockabout," I am asking myself if the good Lord has not some smiling little angels whose chief business is to smile over our shoulders and make fun of us when we pull our long faces.

For instance, there was "me" last Thanksgiving Day. My family and my turkey were enjoying each other in our two-by-four house on Cape Cod. But "me"? I was in a lonesome hotel in Pittsburgh, a wandering "unknown." After breakfast I was "all dressed up but nowhere to go." I almost asked the waiter to take dinner with me. Why not?

In my loneliness I picked up a Pittsburgh paper to see if there were notices of Thanksgiving services. And I blessed the ministers who were not too lazy to publish the Good Tidings in the daily press.

The notice I finally obeyed was one that told of a union service in Carnegie Hall, the gift of the noble Andrew. Perhaps if I mixed some intellectual curiosity with my devotional aim I may be forgiven. Whoever said that religion and intellect should be divorced?

Now, I thought, if this union service is true to type I will come away as lonely as I go. I had in mind some union services I have attended and helped to conduct within a radius of a few miles of Boston Common. But I made up my mind to go, anyhow.

And I was proud of the noble Andrew and of America as I saw the art treasures gathered in Carnegie Library. I hate to think that New York and Boston, or even Chicago, have a monopoly on what all Americans ought to see. And I also mused as I saw all of this, "Why not have more real pictures and replicas of the Great Masters in our ordinary churches? Why not make our vestibules more like beautiful gates of the temple?"

When I got into the Assembly Hall not many folk were there. But in ten minutes it was full, although neither Gabriel nor W. J. Bryan were advertised to speak.

Before I had been seated many minutes a lady came clear across the hall and greeted me. And behold she was an old friend whom I had not seen for two years and she knew Cape Cod and the two-by-four house and all that therein was! And as I mixed social renewal with spiritual renewal I think the Lord was not displeased. Try the mixture, all ye Boards of Deacons and Elders!

As I looked up to the platform I saw another friend, Dr. L. H. B., once of Boston and Malden, now ministering to a large congregation of sooty but clean-souled Pittsburghers. And when I saw him I said, "The world is a small place, but it is this union service that has brought me and these friends together." And I was reminded that the Christian Church renders many a service that the world never hears of by advertisement. Her right hand of public reform is often ignorant of her left hand of kindly personal ministry. But we do not know which hand is most prized by the Lord. Let the church do the one, but not leave the other undone. I trust I do not here need to use quotation marks!

Yes, the preacher preached a good sermon. But that is not the main point.

The main point is that the church on Thanksgiving and every other day must serve a three-course meal, feeding men religiously, mentally and socially. The meal is incomplete if any of these is lacking. I think that just now the mental course needs enrichment. My other main point is this. I went back to my hotel to end my Thanksgiving Day no longer lonely. I had seen six hundred or more American people keeping the feast of the Pilgrims. And though I was far from Cape Cod and the two-by-four house I was warmed and cheered. The reason was, I think, that I had been reminded of Another Home which Chesterton says is "a fairer place than Eden, and a taller town than Rome," and which was, once, more beautifully called "My Father's House." Yes, union services are worth while, after all!

This is why I think that the good Lord keeps some little Optimistic Angels to smile at our long faces. And I hear one of them say now that here endeth the fourth "Knockabout."

Help Armenia

Dear Mr. Editor:

Does not the action of our Senate toward Armenia suggest the thought that we need a new sense of stewardship? Our government should not hesitate to extend to the suffering Armenians our sympathy, our aid and our strong protecting arm.

Let me ask another question: Are not our churches hoarding up money for future use that should be used today to help the millions of helpless, starving orphans? The best way to prepare for the future, is to meet God's requirements of today. Are we not warranted by the promises of Christ in asking that all the means of communication and transportation which have conveyed messages of death, may now be used to carry messengers of peace, with the Bread of Life? So shall we receive an answer to that prayer, "Hallowed be thy name; thy Kingdom come; thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," and the nations instead of being mutual haters will become mutual friends.

December or May?

Dear Mr. Editor:

Allow me to add a word of approval to the article written by Rev. Edwin H. Byington, appearing in your issue of July 1 and entitled, "May vs. December." It has taken several years for this church in Stratford to get the Every Member Canvass running in good shape. Any change to another date would, I am sure, be unadvisable. With the business of the church following so closely the fiscal year, it becomes quite necessary to make some provision for funds at the end of the year.

In regard to the Canvass another year, for the larger work, the tentative plan for this church is as follows: We plan to have the regular Every Member Canvass in December; at that time we will ask our people to continue their Emergency Fund pledges six months longer, from May, 1921, to December, 1921. Then in December, 1921, we will be ready to combine both regular Benevolent pledges, with Emergency benevolent pledges, asking our people to assume both as the future pledge.

Of course there are many churches which now take their Every Member Canvass in May. Why not leave it to the individual church to follow its usual custom? The main thing is to get the pledges. If they can be obtained better at one time than another, let the local church determine it. Past experience has proven, has it not, that it is almost impossible to have all of our churches follow the same details in any program.

Yours for the December Canvass,

R. C. Whitehead.

Wisconsin Bears Testimony

Dear Mr. Editor:

It is well known that Wisconsin has been one of the wettest states in the Union, especially in the larger centers of population. For its size, La Crosse was as decidedly a liquor town as Milwaukee. We had five breweries, and the number of saloons ranged around 150 for 35,000 people. Roadhouses along our principal highways were a constant nuisance, and there were plenty of fellows "doing time" on account of them. The following item, which appeared on the first page of our local paper recently is, therefore, of special interest to us, and may be to others:

> Wanted—A prisoner to keep the fires going at the county jail.
> That's the kind of an advertisement that Sheriff Lund is contemplating.
> "Only one left out there and he has plenty of work to do," said the sheriff. "I need another one. But they don't seem to come."
> Business was never so poor as at the present. In past years the jail has been full of tramps by this time, anxious to get a place to sleep and eat free of charge. In fact some of them used to wait until a policeman was around, then they would steal a pair of mittens, shoes or socks, just to be sure of a place to stay during the winter. But nothing like that happens any more.
> "No beer, no work—for us," said Judge Brindley when asked about the lack of business in his court, the place where the "30 days at the county jail" sentences come from.

One of our saloon keepers was a genuine humorist. His name is August Mueller. A year ago last June he had this placed on the front of his saloon: "The first of July will be the last of August."

Though there is meanness enough left, the effects of the prohibition law in Wisconsin are simply marvelous. In 1918, Congressman Esch did not receive the support of La Crosse, his home town, for re-election because he voted to submit the prohibition amendment. We are of the opinion that there would be no such antagonism to his re-election again on this score.

Deer hunters in the Wisconsin woods report far fewer accidents during the hunting season this year than in former years, and attribute this to the absence of booze among the hunters.

Change More Than the Name

Dear Mr. Editor:

Good people seem to think it is necessary to change the name of the Sunday school. Some want to call it the "Bible School." Congregational leaders, as well as others, are trying to have us call it the "Church School." I have inquired why a change is necessary and the answer given is that the young people despise the Sunday school because of its inefficiency, and that in order to gain favorable attention from them we must give it a new name.

This point is well taken. Our terminology needs to be revised. When a theological term or institutional name has been spoiled by misuse, or is commonly misunderstood, it is generally better to throw it away and find a new name. But we cannot remove the popular prejudice against the Sunday school simply by changing its name. There must be corresponding change of character. It must be a real school, with pedagogical methods which will command respect.

IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

David Brings the Ark to Jerusalem

International Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 1. 2 Sam. 6:11-19; Ps. 24:7-10.

In order to understand the meaning and value of the ark of the covenant to the Jewish people let us think of the most sacred object or act connected with our own church. Even this will give but a faint notion of the way in which this holy object was venerated by all the people.

1. Reverence and Prosperity. Obed-edom was the visible proof of the wisdom and reward of reverence. He had welcomed the ark to his home and blessings had come steadily from its presence there. His treatment of the ark was for all practical purposes the same as his relation to God. When he took the ark into his house he took God into all the relations of his family. Study this lesson in its application to our modern homes. We say that we need a new building with modern plumbing or new furniture or more books. Is it not true that what we need supremely is God?

2. Bringing the Ark Home. Was it because David desired to have the ark or because he wanted the blessings that came with its possessions that he set about to bring it to Jerusalem? Were both motives worthy?

The way in which the ark was brought home is interesting. It was a profoundly religious act and so it was carried out with all the processions and stateliness appropriate to a great religious ceremony. We are less formal in our expression of religious feeling. Note the factor of joy in this religious act. We take our religion seriously. Our three hundred years of Pilgrim history have been marked by a sober and orderly manner. We do not go to church joyfully as we go to the picnic. We worship with seriousness and church never suggests particular happiness to the majority of our children. Ought this to be changed? How can we change it?

Then came the sacrifices. We do not associate the killing of an ox with worship. If we did the stockyards would be our temples. We read the Bible, sing, pray, think when we worship; David had an ox killed and sang and danced with all his might in order to express his reverence and trust in God. How unlike our methods! On the other hand it was the expression of the same emotion that we are seeking to render when we go to church. Worship involves sacrifice. In this case it was the giving of the life of an animal which had cost money. In our case it ought also to be giving a life of love and service.

3. The Mocker. Michal was watching the procession. She saw David in the free expression of his joy and she despised him. It is generally the onlookers who leap into the seats of the scornful and show their contempt for others. The severest critics of the players are the most self-satisfied and comfortable spectators of the game. So Michal despised David and the incident may be followed out in vs. 20-23. Watch for this tendency to be scornful of those who do not live in our way or act from the motives which control us. Scorn is one of the deadliest enemies of the soul.

4. Blessing the People. The real significance of this act of honor to God was its result in the people's life. They were the real object of the love and blessing of God. The feast that the king provided was only a symbol of the popular share in the home-coming of the ark. Perhaps few of them finally received the full blessing that was involved; but the purpose of it was general. This is the final test of any religious ceremony or act. It is not what the leaders or the favored few get out of it that counts; it is the enrichment of the popular life which is desirable. Neither churches nor worship are meant for the few but for all. How deeply is our church touching the community? Does it minister chiefly to the families that have grown up around it and enjoy its services; or is it a real power in the whole community, shaping the life of those who are not its members?

5. A Song of Long Ago. When we read the Psalms we seldom think of the actual conditions out of which they grew. They seem like pious poems in a sacred book. But they originated as all real songs do in an actual condition of life. Use your imagination to interpret Ps. 24. Let it be a part of the processional as the ark was brought to Jerusalem. We are given only vs. 7-10. The whole song should be taken together.

First the people in the procession sing. They call for the opening of the gates in order that the ark may be brought in. The King of Glory or the glorious King is another name for Jehovah God. Then the question is naturally asked by a solo voice, Who is this King of Glory? And the reply comes back, Jehovah mighty in battle. Nearer and nearer comes the procession and the demand is made and the question asked and answered a second time before the gate is opened. The whole song is vibrant with life and real in a concrete situation.

The Creed of a College Man

Recently several articles have appeared in this department on work with young people. Possibly a little light may be thrown on the subject by a statement from the young people themselves. The following, somewhat abbreviated, is by a young man about twenty who graduated from college this year. It was written on the subject, "The Creed of a College Man":

"Creeds do not find favor in this day and age of the world. This is especially true with the college man of the twentieth century. He does not want his beliefs ready-made. He does not want to be compelled to believe anything. The cry of "deeds not creeds" goes up from hundreds of thousands of young throats today.

Yet every college man has a creed. He must believe something, and not only that, but he must act upon his beliefs. Before he enters college he does not give his beliefs much thought. He readily accepts the word and beliefs of others. But as he proceeds in college a change takes place. He is no longer satisfied with ready-made beliefs. He makes a careful invoice of all his mental stock and rejects everything that does not accord with his developing reason.

Before the young man enters college he has scarcely given matters of religion a moment's serious thought. But now he zealously turns his attention to his religious beliefs and subjects them to the acid test. Many vague and childish beliefs are discarded. But usually the college man will not "lose his religion." He may trim off some of the fringes of religion that are often mistaken for Christianity, but in the end his religion will come to be a more vital and significant thing than before. Religion will become alive and vital, something that will appeal to him as a red-blooded member of society.

As a consequence of this mental reconstruction the college man develops a creed. It usually is not well formulated, is not very definite, nor is it written, but at the same time he has a more or less complete system of religious beliefs which make up his creed. This creed may indeed not be like any devised by ecclesiastics, it may not be like that of older people, but is just as deeply religious and probably more vital.

The following then is my creed, and I believe that it is not radically different from the creed of an average college man:

1. I believe in the existence of God. I believe that he is a good God, a loving God, the Creator and Spirit of the Universe, the Father of all mankind.

2. I believe in Jesus Christ who though in human form was Divine in goodness, Divine in love, and Divine in service for all mankind, and that his great love for man was shown by his death on the cross. As a teacher of right living Christ will never be surpassed.

3. I believe in Immortality. My college course has only served to strengthen my belief in the survival of personality after bodily death.

4. I believe in the Holy Bible as a book worthy of the study of a college man. I believe the Bible to be above all a book of life, not history, nor statutes, nor science, but life, and as a guide to right living it is unequaled.

5. I believe in prayer as a normal and necessary communion with God. It furnishes strength and help at all times.

6. I believe in the Church of Jesus Christ, which in spite of its failings is worthy of my heartiest support and co-operation as the organized force in the advancement of Christianity throughout the world.

7. I believe in my fellow men who though subject to failings and shortcomings are worthy of my trust and confidence.

8. Lastly, I believe in the life of service as the life truly befitting a college man. In whatever station of life I shall find myself, I believe it my duty to unselfishly serve God and man to the best of my ability."

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

Occupations and the Kingdom

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for July 25-31

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

How Should the Laboring Man Think of the Kingdom? Scripture Passage. James 2:1-20.

The Present Duty. The advancing thought of the church moves forward, now here, now there. We are just now attempting to give full emphasis to social and economic relations, one to another, under the teaching of Christ and of the Holy Spirit in experience. Underlying all our class divisions is the unity of our common relation to God and Christ. The first duty is that of a good and, so far as possible, complete understanding of the facts. The purpose of this meeting is to call the working man to the front to show us his ideal of God's kingdom and what it should become in the life of men. It will be best, if possible, to ask a man who labors how he does, or should, think of the Kingdom of Christ in the actual life of today and in the life we all desire tomorrow. It is not a case for comparing stresses and wearinesses, or asking who goes home most tired at night. It is a case of comparing notes in the common fellowship of living and it is the working man's turn to tell us what he does and what he thinks is his duty to God and to the rest of us.

The Forward Look. How would the workingman reshape society in justice not merely to his own class, but to those of all the rest? How would he function in advancing the common interest, which is his own interest as well? What are his rights, which are too often neglected or but partially attained? What are his duties, which are not always quite fulfilled? How can he advance his claims without destroying the rights and claims of others? It is along this line that we are earnestly seeking to do what is just and generous not only for one group, but for all. For any fruitful discussion of this matter must take its start with the scriptural proposition, For ye are members one of another. We have a great abundance of theories and some of them, when tried out in actual living, produce results quite contrary to expectation. A little history helps us here. We have to remember that the Christian Church in Jerusalem and the Christian Church in Plymouth both started on a basis of having all things in common; and that both found that method of social organization unworkable and intolerable. One use of history is to keep us from the waste of trying experiments over again.

The Partnership with God. For the individual in any society, the basis of all true living is the sense of a partnership with God. We have to try to fulfill what our knowledge of his character demands of us. And that excludes mere selfishness. The Kingdom of God is the order where each man instinctively and deliberately thinks of the other man. If we try to find the facts on this basis of taking God into our counsels, as well as making him a partner in our work, the more completely we look the facts of a confessedly difficult situation in the face the better it will be for our making God's Kingdom real in our own lives and bearing witness of it to other men.

Closet and Altar

THE FORWARD-LOOKING CHRIST

And they were in the way going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus was going before them.—Mark 10:32.

That we come after him and continue that which he began—this is our glory and our power. The life which other men have illustrated and ennobled in fragments Jesus Christ has glorified the whole of it.—George Adam Smith.

Our faith is in the Christ who walks
  With men today, in street and mart;
The constant friend who thinks and talks
  With those who seek him with the heart.

His gospel calls for living men,
  With singing blood and minds alert;
Strong men who fall to rise again,
  Who strive and bleed, with courage girt.

We serve no God whose work is done,
  Who rests within his firmament:
Our God, his labors just begun,
  Toils evermore, with power unspent.

God was and is and e'er shall be;
  Christ lived and loved—and loves us still;
And man goes forward, proud and free,
  God's present purpose to fulfill.

—Thomas Curtis Clark, Abr.

What I needed, and what Mr. Moody gave me, was a vision of the possibility of the opportunities that lie before a single human life. Of course, you can be good doctors and good lawyers and good in the army and navy or whatever else your position is, but if you could get a vision, a right perspective of what possibilities there are for you and for me; if you could say, As for me, I am going to follow Jesus Christ where he leads me, I will follow him where he leads, what he tells me to do I will do; and my prayer will always be, not to be orthodox and conventional, but to do the thing always that will please Jesus Christ. It is a simple theology and it opens to you the greatest field and the widest field for life.—Wilfred T. Grenfell.

Lord Jesus Christ, who for our gain refused not the way of suffering and death, help us to have faith and courage to follow thee wherever thou leadest. Teach us to look beyond present troubles to the triumph which we shall share with thee, and thou with us—the triumph of our overcoming and the victory of our faith. Teach us not to mistake the means of our growth for the reward of our endeavors, nor let us think of this life only as the scene and purpose of thy thought in our behalf. By thy passion and thy cross, the thought thou hadst for thy disciples before death and after thou hadst risen, bring us into fellowship with thee and all who suffer, that we may be sympathetic and helpbringing; not asking all things for ourselves, but remembering in our prayers and thanksgivings the needs and the desires of others. And fulfill what is best for us and them, that we may be one in the love of God and men.

Making the Best of Ourselves

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for August 1-7

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Self-improvement. Ps. 25:1-12. (Consecration Meeting.)

Light from the Bible Passage

God did not intend us to be selfish but did make us custodians of our own soul's welfare. We make the best impression on others when our own lives are on a high plane. So must one lift up his own soul to the Lord, put his trust in him, seek his leadership, find his way into truth and pray to him faithfully. Self-improvement will involve self-study. No one can examine his life honestly without finding much to regret. That he must ask to have forgiven. Infilling follows forgiveness. A forgiven man is a docile and tractable man and God stands ready to teach him and to guide him into ways that are conspicuous for happiness, kindness and truth.

Leads for the Leader

The social emphasis is the thing today, and justly. Concern for our own welfare is not Christlike. On the other hand the person who makes his own life as strongly Christian as possible will be the most valued worker for his master. Our consecration service is an ideal time to think this thought through and perhaps start out afresh.

Here are two dangers worth noting:

One: The neglect of self, physically and spiritually. Note how this comes about through concentration on other matters that interest us. It is a grave peril. How may it affect our effectiveness?

Two: The over-emphasis on self, physically, intellectually and spiritually. In this case, note how one's horizon is often bounded only by his own interests. Show how greatly this may limit his usefulness in the Kingdom.

Thoughts for Members

Self-criticism is the first step in self-improvement. Self-improvement depends upon the measure of faith one has in himself.

One may easily become morbid in studying himself. But it is true that no one else has quite so much interest in us as we ourselves.

"Many a good intention dies from inattention. If, through carelessness or indolence, or selfishness, a good intention is not put into effect, we have lost an opportunity, demoralized ourselves, and stolen from the pile of possible good. To be born and not fed, is to perish. To launch a ship and neglect it is to lose it. To have a talent and bury it, is to be a "wicked and slothful servant." For in the end we shall be judged, not alone by what we have done, but by what we could have done."

A Moment of Prayer

O Master, whose we are and whom we serve, we thank thee for every yearning thou dost put within us that bids us make our every good still better and our better best. Open to our eyes anew the beauty and the strength of thine own life that we may ever day by day come to likeness to thyself. Amen.

WITH THE CHILDREN

Tit for Tat

By Anna Burnham Bryant

"You gotta annee monnie, eh?" asked the Banana Man, sharply.

The little children who tagged him from door to door were not used to hearing him speak sharply. They had long been acquainted with him, and it was the first time they had ever heard him speak that way. Without a smile, too! Victor's brown eyes grew bigger and browner in his white face as he looked up, startled, to see what the matter was, and Rosalie, the washerwoman's little girl from the mouth of the alley, flushed as pink as her rose-pink calico. But she answered bravely:

"It's me mother. She says an' wud ye come to the alley?"

"Ni' sweet awnge! Toofa ten cent! Toofa ten cent!" called the Banana Man, slowly turning his wagon-stand toward the mouth of the alley.

It wasn't Italian he was speaking, though it didn't sound as if it could be spelled in English. But the tagging children understood him. They ran a little before, now, and piloted him to their door, as if he needed to be shown how to get there. They were still tagging when he stopped at the basement entrance. Johnny, the youngest, blue-speckled from head to foot in his long blue tier, was holding him by the loose, baggy trousers, for fear he might vanish suddenly.

A lady was standing there. She had come to bring some washing that she was in a hurry for.

"I am just home from the shore, you see," she explained apologetically, "and everything is mussed or soiled, or I wouldn't hurry you. The little boy, Jasper—didn't I bring him to see you once?—he hasn't a linen suit left, and it promises to be warm Sunday. You will try, won't you? Nobody flutes the blouse ruffles the way—oh, am I blocking the way? Thank you! I was sure you would do it, if it is late in the week. What a crowd of little folks! Well, Jasper! Where did you come from?"

She laughed musically, recognizing her own boy in the flock that followed the fruit wagon. His dainty, spotless blouse and beribboned hat looked strangely out of place among the others, but she only laughed indulgently, and slipped a coin into his hand as she went past him.

"Treat the children, Jasper," she said, in a low voice. "And then come home to Mamma quickly. Mamma wants you."

Her smile overflowed like morning sunshine as she went by, and rested for an instant on the Banana Man. She wondered that he met it so gloomily. The next minute she had passed on serenely, and just then he caught the gleam of the silver quarter in the boy's hand, and snatched it almost before it was offered to him.

"You taka banan'!" he cried, poising himself to run, and waving frantic hands backward toward the cart. "You taka anyt'ing, awnge, banan', peanutta—anyt'ing! I notta care. I mus' go 'way one leetla minute! You tend peanutta for me!"

Rosalie, to whom this wonderful charge was made, was quite overcome with the magnificence of the office, and just then her mother appeared in the doorway, protesting loudly that she must not do it.

"And here, come back here, you Eye-tal-ian, and sell me something for lunch for the childher! Here's your money—you needn't to be scart you won't get it!".

He did stop at that, for the thought came to him that maybe one quarter might not be enough. Druggists were very dear, and he must have the medicine. He waved both hands full of apologies to the sharp-tongued Irish woman, and came back an instant to serve her. Barely stopping to make change, off he darted again, calling back, earnestly:

"Firsta monnie I gotta—and leetla boy so seeck! He die, I notta bring dose medicine!"

Dashing into an apothecary store on the nearest corner, he nearly overset two or three leisurely passers-by, among them the mother of Jasper, met again, as it seemed by some purposeful accident, as she waited on the corner for her car. People righted themselves more or less angrily, according to their tempers, and the lady turned and looked after him with interest as he almost leaped inside the door. She had caught a word or two of his broken English, as he tried to frame hasty apologies.

"What is it about the little boy?" she asked kindly, going in after him and laying a gentle hand on his arm, as he vainly tried to make the clerk understand what he wanted.

"He verra seeck!" he cried, with big, earnest eyes fixed on her face; "and oh, they notta know what ees eet here to maka well! The doctor he sa-ay"—

"Have you a prescription?" asked the lady. "A paper—directions—something written?"

Suddenly the man tore a crumpled scrap from his blouse, and the clerk, taking it from him, began quickly to put up the prescription.

"I will go with you," she said, quietly.

Trying with short, quick steps to match his long ones, she was soon out of the gay streets and into alleys such as she had seldom seen, swarming with noisy children. Down some dark, narrow steps they went, and there certainly was a sick boy, all alone. The mother of Jasper knew that breathing. It was growing toward night and the croup was coming on.

"Moder she die. Haf die tree week. A man he notta know!" said the poor, distracted father.

Jasper's mother knew, and her knowledge was kindly and wholly at his service. Some neighbors came from upstairs and brought hot water and things as she needed them. It was not long before she had done what medicines alone would have failed to do, and the little fellow was softly sleeping, his head against her breast. Then she laid him down and went away, telling them what to do in case of any further trouble.

"I notta pay you notting!" half sobbed the poor Italian, brokenly, following her to the door, and trying to express his gratitude. "I on'y poor Italiana. I haf on'y banan'—peanutta"—

"Pay it to the next child you see!" said Jasper's mother. "'Tit for tat,' we English say! Pass it on—help some other boy. That is 'paying back.'"

The father returned with a beaming face to his boy's bedside. One look showed him that all was right, and he set off to bring home his fruit cart, for it was now too late to do more in the way of peddling. It was the time of short days and early twilights.

"'Tit for tat' she say! Firsta leetla child, see? I s'all pay eet! I vill be ver' kin' to dose

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

I am discovering new things about our Corner every day. The last and I think the best is that we are getting newcomers into our Corner from all over the world.

Before me is a letter from the Holy Land, that beloved country where Jesus lived. It is from "S. P. C., Beirut, Syria." Who can tell me what those first three letters mean? Comrade Esther G. Ward is the writer. I am sure you will agree with me that she ought to have a large amount of space this week. So here goes:

Dear Mr. Alden:

Some time ago in one of your letters you spoke of the mountain Fujiyama. You said the picture had been done in silk. But how many people of our Corner have seen it? I have, and I think you would like to know how I came to see it. (I am sure we should. Mr. A.)

My father is a doctor here in Syria, and we live with him. But when the war broke out we decided that we would be safer in America for just then. Mother had a little baby besides three other children to take care of. So, leaving father here, we went to America where we stayed four years with my mother's mother.

When the armistice was signed, we had already planned how we would go back to father, and we could not exactly change our plans right then and there, so we went by the Pacific.

It was the day before Christmas when we arrived at Yokohama, and in the morning we saw Fujiyama. The sun had just risen and therefore the mountain was all pink. White clouds covered its base.

We are now here with Daddy as you may easily guess and we have settled in a new house. I am afraid that I cannot send you the letters (that is, the ones for a contest) or poems that you ask for, because it takes a month for letters to go to America or to come from America. I hope I may be admitted to the Corner. (You surely may. Mr. A.)

She then closes her delightful letter by sending good wishes to all her fellow Comrades.

If I am not mistaken I knew this Comrade's father over twenty years ago when he was a college boy. We of America have reason to be proud of him for the wonderful work he has done for the relief of the suffering Armenians.

So long as we have been across the Pacific, I wonder if some Comrade over there can tell us if what I found the other day is really "Rule 2 for motorists in Japan." It reads: "When a passenger of the foot heave in sight tootle the horn trumpet to him melodiously at first. If he still obstacles your passage tootle him with vigor and express by word of mouth the warning: 'Hi, Hi!'"

Now I call that a much nicer way for automobile (you see, I put the whole word) drivers to ask us to get out of their way. If your father has an automobile, can he, or you, sound the horn so that it says, "Please?" If not, it ought to be fixed, don't you think? I am rather afraid we do not use that word often enough.

But I must stop. This is not a preacher's column.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Questionnaire Sent to Churches of State

A tabulation of the replies made to a questionnaire, recently sent to the Congregational churches of the state, may be of interest to the readers of the "Circle." The questionnaire was sent to 173 churches. Eighty-seven of these, or just 50 per cent. were enough interested, or thought the matter of sufficient importance, to reply.

The questions were as follows: 1. Did your church conduct an Every Member Canvass this year? 2. Has your church met its apportionment in missionary giving? 3. Is your church or church school giving its members definite missionary instruction? 4. Does your church conduct a class for its young people, looking toward church membership? 5. Does your church pay the expenses (including equipment and supplies) of the church school? 6. Have you a Christian Endeavor or other young people's society in your church?

Now for the results: question 1. Yes, 52, No, 33; question 2. Yes, 53, No, 33; question 3. Yes, 49, No, 36; question 4. Yes, 33, No, 52; question 5. Yes, 26, Partly, 7, No, 52; question 6. Yes, 51, No, 34. Two churches reported "not holding services," and one was reported closed but still meeting its missionary apportionment. Three churches, in rural communities, reported having almost no young people in their parishes.

To Increase Attendance of Men at Church

A campaign was instituted by Rev. J. H. Dale, pastor of BILLERICA, at New Year's to increase the attendance of men in the morning congregation. The average attendance was 40 but 100 was set as the goal. Through a series of weekly bulletins the members gradually increased until on April 25, 143 men were present. The results have been capitalized in the formation of a Brotherhood. Through the Every Member Canvass the budget and all apportionments have been oversubscribed 50 per cent. and the pastor has been given a second salary increase of $300.

West Newbury Over the Top

SECOND, WEST NEWBURY, exceeded its quota to the Congregational World Movement by over 25 per cent. The quota was $312 and $392 was raised.

New Minister for Italian, Plymouth

Sunday, July 4, was a significant day for ITALIAN, PLYMOUTH, a church of the new pilgrims in the old Pilgrim town. Six young people entered into the covenant of the church on confession and the new pastor, Mr. Frank Fasano, and three members of his family were received by letter. The church, organized in 1903 around a nucleus of Waldensian immigrants, is responding to Mr. Fasano's ministry and facing forward toward larger service among the Italian people. Mr. Fasano is a graduate of the Italian Department of the Bible Teachers' Training School of New York, as is also his wife. He has come to Plymouth after a year as a member of the pastoral staff of the East Side Italian Presbyterian Church in Newark, N. J. His field of service will not be limited to the Italian population of Plymouth and Kingston, but will include the Italian colonies of other towns in that part of Massachusetts.

Richard Roberts at Mt. Vernon, Boston

On Sunday mornings during July and August the preacher at MT. VERNON, BOSTON, is Rev. Richard Roberts of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y. His sermon topics for the remaining Sundays are as follows: July 25, On Living in Two Worlds at the Same Time; Aug. 1, The Blank Bible; Aug. 8, The Insolvency of the Average Man; Aug. 15, The High Cost of Life; Aug. 22, The Wingless Victory, Discussion of Values; Aug. 29, Efficiency and Life.

Mr. Roberts is a Welshman who before coming to the Church of the Pilgrims held pastorates in London. He has written several books which have had considerable circulation.

Culled from Calendars

Why join the church? As a confession not of perfection, not even of goodness, but of sin and weakness and need; a confession of the Mastership of Jesus, a willingness to be helped and to help in the best things. Church membership stands for much more than this, but it stands for this much at least. The church needs you, you need the church. Enlist now.—Plymouth, Oakland, Cal.

Plymouth Church is non-sectarian, independent, self-governing and democratic. Believing that the true character and sanction of the church depend wholly upon the presence and guidance of Christ, and not upon conventional or historic standards of orthodoxy, whether of creed, ritual or polity, we seek, in our congregational way, the attainment of the breadth, simplicity and fullness, the freedom and catholicity, that are in Christ. We welcome to our membership all who wish to share in our fellowship, and our quest.—Plymouth, Fond du Lac, Wis.

"If there is any one who never stumbles in speech, that man has reached maturity of character and is able to curb his whole nature."

We live in a tongue-damaged world—lives are limited, and spirits unlovely; love circles broken and anger stirred by the little, unruly, cruel member we call the tongue. It may be the expression of great thought and refined soul, a balm and blessing, a guide and inspiration. When such it fills the place God gave it to fill.

The tongue may also be the instrument of lies, the vehicle of gossip, the spreader of scandal, the revealer of jealousy and narrow-mindedness, malice and egotism. When it so acts it distorts its God-given mission and spreads harm and suffering.

Many persons are loved and admired until the tongue speaks. A controlled tongue is the surest sign of inward strength and an unmistakable mark of poise of character.

God's love and truth will give the tongue a beautiful mission in the world. But a tongue that is the servant of sin and selfishness or the dagger of cruel thought or nature will spread harm and sorrow.—First, Toledo, O.

CONNECTICUT

In Memory of Col. J. Richard North

The North Memorial Window was unveiled July 11 at NORTH HAVEN and was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies. Col. J. Richard North, widely known in military and business circles and universally beloved among a host of friends, died at Richmond, Va., in March, while on a business trip. His interest in civic and religious affairs, however, was even greater than in military matters and his home church will long remember him for his enthusiasm and constructive work. The Sunday school, of which he was superintendent for 13 years, has erected a window as a tribute to his untiring efforts and devotion. More than 150 members of the school, down to the tots in the primary department, contributed to the window.

The window was supplied by the H. Puddicombe Company which furnished the original windows in the church. It is Gothic in general design, arranged to conform as far as possible to the general architecture and color scheme of the church. On the window is the inscription: "In loving memory of our Superintendent, J. Richard North. 1904—1913, 1917—1920."

Rev. R. F. Markham Ordained at Stratford

An event of much significance for FIRST, STRATFORD, and for the interests of the Kingdom at large, occurred June 23, when Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Markham, under appointment by the American Board as missionaries to Turkey, were commissioned to this work, and Mr. Markham was ordained to the ministry.

Last fall Stratford set for itself the goal—a missionary to Turkey. The goal was set in time to come before the people at the Every Member Canvass in December, and the returns in pledges gave the necessary impetus for the action in January, providing for the partial support of such a missionary. Quite providentially, the church was led in the selection of Mr. and Mrs. Markham as their representatives.

The ordaining council was called for the afternoon, and 10 of the neighboring churches were represented. The examination demonstrated not only the keen thinking and large vision of Mr. Markham, but also gave testimony to his winning personality, and to the vitality of his message. At the commissioning and ordaining service in the evening the sermon was delivered by Dr. E. L. Smith, of the American Board, who also commissioned the missionaries. Prof. E. W. Lyman of Union Seminary gave the ordaining prayer and the charge to the church. Dr. W. H. Day of United, Bridgeport, extended the right hand of fellowship and welcome. Prof. H. P. Beach, of the Department of Missions in Yale, charged the missionaries.

Mr. and Mrs. Markham united with the church by letter at the July communion service and will sail for Turkey sometime in August.

Stratford is rejoicing in the recent acquisition of a Director of Religious Education in the person of Rev. E. F. Nauss of the Yale School of Religion. Mr. Nauss gives part time to this work in connection with his studies in Yale.

The church reported $5,280 raised for the Pilgrim Fund on a quota of $5,000; and recently reported $2,220 on the Congregational World Movement on a quota of $2,115. The consolidation of the Church and Ecclesiastical Society became effective in the new organization at the beginning of 1920.

NEW YORK

New Organ Dedicated at Pulaski

First, Pulaski, Rev. F. H. Herris, pastor, dedicated its new organ June 24. The organist on the occasion was Harry R. Shelley, musical director and organist of Central, Brooklyn, who gave a recital well designed to display the merits of the organ. The committee which had the securing of the new organ in charge consists of Harry A. Moody, Chairman; Louis J. Clark, Herbert W. Damon, George W. Douglas, Frank H. Ferris, Irving G. Hubbs, Clayton I. Miller, and Merrit A. Switzer. C. Seibert Losh of New York City did the work of installation which necessitated extensive changes in the auditorium. In making these changes rooms were made for the use of the pastor as a retiring room, and for the choir as a library and assembly room. The new organ has 1,067 pipes. The installation and changes cost $5,900, of which amount $5,350 has been subscribed.

Pulaski is doing a vigorous work in all branches, its Men's Club being especially energetic. E. A. B.

New Organizations at Paris

Under the leadership of Rev. Lewis Spooner the work of Paris is giving gratifying results. On July 4, 18 new members were received and 10 were baptized. The Sunday school, under the direction of Mrs. Spooner, has increased its membership considerably.

A Junior Christian Endeavor and a Mission Band have been organized, both of which prove to be helpful and interesting to the young people of the community. A Woman's Missionary Society has also been started with a goodly membership.

PENNSYLVANIA

The State Conference

The Pennsylvania State Conference, which met this year at Milroy, proved to be one of the best ever held in the state. The pastor of the entertaining church, Rev. Harry Deiss, and Mrs. Deiss have had an unusual influence in that community for the past 11 years. Milroy is situated in the center of the state and is at least 100 miles from another Congregational church. The hospitality was unmeasured, in true Pilgrim fashion.

The program announced the 34th annual meeting of the Conference and the 14th annual meeting of the Woman's Missionary Union. A memorial service, conducted by the Union for Mrs. E. E. Dexter, honorary president and founder of the State Union, was impressive, as testimony was born to her worth in the cause of the Master.

The themes discussed at the Conference dealt with current problems and each speaker faithfully did his or her best in presenting the subject.

The report for the year shows that the churches increased their givings to the C. H. M. S. in 1919 41 per cent. above their previous record, that 40 churches met or surpassed their apportionment to that Society and that churches sent in their contributions early in 1920.

The Conference voted to renew its efforts to raise the $2,500 in order that it might appoint its own pastor-at-large and so direct his activities. The Home Missionary Society offered to appoint an assistant Superintendent for the state, adding to the sum already subscribed for the pastor-at-large, but it is the hope of the Conference to put in the field its own pastor because of the pressing needs at this time.

A cheering note was sounded in most of the reports from the churches. The large number of pastorless churches was a matter of concern, but the response to the Pilgrim Fund was encouraging.

Rev. Harry Deiss was chosen Moderator and Rev. David Leyshon of Snyder Ave., Philadelphia, who for the last six years has been the efficient secretary of the Philadelphia Missionary Society and Scribe of the Philadelphia Association was chosen as registrar. Rev. J. T. Nichols of Meadville, who reported a substantial gain in membership and the clearing of an indebtedness of several years' standing on the Meadville Church, was re-elected Chairman of the Board of Directors, and Rev. J. R. Thomas of Ebensburg, who has had a splendid year in this, the oldest church of the state, was re-elected secretary of the Board. Rev. H. W. Myers of Philadelphia was re-elected to the Boards, and Rev. E. Belden Hart of Plymouth was elected as a new director.

Rev. W. V. Berg of Central, Philadelphia, gave an address on the Pilgrim's Contribution to Theology. Mr. Berg outlined Philadelphia's proposed celebration in the fall and showed the possibilities of the proposed program in which not only the Congregational churches, but every religious body and other organizations will have a part.

The concluding address of the Conference was made by Rev. H. C. King, Moderator of the National Council and President of Oberlin College, on "America's Present Task." He emphasized the need of unselfish service and a world-wide outlook that can catch the Christ vision of a world in need. This was a fitting benediction to the delegates as they departed after such an unusual fellowship in one of the most charming spots in the mountains of Pennsylvania.

KANSAS

Young People's Conferences

During June two conferences for young people have been held in Kansas, one at Wichita and one at Lawrence. The total registration was 81 and in addition about 25 unregistered young people attended the classes and meetings. These Conferences were undertaken in faith and hope. Events have justified the whole venture and the unanimous opinion of all is that they proved to be an unqualified success. Over 100 young people from 26 churches have been influenced and helped. Courses in Christian Americanization, Mission study, the Bible and Social Living and Congregational History were given. Afternoons were given over to recreation and evenings to platform meetings. Miss Ella C. Hoxie led the young people in Mission Study and won the enthusiasm and loyalty of the delegates to a remarkable degree. Rev. J. B. Gonzales, Superintendent of the Kansas Conference, Dr. R. W. Sanderson, Dr. C. B. Wells and Miss Wood of Lawrence all taught classes in the Conferences. Rev. Fred Grey, Secretary of Religious Education, was Manager and Secretary. Definite plans were adopted for a continuance of the organization looking toward even greater Conferences next year.

NORTH DAKOTA

Degrees for Mr. Hitchcock and Mr. Bloom

WILLISTON continues to respond to the fine leadership of Rev. Samuel Hitchcock, and has added over 50 to its membership this year. The people have also met the first year's quota for the Congregational World Movement, and notwithstanding four successive crop failures have faced the financial situation splendidly. By sacrificial effort they have put the work in a condition whereby every department is encouraged to go ahead.

At the last Commencement of Fargo College, the honorary degree of D. D., was conferred on Mr. Hitchcock. Standing by his side on the happy occasion was a former pastor of the church, Rev. W. K. Bloom, who also received the same degree. The occasion was made especially happy for the two men, on account of the presence of a number of the Williston people and other North Dakota friends.

Day of Rejoicing at Stady

The Fairview Church, the central point of the STADY Larger Parish, had a day of rejoicing on June 13. The congregation, gathered from the surrounding country, some coming 20 miles to the service, united first of all in the Children's Day exercises. Following these, the regular morning worship was held, during which there were four baptisms and two young people made their confession of faith and united with the church. The services of the day closed with the observance of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper at the evening hour of worship. Rev. W. K. Bloom of New York City, who is specially interested in this church and community, conducted the services and spent four days in a visit to the parish, conferring with the people in connection with the enlargement of the work.

Stady recently met its full missionary apportionment for 1920, plus $50 for special American Board work, and on June 13, took up an offering of $25 for the establishment of a new mission Sunday school, voted an additional $50 for special homeland work, and met its quota for the Congregational World Movement for 1920, a total of $300 from a church of 21 members. This rural church is getting ready a program of community service that will make it increasingly helpful along religious, social and educational lines. Mr. J. E. Slater of New York City is the student pastor for the summer, and a permanent minister to care for the entire parish is now being sought.

Rev. W. C. Lyon Leaves Valley City

Rev. W. C. Lyon has just closed a notable pastorate of nearly 12 years at VALLEY CITY. When Mr. Lyon commenced his work the church was worshiping in a frame building that was poorly equipped, and the people faced a local debt of $3,000. Seven years later ground was broken for a new structure and the entire buildings were completed the same year. The

During the years of Mr. Lyon's pastorate, he has received 410 persons into the membership of the church, 209 on confession and 201 by letter. The ordinance of baptism has been administered to 151; 114 couples have been united in marriage, and the message of consolation has been spoken at 132 funerals. At a largely attended farewell reception for Mr. and Mrs. Lyon, a purse containing $510 was presented to them. Mr. Lyon now goes from this long period of service, to First, Gary, Ind., to which he has received a unanimous and enthusiastic call, and where a great work can be accomplished. He is looking forward eagerly to his new work and the people are ready for the strong leadership he will bring to them.

COLORADO

Young Folks Active at First, Denver

FIRST, DENVER, mother of all the Congregational Churches of Colorado, has taken on a new lease of life. Old members say the congregations are now the largest they have been in a number of years. The Easter ingathering added 43 names to the church roll, 23 on confession and 20 by letter—22 males and 21 females, the majority of them heads of families. The Church school attendance has been doubled during the past year, and a young man, Mr. Ray Frey, has been engaged to devote part of his time to the direction of young folks' activities, and to superintend the work of the school. A gymnasium has been established, and almost every night in the week sees some church school club or group enjoying its privileges. Match games of basketball between these seem to be the popular amusement. A fine troop of Boy Scouts has been organized and promises to be very successful. The minister, Rev. Robert Hopkin, is one of the National Delegates to the International Council and the Trustees voted unanimously and gladly to pay all his expenses to this notable gathering. The outlook for First was never brighter than it is today.

Takes Pastorate of Denver Church

WASHINGTON PARK, DENVER, was much disappointed when Rev. A. E. Norfleet of Mounds, Ill., decided to cancel his acceptance of their call. This disappointment has now been overcome by the arrival of Rev. D. W. Blakely from Buena Vista, Col. Mr. Blakely is to lead in the building of the new Washington Park Church.

Puts Over Emergency Fund at Ault

Rev. George M. Peacock, who has just left AULT for a pastorate at Green River, Wyo., showed his true Congregational loyalty by putting on the Emergency Fund campaign six weeks before the regular date and thus securing the full quota before leaving for his new field. Mr. Peacock's new field at Green River is important, since it is a division point on the Continental railroad system.

Eaton Pledges Quota

Under the leadership of the pastor, Rev. R. V. Hinkle, EATON has pledged the Emergency Fund quota of $1,000 and already paid $735 of it. The Knight Templars of Greeley drove to Eaton Easter night and held their annual service in Mr. Hinkle's church.

Second, Colorado Springs, Pushing Forward

SECOND, COLORADO SPRINGS, is now well established and making rapid strides forward. There is an interesting bit of history back of Rev. S. C. Dickinson's pastorate. Four years ago, the church affairs were at such low ebb that the older members decided to close the church. One sixteen-year-old girl said they must not give up. She rallied the young people, made a trip to Denver and secured a supply for the summer from the C. H. M. S. The salary for the summer was paid by the young working people of the church. Mr. Dickinson was the man sent by the society. He has now been with the church four years and there is no more talk of closing. In the recent Emergency Drive, the church doubled its quota and this same young woman, now 20 years of age, pledged $50 to the Fund.

Montrose Has New Church Almost Completed

The beautiful new building at MONTROSE, Rev. Isaac Cassell, pastor, is practically completed and will be dedicated early in the fall. "A Larger Parish Plan" is being worked out by which this church is to minister to the population in the rich valley developed by the irrigation ditch from the Gunnison tunnel opened by President Roosevelt.

Rev. Lawrence Wilson in Important Field

GREELEY is this year celebrating the 50th anniversary of the founding of Union Colony by Horace Greeley. Park Church, the first religious body organized in Colorado, fittingly celebrates its golden jubilee at this same time. The new pastor, Rev. Lawrence Wilson of Denver, will be installed during this program. Mr. Wilson, a graduate of Lawrence College and Yale Divinity School, came to Montana with the Yale band and established work along the main line of the Milwaukee Railroad. He built the new church at Helena, organized and erected the community building at Butte, and was lately Religious Work Director at Camp Lewis. Following this he made two trips to France, serving the "Y" in the educational department. During the past five months, Mr. Wilson has been Regional Director for the Congregational World Movement in the Denver district.

Mr. Wilson follows a notable succession of

Mr. Rahill has just gone to Central, Topeka, Kan. Mr. Wilson is a man of strong personality and commanding pulpit ability. Greeley plans to use its powerful organization and central position for an extensive community program. A large community plant is to be erected and in co-operation with the Colorado Teachers' College, a curriculum of religious education will be carried out. The church now has a staff of workers consisting of a trained parish secretary, a boys' worker and two student representatives. The men's club includes many of the leading men of the city and has a wide scope of influence.

Mr. Emery Goes to Minnequa, Pueblo

Rev. C. P. Emery of the Denver office of the Interchurch World Movement has accepted a call to Minnequa, Pueblo. The church is the only one near the great steel plant, which offers a real challenge for service. The Sunday school is already one of the largest Congregational schools in the state.

Nearly Every Church Co-operated

The Congregational World Movement in Colorado reports 25 churches which have reached or exceeded their quotas. Practically every church in the State has participated in the Movement.

Gains in the State

Supt. J. W. Minchin's recent report to the Colorado Conference shows some encouraging gains for Colorado Congregationalism and a promising outlook for the future. The state's quota of $60,000 for the Pilgrim Fund was oversubscribed $2,192.65; $31,000 of the Emergency Fund quota of $37,000 has already been subscribed; the 1919 benevolence total was $18,800 as against an average for the nine years past of $13,100. The new Year Book will show a net gain in membership of 150, as against 50 the preceeding year. Over 500 accessions were reported from the Easter campaign and there are many signs of increased spiritual activity. A number of fields have forward-looking plans ready to put into operation. Many salaries have already been increased the 20 per cent. suggested. During the Conference year, however, there were 25 resignations and 18 calls, a rather discouraging condition of restlessness and one which it is hoped will improve.

TEXAS

Southern Texas and Emergency Fund

Although the churches in Southern Texas are young and many of them are in process of getting started, they all reached their full quota on the Emergency Fund. Houston led off with a dinner and $500 was at once assured. Austin oversubscribed her allotment of $350. Port Arthur reached the quota of $400 at once. San Antonio, despite the expense of the new church and manse, pledged the full quota of $300. Bellaire Union, smallest and youngest of the churches, not even as yet possessing a church home, accepted and raised their quota of $50. The campaign in Southern Texas was in charge of H. B. Harrison of First, Houston.

CALIFORNIA

The Passing of Rev. Henry Martin Bissell

The service of Rev. H. M. Bissell in his labors among the Mexicans in Southern California has become memorable in its spirit of genuine sacrifice. For 10 years he gave himself unreservedly to the purpose of winning individuals to Christ. Now that his earthly ministry is ended, his death having occurred in Port Angeles, Wash., in June, the untabulated results carry on his spirit.

Mr. Bissell was born in Indian Territory in 1848, where his parents were teaching in the A. B. C. F. M. Mission to the Choctaws. His education was largely gained in Illinois, his college work being at Wheaton. Eighteen years of service were given in the Mexico Mission. From the understanding of the Mexican people gained in their own country he was well prepared to render continued service to them as they crossed the border to Southern California.

For a large portion of the period of work here, Mr. Bissell was the special missionary of Pilgrim, Pomona. More recently, however, the work had been taken over by the Southern California Conference.

Another New Englander to California

After a two weeks' visit at Calipatria in June, Rev. Eugene Smith has accepted a call to the pastorate there, to begin in September. The church is offering a salary of $2,000 and parsonage and in its pioneering community work presents a challenge to the pastor which the new leader faces with much interest.

A graduate of Bates College and of Hartford Seminary in the class of '09, Mr. Smith is well trained for his work. His first pastorate was in Lebanon, Ct., followed by two years at East Providence, R. I., and three years in New York State. For 19 months he served the army as chaplain. Upon his return from France he was engaged in work in connection with the Pilgrim Memorial Fund in Connecticut and subsequently on the Pacific Coast.

Golden Wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Partridge

A golden wedding anniversary in which the whole community shared the celebration was that at Norwalk in honor of Rev. and Mrs. H. E. Partridge. On June 23 they held open house and in the course of the afternoon and evening practically all the citizens of the town called to express their congratulations.

Many were the tokens of friendship left to these beloved friends of the community. In addition to the personal gifts, a purse of $85 in gold was presented. Originally it was planned to make the gift $50—one dollar for each year of the married life of the couple—but the response to the solicitations was so generous that the sum did not stop at the goal determined on. Mr. Partridge has served the little church at Norwalk for several years and his devoted ministry there has won him a large circle of friends outside as well as within the church membership.

Personals

Bailey, G. F., has entered vigorously upon his work with First, Norwich, Ct. Since Nov. 1, he has received 39 into membership. Upon the eve of his installation the young people made the gift of $100 a pleasant indication of their devotion to the new pastor.

Isely, M. N., was married to Miss Mildred Myers in the Fairmount Church, Wichita, Kan., on June 10, Rev. John H. McClumb performing the ceremony. Mr. and Mrs. Isely are under commission of the American Board and expect to sail for Turkey during the summer.

Kent, Evarts, Grafton, Mass., is serving West Medway, Mass., as supply.

Macdonald, D. B., Professor of Semitic Languages and Mohammedanism at Hartford Seminary, has received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Glasgow, Scotland, where he was graduated in 1885. It is interesting to recall the testimony of William G. Shellabear, D.D., the former captain in the English Army who was drafted for mission service in Malaysia by the Methodists and who has been for the last year lecturer on Malaysia in the Kennedy School of Missions. Speaking at the Commencement Luncheon of the School last week, he said that when he was planning to prosecute his studies in Arabic and in Mohammedanism scholars and missionaries in the East and in England told him there was no place where he could pursue those particular studies to such advantage as at Harvard under Professor Macdonald.

McCord, Archibald, recently resigned from First, Randolph, Mass. In their resolutions on his resignation, after a pastorate of nine years, the committee on resolutions appointed says: "We heartily recommend you as an able and scholarly preacher, one who is always abreast of the times, and a minister who has endeavored to fulfill his pastoral duties to the utmost of his ability."

Peabody, Leonard, son of Dr. H. E. Peabody, Appleton, Wis., has been selected to go to China and become instructor in English in a college there. The Oberlin in China Movement is increasing its power and work from year to year. Mr. Peabody was graduated from Oberlin College in June. His selection for this work in the Far East was based on his scholarship record.

Mr. Rowland has been a Congregational minister in this country for 38 years and during that period has served a number of churches in a splendid way. Sixteen years were spent in missionary service in Ireland, four years of this period as city missionary in Dublin.

IDA F. HAYDEN

Ida F. Hayden, for many years a teacher at Fisk University, died at Akron, O., June 20, 1920, and was buried at her home in Medford, Mass., June 25, her pastor, Rev. David Fraser officiating. Miss Hayden was born in Medford, April 22, 1862. For some years she taught in Wellington, South Africa. She was a graduate of Oberlin, and her life was one of earnest Christian service. Her pupils on both sides of the ocean will hold her memory in high honor.

REV. ERNEST C. DAVIS

Rev. Ernest C. Davis, who died April 16, 1920, was born at Rochester, Mass., the son of Nehemiah D. and S. Emmeline Davis. He was graduated from Revere Lay College, 1893, and from Andover Seminary in 1906, being ordained Dec. 5, 1894, at Plympton, Mass.

Mr. Davis held a number of pastorates, including Riverside, Lawrence, Mass., in connection with which he supplied Barker Chapel, Methuen, four years; the growth of this last work called for a new church and regular pastor. He became minister of the new church—Forest St. Union—in 1913, serving there until his death.

He was married to Mary V. Boynton May 25, 1893. His wife and one daughter are now living.

Mr. Davis was a quiet man, who did his work in the spirit of his Master. No finer nor more genuine testimony of his character and worth could be given than that manifested by the presence of the crowd which filled the church at the funeral service, and its deep sorrow because of his death.

Of such men it may in truth be said: "Ye are the salt of the earth," and "the light of the world."

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age....... $50.61
At 50 years of age....... 71.77
At 55 years of age....... 114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

The Sunday Question in New Hampshire

A Communication from the Sabbath Conference

The New Hampshire Sabbath Conference, organized Fast Day, 1918, is the agency recognized by the churches, the Grange and the W. C. T. U. for carrying on the campaign for the preservation of the Sabbath.

In response to the request of the Conference a United Legislative Committee has been created by the leading denominations for the purpose of drafting a revision of the Sunday law for presentation before the Governor's Commission on Revision and before the Legislature. As a result of careful and prayerful consideration a tentative draft of a bill for the above purpose has been prepared by this committee. This draft the Lord's Day League of New England refuses to support.

Therefore, since the League has declined to co-operate with the churches of New Hampshire, the Sabbath Conference has assumed the responsibility of conducting this campaign and with this statement makes its appeal for the moral and financial support of the friends of the Sabbath throughout the state to carry out this program which is of such vital importance.

Rev. Edward A. Tuck is no longer the representative of the Lord's Day League of New England, but is the representative of the New Hampshire Sabbath Conference. We commend him as our Field Secretary to the churches and urge them to co-operate heartily with him in this campaign to save the day. All money given in response to his appeal will be spent in New Hampshire. Contributions intended for this purpose should be sent to Mr. Tuck or to Rev. Judson Setzer, Treasurer, both of this city.

It is not expected that the Conference will become a permanent organization. When a fair and effective law has been secured the Conference may no longer be needed.

In view of the fact that the action of the Lord's Day League of New England has practically compelled the Sabbath Conference to carry on the campaign independently, declaring our positions "irreconcilable," it seems fitting that we should define our ideals and methods specially showing the differences between them.

(1) A DIFFERENCE IN IDEAL

The ideal of the League is the enforcement of the fourth commandment in a theocracy. The ideal of the Sabbath Conference is the protection of the Christian Sabbath in a democracy.

We believe that the ideal Sabbath is a day of rest, worship, religious instruction and service of humanity.

We are convinced that these ideals can be attained not by legislation, but only as a result of education in the church, the Sunday school and especially in the home. In accordance with our history and in harmony with the sincere and sane convictions of a majority of our people we believe, however, that legislation in a democracy should protect from disturbance those who are trying to carry on this work of education and that such legislation is neither pharisaical nor sectarian, but a contribution to the public good.

(2) A DIFFERENCE IN METHOD

The method of the League is divisive. The method of the Conference unites the friends of the Sabbath.

We believe that Sabbath legislation should express the consensus of Christian opinion in the state—that if a minority of our citizens believe in a much stricter observance of the Sabbath than do others they should be given opportunity to practice and teach their convictions undisturbed, but should not insist upon enforcing their convictions by legislation, that, if on the other hand a group of our people do not believe in observing as a Sabbath the first day of the week, they should have the privilege of being true to their convictions, but should not be permitted to disturb the quiet Sabbath desired by a majority of our Christian citizens.

We believe that all groups of Christian people may be united in a program which reduces Sunday labor to the minimum, prohibits the commercializing of the day, and compels all who seek recreation on that day to do so in such a manner as not to disturb the rights of those who worship, or to so secularize the day as to make the atmosphere unfavorable for the moral and religious training essential to citizenship.

It is this consensus of Christian opinion we are seeking to express in legislation.

GEORGE H. REED,
Chairman of the Sabbath Conference.
RAYMOND H. HUSE, Secretary.
JUDSON SETZER, Treasurer.
Committee.

leetla boy. Many peanutta I gif dem—many banan'. I s'all no more"—

Of a sudden the beaming face grew red; the fist was clinched in anger. Rounding the corner of the street his fruit wagon met his seeking eye, but no fruit thereon, no peanuts in the empty pail, and a huddle of children squatted in a group, talking earnestly, did not notice him. A dozen other children were running off in various directions, carrying armfuls of bananas and apples and other fruit. He had been swindled. The children had stolen everything, and these others were enjoying their share. He would fix them! At that instant the group fell apart and a loud hubbub began in which no word was clear to him, though the children and neighbors who ran to their doors heard it plainly.

"He's dyin'!"

"He's chokin'!"

"He's swallered a cent!"

"Oh! oh! Jasper's killed! He's killed! He's choking to death!"

The enraged Italian cared not to know what the trouble was. He knew only that his fruit was gone. He thought only of his living. Seizing the first child within the sweep of his arm, he administered such a cuff that the little fellows ears rang for minutes; the girl babies fled in shrieking terror, and the choking, purple-faced Jasper was the only one who did not discreetly disappear before the whirlwind of his wrath. Him he seized, and strongly boxed and even pounded on the back and sides, finishing by turning him feet uppermost and shaking him with a most ungentle swing that looked as if it might loosen every joint in the helpless little body. Then he set him down right end up, asking:

"How you feela now, eh? Will you do dat some more, eh? Will you"—

"There's your cent!" cried Rosalie, who had run back and now picked up something out of the dust and handed it to him. "There's your cent—you've shook it out of him! And here's the rest of your money. The neighbors was feeling bad about you, and they bought all you had so you could have money for your little sick boy. Me mother kept it for you!"

"And it's you are the fine doctor!" said Rosalie's mother, admiringly. "Sure, an' ye knew in a minute what to do to save the b'y! He's dead by now but for the shakin'!"

Jasper's mother spoke up, with her arms about her boy, and a very unsteady voice to utter her thanks in. Not finding Jasper when she arrived home, she had quickly come to the place where she had seen him last, and reached it just in time to see his danger and the quick remedy applied by the Italian. She well understood the value of promptness.

"You are a brave fellow," she managed to say, gratefully. "I saw it all. Your debt to me is quickly paid! When I said 'Tit for tat' I never thought you would have a chance to act it out in this way!"

In spite of himself the fruit vender went home covered with riches and glory. His English was not equal to explanations. Besides, he did not know as he cared to try any. He was bewildered at their praises, but very glad to find that he had not requited harm where none was intended.

"Ver' fine word, dose Onglis!" he muttered, trundling homeward with full pockets. "'Tit for tat'—she sava my boy, I sava her boy. I live by dose word all days."

WOMEN'S INTERESTS

The Heart of the Home

By Irene Avery Judson

The Spirit of Fifty Years Ago came back to earth unheralded and found, in the midst of his arduous tasks, the Spirit of Today. After an exchange of friendly greetings, the Spirit of Fifty Years Ago spoke thus:

"I have long wished that I might visit again old haunts I used to know. I can see already that there are many changes. The town hall stood here. And this?"

"This is our new Public Library," proudly explained the Spirit of Today. "A very important factor in our present living. Come with me and I will show you things as they are."

Together they followed the city streets and country roads, entering unseen into the very heart of many business places and homes. The Spirit of Fifty Years Ago was a trifle slow, but overlooked nothing and seemed deeply gratified to find so many splendid improvements.

It was late in the night when they returned to the bustling, rushing corner that the Spirit of Today called home, and even at that hour the Spirit of Fifty Years Ago noted with a sigh the absence of quiet.

"I must be going soon," he said to his host, "and I want to thank you heartily for the time you have given me. Never could I have imagined such wonderful changes as I have seen today. I would have thought many impossible. But it is all true.

"One thing, however, I did not find, though I looked expectantly. In all the homes we visited this nightfall I saw no family altar. Do you not observe that custom now?"

The Spirit of Today seemed lost in thought for the moment and did not reply at once. After a pause he smiled indulgently and said:

"I should have taken you to the homes of ministers and a few workers in the various churches. I am sorry we missed them. They still retain the old form of family worship, I hear, but most of the people now-a-days are too busy.

"You don't understand," he hastened to explain, as a strange expression passed quickly over the face of his guest. "We are too busy doing good—with improvements of many kinds as you witnessed today, vast philanthropic work and religious activities in different fields. There are various engagements for each member of the family in the evening, and in the morning all must hurry to work."

"Surely some specific time could be set aside for that as well as other things," was the rejoinder.

"Then there are so many babies. They are apt to interfere."

"Not nearly so many as we had in the old days, I should judge," sadly reflected the Spirit of Fifty Years Ago.

"Anyway," continued the younger one, and his voice did not sound as it had when he pointed out the sights of the city, "our religion today finds expression in more practical outlets than was the case of old, I believe."

There was a long pause, while he of the past age dreamed, and he of the present rather nervously studied the pattern in the rug. At last the Spirit of Fifty Years Ago spoke again.

"I feel constrained to tell you—not in harsh criticism but in all kindliness—that you are making a grave mistake," he said. "You are losing something vital. If you continue to dispense with the family altar you will find some day that the heart is gone out of your worship, and that one of the strongest factors that contributes to right living has vanished. The children should learn at home to pray. If they do not, they may never learn elsewhere; and without earnest, personal prayer much of your uplift effort will be lost."

There was silence, and at last the Spirit of Today spoke again.

"But of course the people pray alone," he said.

"The element of time must affect that also," ventured the Spirit of the Past.

"Not so much as it does the worship of whole families together," he was assured. "I am positive that many parents pray today as earnestly as parents did of old."

"But the children cannot know of it," reflected the other one. "I have known many a man to resist wrong, strengthened by the knowledge of parents' prayers. Worship is a vital element of the home. If it is omitted you must reckon with the consequences."

"Why not revive the old custom? You will not regret it."

And the Spirit of Fifty Years Ago departed, leaving the Spirit of Today thinking intently and wondering how many families, if frankly reminded of the omission, would resume the old custom of worshiping God together in the quiet of the home.

Object for Intercession

For Friendless Folk, that They May Learn to be Friendly:

O Lord, implant in our hearts the love of friends that we may look upon our neighbors with kindliness. Remember all who live apart in isolation and suspicion of those who are near to them and bring them into such friendly and helpful relations as shall become for them a key to the fellowship of men and an open door into the brotherhood of saints. Cure our jealousies and suspicions, rid us of foolish self-consciousness that hinders and retards. And have mercy on the lonely of the earth. In the name of Christ. Amen.—R.

COMING

New England in the Life of the World

HOWARD A. BRIDGMAN

Editor of The Congregationalist and Advance

The book assembles material never brought together before within the compass of a single volume. It specifies in detail the exact part which men and women of New England stock had in founding and developing great commonwealths like Ohio, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Oregon, California and other Western and Far Western states. It sets forth the impact of New England upon the Near East, the Far East and the Hawaiian Islands. It describes the share New Englanders had in initiating and carrying forward far-reaching movements in education, reform, philanthropy and religion. The style is animated rather than technical and a series of original charts adds to the usefulness of the book. The early beginnings are graphically sketched, but quite as much emphasis is placed upon present evidences in customs, institutions and laws of the New England seed-sowing.

Numerous charts and illustrations.

Tentative Price, $3.00.

The Talk of the Sanctum

Who's Who in This Week's Paper

FRANK E. SPAULDING, who writes the article on "Educating the Nation's Children," is an Amherst graduate, who in the thirty years since he left his Alma Mater has become one of the most prominent educators in the country. He has been Superintendent of Schools in Newton, Mass., Minneapolis, Minn., and Cleveland, Ohio, and is now leaving the field of public education to become head of the department of education in Yale University.

ALBERT E. WINSHIP, whose subject is "How to Get and How to Keep Prepared Teachers," is one of the old-time and always welcome contributors to The Congregationalist. He is still a Congregational minister, though for many years he has been editor of the Journal of Education and a lecturer in all parts of the country. He has devoted the major part of his energy to the interests of the public school.

MR. RANKIN'S article on Asia Minor. A deal of important and timely information is compressed into the article by Mr. Rankin on Asia Minor as the theater of contending factions, whose success or failure cannot fail to affect the whole wide world. If you want to keep posted on the hurrying course of events in that region, read this article and preserve it for future reference.

In the Circulation Department—

Some significant observations from other periodicals may help our readers to appreciate more keenly the efforts which The Congregationalist and Advance has made to compete with the difficulties of publication and distribution during these troublous times. In the June issue of Good Housekeeping which was delivered to the subscribers July 10, this notice appeared:

> Continued paper shortage and unprecedented transportation difficulties have made it impossible for us to distribute recent issues of Good Housekeeping on their regular publication dates. If in the future your copy is late, you will know it is due to these causes. Don't write us, for this will add to the general mail congestion. Be patient and the magazines will reach you.

Then again in the July 3 number of the Survey our attention is called to this announcement:

> Beginning with July, the Survey enters upon a semi-monthly schedule, to run through the August dog days and into September, as part of a deliberate plan of meeting a rise in publication costs that is little short of staggering. Printing has gone up 25 per cent. since January, when it was already high. Paper is twice what it was last year, four and one-half times what it was before the war, and scarcely to be had at any price in regular and sufficient deliveries for weekly use.
> Commercial magazines here and there are skipping summer issues as well as raising prices. The only prudent thing for the Survey to do was to tear a leaf from this business practice and stretch our dwindling reams of paper over as long a period as possible toward the happy time when shortage of wood pulp, insufficiency of freight cars and strikes of railway men are no longer the regular order of the day.
> The next issue of the Survey will be the mid-July issue. In August there will be two issues, in September two, with the probability of resuming weekly publication before the end of the month.
> We bespeak for it the friendly co-operation which in many tight situations in the past has proved to be the outstanding feature of the cordial relations between the Survey and its readers.

If Piedmont's Field and Work Do Not Warrant It, The Value of Education Has Been Overestimated

How Piedmont College Is Meeting the Need for Dormitory Room

When Mary J. Green Hall was burned last January, the college young men turned over the new dormitory, which they had just entered, to the girls and teachers whose rooms had been burned, and they scattered themselves through the guest rooms of the town, which were kindly opened to them.

The College immediately faced the problem of housing the students next year. If the burned dormitory should be fully replaced, there would be no room for the hundred new students that might be expected next year. We had our plans for supplying these new students; but the burning of the dormitory required doubling the capacity of this plan unless we should cut down the number of students expected. It was decided to do the latter.

Piedmont Academy, as the Preparatory Department of Piedmont College, has been doing a very important work and has won first place in the Southeast as a preparatory school. The high schools of these states are increasing in number and quality; but the increase in quality does not extend so fully through the last two years of high school work. It was decided, therefore, that the first two years of preparatory work should be cut off and turned over to the town of Demorest with the request that it be taken up in its public school system, and that the College continue the high school work in the two upper grades under the head of a Sub-Freshman Department. This would cut off about one hundred students from the expected number and enable us to care for those who came, provided we could replace the rooms lost by the burning of the dormitory.

The College has a small Inn for the accommodation of its guests and the general public, there being no other hotel in the place. This is being extensively enlarged, and a portion of it will be set off for dormitory uses the coming year. By this means and some other lesser enlargements we hope to provide for a student body somewhere near the number of this year; and by the following year we hope to have a new dormitory which will accommodate at least part of the growth that will follow.

Material Objectives in 1920-21

1. A new Science Building, with laboratories for Chemistry, Physics and Biology—$25,000.
2. A new Home Economics Building, with appliances for teaching Domestic Science, Domestic Art, Household Management, Institutional Management, Normal Work, Basketry, etc., to take the place of our fine equipment burned in January of 1920—$25,000.
3. A new Recitation Building for the Languages, History, Mathematics, Philosophy and Education—$25,000.
4. A new Gymnasium and Equipment—$15,000.
5. General Equipment—Science, Home Economics and Furniture—$10,000.
6. A new dormitory to accommodate sixty young women and their supervising teachers—$50,000.
7. A new dormitory to accommodate sixty young men and their supervising teachers—$50,000.
8. Donations to finance the College for the year, pay all its indebtedness and send it into the new year of the fourth Pilgrim Century FREE—$80,000.

Why Piedmont Can Build in These Times of High Prices

But for the special facilities possessed by Piedmont College, which it has been a long time working up, building for the present would be next to impossible. With lumber costing from $80 to $150 per thousand, the expense could not be attempted. But Piedmont College commands over 500 acres of land, well toward a half of which abounds in timber. It has a saw-mill, planer, moulder, and all needed wood-working machinery to turn trees into dormitories or furniture. It has a superintendent of lumber-making and wood-working who thoroughly understands his business. It has a well tried and most efficient superintendent of construction, who can direct all the carpentry work. It has an expert in the use of cement to superintend concrete construction. Its plumbing department is thoroughly manned with a capable superintendent. Even with the increase in wages, carpenters can be secured for from 40 cents to 50 cents per hour.

By turning our own trees into lumber and shaping it by machinery, ready to be nailed up by the carpenters; by doing our own cement work, our own plumbing and steam fixtures work; by buying all our material as we do at wholesale rates, we are able to build at the present time at a comparatively small increase on the cost before the War.

Educational Advantages Promoted by Piedmont

When Piedmont College was organized, there was no public school system. It, therefore, undertook twenty-two years of consecutive educational courses, beginning with the primary department and closing with the senior year of a standard college. It then proceeded to educate public sentiment in town until it was ready to carry on for itself a public school system. This required the building of a large schoolhouse and the voting of local taxation. When this was done, the College passed over to the town a public school system from primary through the grammar grades, with an attendance of two hundred and eighty. The coming year, it is passing over to the town the first half of a high school, its enrollment of this half being over one hundred. In the near future it hopes it may be able to pass over the other half of the high school work; and the College itself do no work outside of that of a four years' standard college.

I earnestly ask for Piedmont College the prompt and generous support of the believers in Christian Education, warranted by what it is, what it has done, and what is before it to do. Please give us a good start by checking one of the amounts in the blank below and mailing it to me at once.

Yours for a successful year,

FRANK E. JENKINS, President.

The Greatest Work in the World

THE greatest work in the world is the work of the sower sowing seed. We are in sore danger of forgetting it and paying the price of our forgetfulness in scanty and unhappy harvests. Three things blind us to the comparative values of effort—our impatience, our desire to gather what we have not sown and our eagerness for the noisy and the dramatic. And this is just as true of the seed-sowing and the tending in our education of the children of our nation as of the garden and the field.

We are too impatient for quick returns. The get-rich-quick spirit which is the economic fallacy of America leaves the patience of preparation wholly out of account. We are eager for wealth for which we give no adequate social or moral returns. We build our fortunes too often upon speculation, the promotion of dubious enterprises and hard-driven over-capitalized industry. We are careless of fundamental economic enterprises like the culture of land and the building of substantial homes, the conservation of natural resources and the direction of energy toward real human well-being.

We love to work in crowds and to pass quickly from the places of our toil to the light and movement of city streets. Our children want to step from school to success without preliminary discipline of living. We make much of those who do dramatic things and overpay them; we are wanting in consideration for those who do the fundamental things and underpay them both in money and consideration.

IT is not thus with the sower and his seed. He must work patiently. All planting must be done carefully and the more precious the seed, the more labor must be expended upon the seed bed. The sower works in comparative loneliness. Planting is not a thing which can be done in a crowd. He works in quiet places, in brown fields beneath the May and October skies, in schoolrooms and churches and laboratories, where lovers of truth are gathered together. He creates the sources of public opinion, shapes ideals, gives wings to dreams and quality and direction to life. He works in partnership with elemental things, with soil and souls, with clouds and sunshine, with changing seasons, with truth and growing minds, with the laws of things as they are and the call of things as they ought to be.

He works for the harvests of the future. What he does possesses a marvelous power of multiplication. A grain of corn will multiply itself literally a thousand times, and a measure of wheat become a month's bread for a family.

He sows the strength of manhood and the happiness of little children. His harvests are contentment and the true wealth of life. He may sow the poet's song, the warrior's victory, or the prophet's vision. The teacher's word becomes the scholar's deed. The influence of the loving and good ripens into the well-being of humanity. Today's planting is tomorrow's destiny.

SUCH considerations as these give a new meaning to the work of the teacher, the preacher, to fatherhood and motherhood, to whatever shapes or influences life. The very perplexity of the time calls us to a new evaluation of the work of education. There is but one way to control the shaping of character and the molding of ideals. Not by such laws as Senator Lusk has been trying to drive through the New York State Legislature, not by political, social or economic intolerance. The Church long ago learned the futility of such measures. Some sort of sowing is bound to go on. We can only displace half truths by whole truths, the mistaken by the wise, the destructive by the constructive.

THE fields of humanity lie open just now to the chance of unspeakably significant sowings. They have been plowed deep and the growths of generations have been uprooted. If we do not plant them with the seeds of a Christian order they will plant themselves with hateful growths. It is a time to exalt anew the task of the sower and the teacher and to take account of the seed we are planting.

A Word for Our Times

The war has internationalized the world. False prophets may acclaim the return to national isolation, but the tides are against them. The world is at last one world, but it is not yet a world of peace. The task of the twentieth century is to achieve a sane, true internationalism. It cannot be done by warfare. It cannot be done by commercial and industrial antagonism. Duties from one nation to another and from each nation to the group of nations, duties carried out in friendly fashion, are the only practical methods of achieving world harmony and true civilization, "that great coming civilization of brotherly men." For what Carlyle called "armed neutrality" is but one remove form hostility, and the hostile spirit breeds war. World friendship is the only basis for world peace. There can be no permanent peace without love.—PRES. KENYON L. BUTTERFIELD.

Home and College

It would be worth the time and pains of some competent individual or committee to ascertain just what view or views American college authorities take concerning their responsibility for providing a safe and wholesome environment for their students. Mr. Albert H. Meads, of Chicago, whose son, a student at Dartmouth, recently shot and killed a college mate, is reported to have blamed the president of the college for the shooting, on the ground that he permitted the smuggling from Canada of the liquor that was the occasion of the tragedy. Perhaps Mr. Meads should rather blame himself for his failure as a parent to inculcate in his son the principles of correct living, for there is good evidence that the authorities of Dartmouth College have not only sought stringently to uphold the law against liquor selling but have also made special efforts to prevent the importation into Hanover of liquor smuggled across the border.

But the distressing incident calls fresh attention to the relative responsibility of the college and the home.

As colleges grow larger and more cosmopolitan and become more independent of the religious associations out of which most of them grew, the tendency is [illegible] furnishing of facilities for education. If these are adequate, it is maintained that the whole duty of the institution is discharged. The nurture of character and of the right spiritual point of view is principally the student's own concern.

But this is not the foundation on which most of our American colleges have grown to their present strength, nor do we think that the average parent desires to have the college authorities relax the disciplinary side of their work, using the adjective "disciplinary" in the highest sense. The college boy or girl is often immature, but susceptible to right or wrong influences, needing not only instruction, but safeguarding from unnecessary temptations and personal guidance. This means something more than the provision of religious exercises, optional or required, something more than courses of Biblical study. It does not mean usurping the functions of the police, but it does mean the effort by example and precept to keep the undergraduates in the right path, and that intimate touch upon the individual student which has been the saving of many a college boy and girl in the past.

It is important just now that there should be this exercise of influence and authority in connection with the enforcement of prohibition. Our colleges, speaking broadly, have not done much toward bringing in this era of a saloonless nation, but now that it is here they ought to line up with all the forces of law and order that are seeking to make prohibition effective.

There has been too much boozing at many of our colleges this past year. Here again we would not hold the college authorities exclusively responsible, but better conditions should prevail this coming year. If the teaching staff shows but a languid interest in total abstinence and in the banishment of liquor, that attitude is apt to be reflected in the student body down to the youngest freshman. The Christian homes of America expect and demand from the college authorities more vigorous efforts to banish liquor from the precincts of the college.

On the other hand, when the college does all it legitimately can for the moral welfare of its students, the home ought not to expect impossibilities. Nor is it fair for the home to expect the college to make good the defects and mistakes of the home. It has the boys and girls in their most plastic years. If parents then fail to induce a high sense of honor, if they gloss over faults that should be faithfully, yet kindly, corrected, if they devolve upon the church and the college duties which God intended the home to fulfill, they have no right to blame the college if their boys and girls go wrong, after they leave the parental roof.

It is not well for either the college or the home to stand apart and criticize the other. The interests at stake in the tutelage of young lives are far too precious to be jeopardized by misunderstandings and recriminations. The college and the home are partners in the splendid task of raising up another generation of youth, worthy of the privileges available to them, equal to the tasks of the coming day. We rejoice in the degree of harmony and co-operation already prevailing between these two fundamental institutions of society.

The Residuum of the Interchurch

Anyone entering the Greenhut Building on Eighteenth Street, New York, and contrasting the aspect of things today with the busy hum of industry caused by hundreds of workers four months ago would conclude that little was left of the Interchurch World Movement, at least, on its official side. The big building is for rent and only a corporal's guard remains to attend to the details connected with closing up the present stage in the Movement. Secretary Earl Taylor, the executive head, is so physically over-strained that he has been given a fifteen months' leave of absence by his Methodist Board, which loaned him to the Interchurch Movement. He as well as all the other officers of the Movement and members of the cabinet have put their resignations in the hands of the general committee. All in all, the external situation calls to mind the song, beginning "The harp that once through Tara's halls." On page 165 of this issue Secretary Frank Sheldon sums up the financial obligations resting upon the Movement and outlines future plans. It will be observed that these have been made on a very conservative basis, involving a relatively modest budget of $75,000. The representatives of Congregationalism who have been close to the reorganization processes and will continue to share in them are Secretary H. C. Herring, Dr. William Horace Day, of Bridgeport, and Mr. Frank Gaylord Cook, of Cambridge.

But it is not fair, as we have said repeatedly, to characterize the Interchurch Movement as a failure. Its sanguine promoters sought to do too much and too many kinds of things in too short a time. They erred in diagnosing the present attitude of people outside of churches toward drives. But when all the mistakes have been fairly estimated it remains true that the Movement, even on the financial side, was far from being a failure. It has raised already $176,000,000 for the missionary and educational work of the co-operating denominations. Last year these same denominations reported less than $100,000,000 of total gifts to their benevolent agencies. Indeed, several of these bodies, notably the Congregationalists, would not have approximated their goal but for the impetus and publicity connected with the Interchurch Movement. Even if the Congregational societies are pledged to pay their underwritings for the expenses of the Movement—and probably they will be called upon to do so—that sum plus the entire expenses of the Congregational World Movement is not an unreasonable charge on the total amount raised. We doubt whether it is more than the average cost of administering the societies in ordinary years.

Something of permanent value will grow out of the Interchurch Movement, when it is thoroughly reorganized, and managed by a board chosen by the constituent denominations. Meanwhile let us not forget how the men and women of the missionary field are feeling with regard to the general plan. Their attitude is well stated by Dr. E. M. Wiley in an article in The Continent, from which we quote this paragraph:

> Why is it that missionaries universally are so outspoken in behalf of the Movement? It is because they recognize in it the one great hope of the future, that the church in the homeland is at last perceiving the problem as they see it in the foreign field—not because it is the final leap, but because it is the first sure step. It is the sign that the conscience of the church is awakening as never before with regard to its great collective task. Even at home this same conscience has been informed and aroused concerning overchurching and underchurching by the bare, bold facts strikingly set forth by the Interchurch Movement. The leaven of this education is powerfully at work.

What Should the Manager Do?

The shutting down of woolen mills at Lawrence, Mass., with the consequent throwing out of employment for some 15,000 men and women, is an object lesson in our present-day forced study of economics. It raises the question of the duty of employers to their owners and their wage-earners and to the public in a concrete form. That Lawrence recently has been a center of economic unrest with spectacular and bitterly fought strikes does not change the nature of the situation, though it holds the attention of the public. The problem of the manufacturer is this. He buys raw material at the ends of the earth—Australia, South America, Montana—transports it to Lawrence, makes it into cloth, holds it until he can sell it to the tailor, probably on long credit. The price of this raw material is now very high. There is also a popular demand that the price of clothing should be greatly lowered which must be reckoned with. The tailors are not ready to give orders for cloth until they are assured of a sale at prices which will give them a return for the money they have invested or borrowed. It is this uncertainty as to prices and profits next fall and winter which dries up the orders for cloth, shuts the mills, and throws these thousands out of work.

In view of the previous history of this particular company, which has followed a policy of enlargement founded on great profits in the war period, how is the manager to balance his duties to the public, to the owners of the mills, and to those who work at the machines which make the cloth? It is a hardship for the public to have the amount of available cloth reduced, for it makes it more difficult and in the long run more expensive to be clothed. And the public also runs the risk of higher taxes caused by social unrest and disorder following unemployment. It would be dangerous for the owners to run the risk of operating the mills at a loss, for that tends toward bankruptcy. It is a serious and in some cases may be a fatal matter for the men and women and their families whose means of living are thus suddenly stopped. What is the true provision for such an emergency in the economic life of a community and a trade? What answer shall we find to the concrete but complicated questions which arise under the second great commandment when such conditions present themselves?

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of Things Ancient and Modern

There came unto me a Lady who was an Enthusiast on Recent Things. And she spent her time in this, either to See or to Hear Some New Thing, even as did the women in Athens. And she inquired of me, saying, Hast thou read the Modern Poetry? And dost thou not think that it is Just Too Lovely for Any Use?

And I said, I have read that which is called Modern Poetry. And some of it is Modern Poetry. And some of it is Modern but not Poetry; and some of it may be Poetry but it is not Modern; and some of it is neither Modern nor Poetry. As for its being Just too Lovely for Any Use, that is my opinion of the Major Part thereof; I have no Use for it.

And she inquired further, and said, Hast thou seen the Modern Dances?

And I answered and said, I have covered One Eye and Partly Closed the Other, and I have seen the Modern Dances.

And she said, Are they not Beautiful?

And I said, I can think of Several Adjectives which I would sooner apply to them.

And she said, Tastes Differ.

And I said, Tastes differ less than thou dost suppose. I went once unto the Circus of the renowned Phineas T. Barnum. And he had just imported a Cannibal Family from the Ends of the earth. And the man and the woman and the little boy lay upon a Platform, and were stolid and Homesick. Neither cared they whether people looked at them or not. But there came that way a little white boy with a small Red Balloon. And the little Cannibal boy leaped to his feet and ran to the edge of the Platform, and in heathenish Gibberish but with very Christian Tears he pleaded for it.

And I said, The tastes of that little Naked Heathen as to Red Balloons were Identical with those of the Daughter of the Daughter of Keturah, who hath been a Puritan for Ten Generations.

And I said, When Oscar Wilde was a popular fad, and every Dude wore a Sunflower in his Buttonhole, and the Civilized world attired itself in Pale Yellows and Discouraged Greens and God-forsaken Blues, we that were wise knew that it would not Last Very Long.

And she said, We were talking, I believe, of the Modern Dances.

And I said, There are three good things about the Modern Dances. The Position is so Objectionable, and the Dances are so Ungainly and the Musick is so Barbarous, that they will go where Oscar Wilde's color scheme hath gone.

And she said, Thou speakest not of their Morals, whereof I thought that thou wouldest speak.

And I said, I have been young, and I attribute not to young folk all the bad motives which rise in the mind of us Old Sinners. But the first of the Ten Commandments of Musick is, Thou shalt be Rhythmickal; and the second is, Thou shalt be Melodious; and the third is Thou shalt be Harmonious. Behold, there shall be a day when the Cowbells and the Clappers shall go to Grass, and the Fiddle shall play tunes as melodious as the good old Tunes of the Money Musk and Sugar in the Gourd.

And she said, But they will be Modern Tunes.

And I said, The Chinese do bury Eggs for an Hundred Years, and when they Exhume them, they count them the Freshest Things that ever Hens Laid. There are things that call themselves Modern which were Ancient when Lot's wife gave her coming-out party for her daughters.

But the things that are Clean, and Wholesome and Lovely and of Good Report, these are the Ancient Things, and every generation will come to them at length as the things most Modern.

In Brief

A little of our own last winter must be making a visit to South America. The city of Buenos Aires had only one snowfall in thirty years till last week, when a second visitation came. As there are no heating arrangements in most of the houses, there must have been some suffering among the people.

Those foreign delegates to the Council who have been staying in America a little longer than most of their companions have put our churches under great indebtedness for the sermons preached in a number of cities and towns. We hear from many quarters enthusiastic comments on these discourses.

Vice-Presidential stock is looking up on both sides of the Atlantic. The French are said, in view of President Deschanel's accident and illness, to be thinking seriously of adding a vice-president to their executive machinery for such emergencies. And Mr. Harding tells Governor Coolidge that in case of their election he wants his presence and counsel at cabinet meetings.

The human side of the International Council was more important than its ecclesiastical aspects. Nothing could have been better for the cause of internationalism and our common Christianity than the fraternizing of delegates between the sessions and the quiet man-to-man talks here and there. As one of the English brethren said, "I only wish the Council could have been two weeks instead of eight days and that it had involved no public meetings."

According to a prophet, whose name we have already forgotten, the present world is coming to an end on August 4 and all the nations which took part in the recent war are to be submerged by the Atlantic. It is a good time, then, to pay our debts and contribute to good causes. How the Atlantic is to get at such nations as China, Japan, and Siam, all of which took part in the war, we do not quite understand. But, then, a little thing like the Pacific Ocean does not count for much when one is putting out a good mouth-filling prophecy.

Australia has long had difficulties with the policy of political dictation and disloyalty carried on by prominent leaders of the Roman Catholic Church. Archbishop Mannix, the head of this policy, is just now passing through the United States on his way to Europe. In a farewell banquet given by the Lord Mayor of Sidney before he sailed from Australia the usual and obligatory toast of the British Empire at all such functions, "To the King!" was deliberately omitted, to the scandal of all Australia except that part of it which bears the Irish rebel label. At Honolulu Archbishop Mannix got into trouble by failing to rise when "The Star-Spangled Banner" was sung. That may have been mere inattention, as he claims; but this Archbishop is evidently an Irishman first, a churchman afterwards, and an Australian last of all. It may be well to remember his position in the political life of his own land, not to deny him the courtesies due to a traveler but to put the right estimate upon what he may say and do while he remains in the United States.

World Problems in Asia Minor

Where Races and Religions Are Clashing

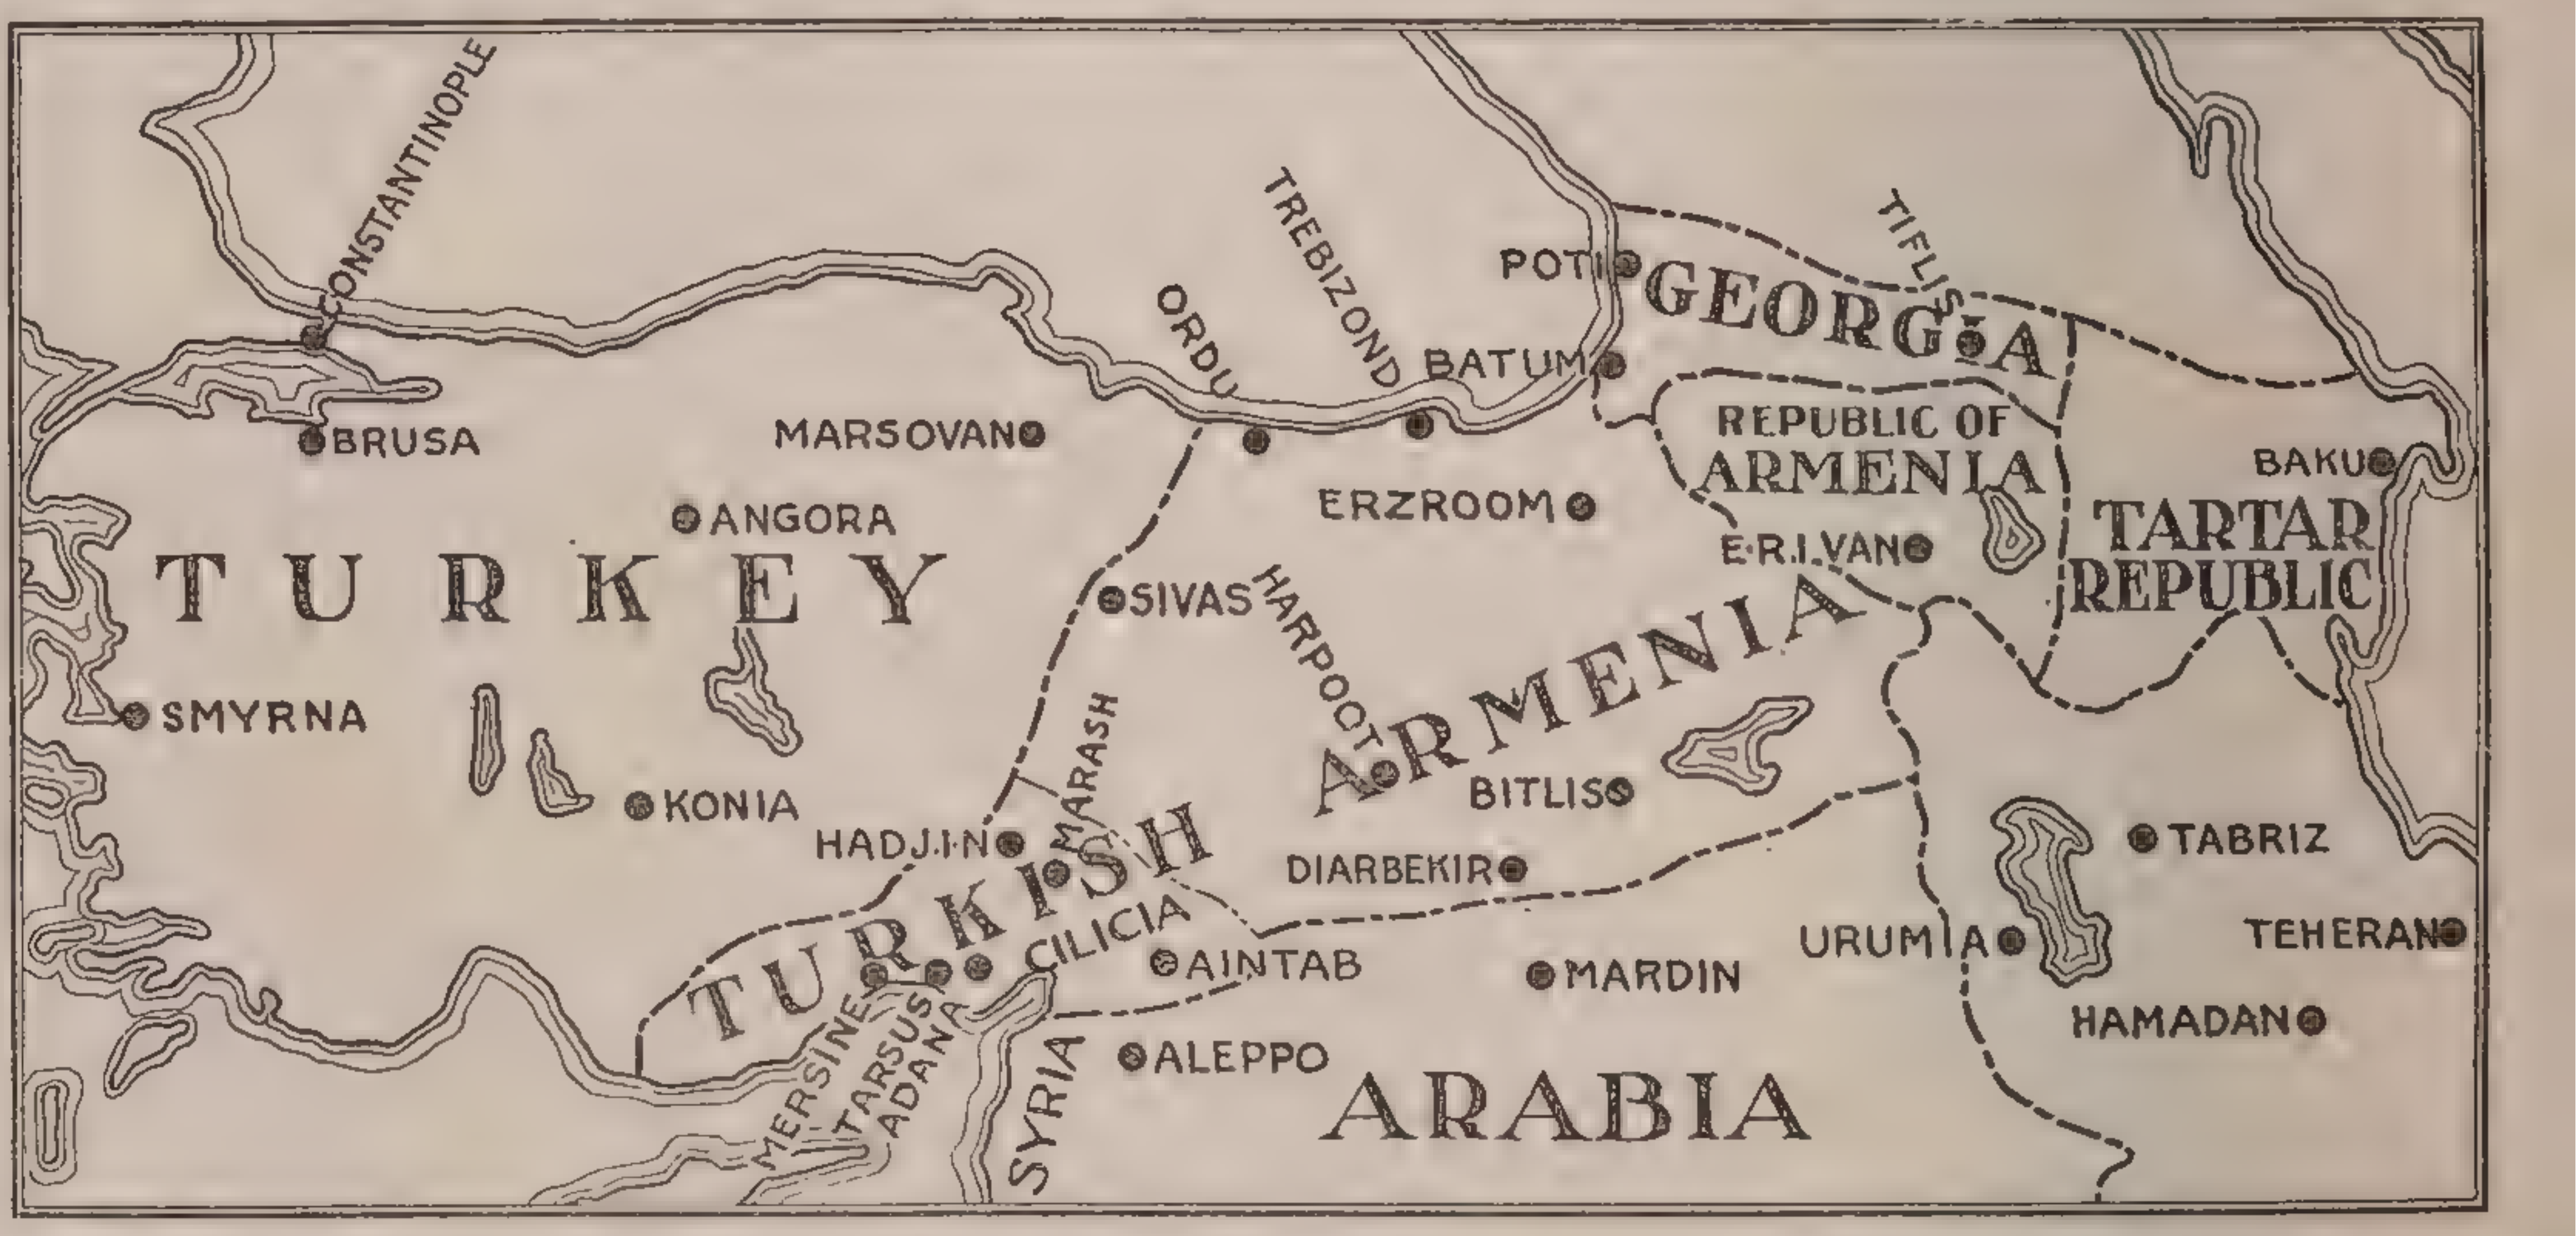
By Isaac Ogden Rankin

In the slow development of the world that is to be, the centers of active external stress and change just now are Poland, Asia Minor, and Syria. For these are the places where the control of territory and the reshaping of frontiers are in dispute, wars are in progress, and diplomacy has difficult questions of territorial ambition and racial jealousy to settle. Poland, not long since the invader of Ukraine as a means of defense against Russian invasion, is now in its turn invaded by Russian armies and has been forced to appeal to the Allied Powers for safety. France, in order to make real her mandate for the control of Syria, has just launched an expedition against the Arabs for the capture of Aleppo and Damascus. But the more immediate interest of the world is in Asia Minor, where the world-old combat between Europe and Asia, of which the siege of Troy is the great literary tradition, is once more in progress and the fate of the Turk hangs in the balance.

Asia Minor is a bridge between Europe and Asia, a peninsula nearly the size of France without its recovered provinces, with many islands on its western boundary. It might be called the seat of the second stage of Christian history. Not only does it contain Tarsus, birthplace of the Apostle Paul, where American missionaries going outside the French lines were the other day carried off by the Turkish brigands, but who are now in safety, but also the scene of Paul's travels and five of the seven churches to which he wrote letters which have come down to us. The Greeks in their advance the other day were in the neighborhood of the seven churches of Asia appealed to in the Apocalypse. They started from Smyrna and they captured Sardis and Philadelphia.

On three sides Asia Minor is sea-bordered, with the Mediterranean on the south, the Black Sea on the north, the island-crowded Ægean and the narrow passage which divides Europe and Asia on the west. The eastern boundary lies across the hill country of Armenia. In the plans of the Allies the Turks were to be deprived of the control of much of this country. The future of the straits was a matter of international concern and the plan adopted was to take possession, just as we did at Panama, of a strip on both sides which would take the shores of the narrow passages out of local ownership. On the European side the territory back of that strip has been given to Greece, with the task of taking it from the Turks who still have armed forces there. Greece was also given a mandate for Smyrna and the neighboring cities and villages, many of which for thousands of years have maintained their Greek language and civil life. The Italians are settled at the south about the wide bay of Adalia, and the French hold a part of Cilicia at the southeast.

The plan was to have the United States assume the reconstruction of the center and north from the Bosphorus to Trebizond. When it became clear that we were not ready for that opportunity, the British, with some French assistance, occupied Constantinople, which it was planned to leave as a residence to the Turkish Sultan and his government by way of placating Moslem sentiment in India and Egypt, in spite of the fact that it has always been a Christian city. The rise of the Turkish National movement under Mustapha Kemal, who had commanded the Turkish forces at the Dardanelles, made it necessary to exercise force to carry out this plan. France was busy in Cilicia and Syria. Italy was opposed to coercing the Turks. Great Britain had ships but few troops at her disposal. But the Greeks had a well-appointed army in Smyrna. The plea of the Greek Premier, Venezelos, was at last listened to and the Greek army in less than a fortnight swept the Turkish Nationalists back, clearing the whole western territory near the coast and capturing Brusa, the ancient capital from which the Turks ruled the country before Constantinople fell into their hands in 1399. With a little further clearing at the north the whole territory of the straits will be secure.



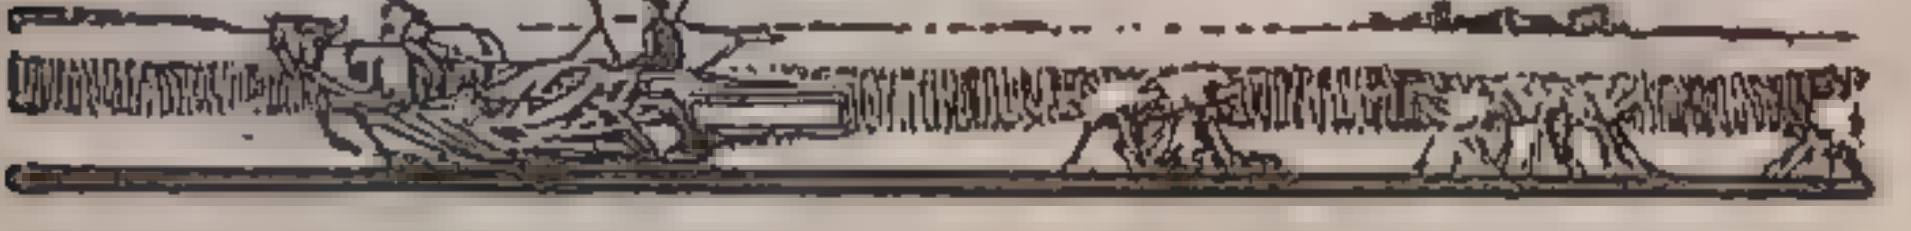
But in their work of clearing the country, the Greek forces ran into the Italian outposts at the south and the Italians protected the Turks whom they were pursuing. To the old racial and religious hatreds of the past—Moslem against Christian, Turk and Tartar and Kurd against Greek and Armenian—are now added European divisions and jealousies, British, Greek, Italian, and French, with the old Russian ambitions of mastery in the background. No wonder they are calling Asia Minor the new Balkans.

The Allied Council, as we write, is demanding instant Turkish assent to a treaty which deprives Turkey altogether of the government of alien races. The Sultan, no doubt, will yield, but Turks of the interior are not willing to concede the authority of the Sultan's government in Constantinople. From the East and from across the Black Sea agents of Russia are encouraging this resistance.

In the meantime a large part of the peninsula is in disorder. Worse than the Turkish Nationalists are the brigand forces intent on wiping out racial and religious enemies i their own neighborhood. President Wilson i the security of the White House is drawin the frontiers of Armenia; but there is n power to enforce or establish them. Thoug the Armenians in the East are drawing together and fighting in self-defense, the practical extirpation of the Armenians in th South, where once they were a majority seems certain unless the Greek armies are a rapidly successful in their more difficult campaign in the hill country as they were in th lowlands near the coast.

What America might have done a year ag with the consent of the whole world is no one of the most difficult questions which ha ever been presented to the statesmen of th world for solution.

FROM·OUR·WESTERN·WINDOW



Of all the denominational colleges of the iddle West none has borne a fairer name and better reputation than Olivet. For three-arters of a century it has set standards of ucation not only for the State of Michigan it in some measure for the surrounding states d it has sent into the ministry and into the aching profession some of our foremost lead-s; and not a few of our prominent business en are proud to be among its graduates. hrough a series of misfortunes it was com-elled to close its doors last year and many of s friends were afraid that the college would ever be reopened. The Board of Directors took ourage from the Congregational World Move-ent and a vote of the State Conference of Michigan to bring the college into a closer rela-onship to itself, and they have made arrange-ents to reopen the college. They have called president and are seeking a faculty and are oing forward with faith to give the college a ew lease of life.

Reopening Day

June 18–20 was observed as reopening day or the school. More than 300 alumni and riends gathered from far and near to celebrate he occasion. The men of the village had made he campus ready and the resident members of he Woman's College Board had cleaned and ecorated Shipherd Hall for the occasion. The itizens responded by decorating the stores and esidences with the college and national colors nd did all they could to make the reopening of he school a great success. There were fraternity and sorority reunions, a great alumni meeting held in the old chapel, and the presentation of a large flag to the college by the citizens of Olivet, Rev. Frank Fukerson conducting the ceremonies. The afternoon program was held under the great oak trees that are the glory of Olivet. It included music by Professor Martin's orchestra which has served the college for many years, an address on the contribution that a small college can make to life by President McKinney of the State Normal School at Ypsilanti, and a talk by Mr. George R. Wilson of Chicago, one of the college trustees, who gave the history of the efforts to reopen the school. Mr. Wilson presented the newly elected president, Paul F. Voelker. President Voelker has had experience as superintendent of public and high schools, served as associate professor at Drake University and was secretary for some time of the Extension Lecture Department at the University of Wisconsin. He has just been awarded the degree of Ph.D. by Columbia University. An enthusiastic greeting was given to Frank Green of Olivet who gave much effort to the preparation for the reunion and reopening occasion, and who has served the college with great self sacrifice. The Chicago delegation challenged the rest of the alumni to a ball game which they won by a score of 11 to 8. The evening program was in charge of Rev. Arie Binkhorst of Chicago, who is an alumnus of the college and after an impressive devotional service, addresses of congratulation and encouragement were made by a number of speakers. The day's program closed with a stirring address by President Voelker, in which he called the whole assemblage to a rededication to the task of making the future of Olivet one of service to humanity.

Gratitude Expressed by an Alumnus

Dr. Ernest Bourner Allen of Oak Park, Ill., who is a graduate of Olivet and is a member of the Board of Trustees, writes as follows concerning the reopening of the school:

> The reopening of Olivet College represents more than the satisfaction of its many friends and students. It marks the definition of a denominational trend in relation to all our Christian colleges. That trend includes closer affiliation, without control, between churches and colleges, and a re-emphasis upon the ideals of Christian education. The Michigan Conference, in adopting the "findings" recently published in The Congregationalist and providing for closer affiliation, has helped to clear away the débris which littered the road of fellowship and freedom. We Congregational folk have been somewhat more inclined to brag about our colleges than to back them. In case of their serious illness we have not functioned denominationally to look after their health, and in case of death we have scarcely been able to arrange for a decent funeral! Now there is a revival of interest in distinctively Christian education, a big by-product of a war which determined that scientific kultur was not a sufficient balance for a nation or a civilization.
> Dr. Voelker, the newly elected president of Olivet, made a very favorable impression when he told the Conference he had not come to ask for pledges but to make them. It was refreshing to hear him declare that the members of the new faculty, in addition to having satisfactory degrees for a scholarship must also be Christian men and women; that the curriculum would be permeated by a Christian philosophy of life; that the college existed to be of service to the churches and the home; and that students would receive personal attention, with the desire to inspire them for Christian leadership and service.
> I am glad to report that substantial repairs on college buildings are now in progress. Several members of the new faculty are practically engaged. A budget which expert college administrators tell us is sufficient to do standard college work is assured. New students are enrolling and old students are planning to return. We believe that for Olivet "the best is yet to be." The investment of money and life there will enable her to fulfill her motto, Pro Christo et Humanitate, as she has so nobly done during the past seventy-five years of her splendid history.

If the Congregational World Movement should accomplish nothing else but that of giving courage to those who have the responsibility for the reopening of Olivet, it would be well worth all it has cost. Not only will the college profit by the closer relationship that it now will sustain to the State Conference of Michigan but we may be sure that our churches in that state and throughout the nation will profit greatly by the reopening of this school. All honor to the trustees and other friends of the college who have dared to follow their vision of a future for Olivet. R. W. G.

Object for Intercession

For the Persecuted Christians of Russia:

O Lord, who art ever mindful of the needs and sufferings of thy people, bring an end, we pray thee, to the trials of thy flock in Russia. So overrule the events and the minds of the leaders among that great people that persecution may cease and thy church, purged and clear of the evils that have limited its power, may become once more the center of devotion and a light of hope, not only for the Russian, but for all the peoples of the earth. In the name of Christ. Amen.—R.

Along the Council Trail

Wolverhampton, England, does not bulk large in the average American's thought, but it had two pastors on the main program in a single forenoon.

A big laugh followed Rev. W. Blackshaw's quotation of a witty opinion that Isaiah was not written by two men but by a committee with power to add to their number.

A fourteen-year-old boy held the distinction of being the youngest delegate. He came from Worcester and seemed to be having a fine time as he was being convoyed about by his pastor, Rev. E. W. Phillips.

President Cowling convulsed his hearers with the story of the man in a new Western town who pointed out the humble edifice of a new college there with the assurance, "I ought to know; I'm one of its alma maters."

Rev. A. M. Parker and his smiling ladies of the Information Stand imparted a wide range of useful facts, and the public confidence in their wisdom was unbounded—one delegate asking if the new Polish Bonds were a safe investment, and a family who had come with a tent asking as to the advisability of camping on Copley Square.

Those delegates who brought their tents along only had to secure a plot of land on which to pitch them. But that wasn't the easiest task in the world, so the Entertainment Committee discovered when it tackled the job. So Chairman Fletcher Parker offered to the first applicant his own backyard at Winchester. But when the second tenter-out appeared the patient dispenser of hospitality was forced to consider the possibilities of the Common, the Public Gardens and Paragon Park at Nantasket.

A beautiful Tennyson story was told by Arthur Porritt, the London religious journalist. Explaining that the most revered element in English society is the old county families, he told of a visit that Alfred Tennyson made to the observatory of Sir Norman Lockyer. The famous astronomer set his telescope upon a fascinating star cluster and invited Mr. Tennyson to look. The laureate looked—in fact, looked so long and intently that his host feared his eye might suffer some injury. Finally Mr. Tennyson turned from the eye-piece and thoughtfully made this comment: "After gazing on a sight like that, it makes our county families look pretty small, doesn't it?"

Who should appear on the scene a week after the International Council adjourned but Mr. Harry Barber of London and wife! They had planned to attend the Council as the climax of a round-the-world trip begun last March, but despite every effort they could make to get accommodations on the crowded steamers from Yokohama to New York they were unable to get a steamer that would have brought them here in time. They were obliged to see it go steaming away without them. Mr. Barber is a London solicitor, who serves also as the treasurer of the London Congregational Union. Though the Boston entertainment committee had practically disbanded before their arrival some of its members did what lay in their power toward making Mr. and Mrs. Barber's short stay enjoyable. Their hosts were more than repaid, not only by the appreciation shown, but by the opportunity to become acquainted with two such attractive and influential London Congregationalists.

Educating the Nation's Children

Equality of Opportunity for All

By Frank E. Spaulding

Head of Department of Education, Graduate School, Yale University

Every loyal American is proud of the American public school. Indeed, pride in our public schools, as a distinctively American institution, may safely be taken as an index of loyalty. And why should we not be proud of them! Think of the opportunities they offer our children and youth without price.

THE KINDERGARTEN

The American child of four or five may go to that wonderful place—the kindergarten. It is a beautiful room, perhaps a series of rooms; bay windows and sunshine; a fire-place; big sand boxes; blocks and playthings of all kinds; paints and pencils; a piano and a victrola; interesting pictures on the walls; attractive young women in charge—very different from the conventional notion of teachers—who know just what children like, and whose sole purpose seems to be to help every little boy and girl to have a good time.

Such a good time the kindergarten does afford, with wholesome hours of play and growth, of natural use and development of bodies, hands, senses, minds and spirits. How wholesome and enduring are the lessons learned and the habits formed, largely unconsciously—lessons and habits of co-operation, mutual respect, kindness, cheerfulness and reverence!

But the kindergarten is only the vestibule to our marvelous public school edifice. As the child advances in age, as his individual characteristics and capacities manifest themselves, he finds awaiting him at every step just the opportunities that he needs.

HELPERS ALONG THE ROAD

There are earnest, enthusiastic teachers, not only "born" teachers, but teachers "made" wise and skillful by long study in the best schools and colleges, by many and frequent professional courses under the most competent instructors.

There are trained educational and vocational guides and counselors, who study intimately the possibilities of each boy and girl; advise each one wisely concerning the studies he should take and the type of service for which he should prepare; encourage each one to make the most of his capacities, and follow his career beyond the school with helpful advice and stimulus.

The schoolrooms are as attractive as the kindergarten, each adapted to its peculiar use, and equipped accordingly. And such a variety! Even the "regular" classrooms express the individuality of their service—through their equipment, the pictures on the walls, the books on the shelves. There is the English room; the history room; the geography room, the mathematics room; the science room; the art room, and several more.

And when we come to special rooms and equipment for special activities, what a wealth and variety of provision we find for the wholesome growth and development of every individual boy and girl. There are shower baths and the swimming pool, playrooms for the little children, the well-equipped gymnasium and running track for the older boys and girls, the beautiful, though dread, white enamel room where doctor and nurse detect the first symptoms of physical ailment and take necessary steps to remedy them; the still more dread, but beneficial, dentist's room with its chair and instruments; the library, well-stocked with all kinds of interesting books and magazines, with librarians in charge who know just what every boy and girl likes to read and are quick to find it for them.

There are wonderful shops of all kinds, with marvelous equipment of tools and machinery, laboratories with bottles, machines and all sorts of devices for interesting experiments, greenhouses full of growing things, domestic pets and animals to be cared for, shops for sewing and millinery where every girl learns to make for herself attractive gowns and hats, kitchens and dining rooms, bedrooms, complete "model" homes, where all the arts and the skill of the house-manager and home maker may be acquired in practice. There are ample playgrounds, with all sorts of apparatus for boys and girls of all ages—but it is unnecessary to prolong the list of attractive and effective educational opportunities and aids that the American public school offers to American children and youth.

This thrilling picture of public school provisions is not overdrawn in any particular; indeed, much might be added to it, and it could still be matched in reality.

THE INEQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY

Thinking in such terms as these, we are supremely proud of the American public school. What an opportunity it affords to the children of poor and rich alike! So it is easy to couple thought of the public school with our favorite American ideal of "equality of opportunity" for all! And here is where we grievously delude ourselves and cheat most of our children and youth out of even tolerably suitable educational opportunities. For if we turn from our complacent pride and our satisfying ideals, to the actual facts and conditions as they exist throughout the United States today, we shall find inequality of educational opportunity almost beyond belief or imagination.

We shall indeed find all the opportunities here described, and many more, but we shall find that they are accessible to only a few thousand, at the most to less than a half-million of the more than twenty millions of American boys and girls.

Nothing approximating these opportunities is accessible throughout any single state. It is safe to say that nowhere in the United States is there an area twenty miles square in which even most of these opportunities are practically available for the majority of the children living within that area.

Thousands and tens of thousands of children, no one knows how many—of "school age"—are getting absolutely no educational opportunity in the public schools, or in any other schools, from one years' end to another. Hundreds of thousands more—both in public and private schools—are enjoying educational opportunities that only by extreme courtesy can be called by that name.

The result of this nation-wide, wholesale neglect of even the most elementary instruction for our children and youth was startlingly revealed by the records of our recent draft army. Twenty-five in every hundred of our select young men from twenty-one to thirty-one years of age could neither read nor write sufficiently to make these elementary arts of any use to them.

A proportion even larger were found to be handicapped by physical defects, most of which suitable educational care could have remedied, which rendered them incapable of full military service.

THE REMEDIES

What is to be done?

First of all we must awake from our self-satisfied, idealistic dreams of unparalleled educational opportunities freely accessible to every boy and girl. We must open our eyes to the disagreeable, appalling facts and conditions that exist about us.

We must not abandon or forget our ideals of equal educational opportunities and those the very best opportunities that can be devised. We must not neglect or depreciate the marvelous opportunities that have been provided for a few children here and there. On the contrary, we must maintain and even improve these, and use them as practicable standards.

Our definite, concrete and practical program must be provision at the earliest possible moment for literally every one of our twenty-odd millions of boys and girls, educational advantages equal to those that we now provide for a few thousand only.

These splendid advantages for the thousands are provided almost wholly by public taxation. And their support is demonstrably a most profitable investment. The twenty-five to thirty per cent. of our mentally and physically handicapped soldiers contributed what they could to the successful solution of our war problems; but how far did their contribution fall short of what it might have been, had these unfortunates enjoyed even fair educational advantages! It is not on the physically and mentally handicapped such as these that our nation can rely in the distress of war.

In peace, unfortunately, those suffering from remediable educational handicaps are less conspicuous than in war. But there can be little doubt that in peace such handicaps are relatively even more serious.

Success in war is conducted under a strict discipline that compels the vast numbers of enlisted men to carry out the plans of the few officers. If that success is dependent on the enlightened and trained intelligence of the soldier in the ranks, how much more is governmental and civic success in peace dependent upon the enlightened and trained intelligence of every citizen, who, independently, without disciplinary directions and restraints, helps to determine the policies, the plans and the practices in governmental and civic affairs?

In the interest of our safety and progress as a nation, we must see to it without delay that adequate educational opportunities are provided for the nation's children throughout every square mile of our inhabited territory.

New Leader for Michigan University

President Burton to be Dr. Angell's Successor

One of the notable events of the year in the educational world is the decision of President Burton of the University of Minnesota to accept the call of the University of Michigan, where he enters the succession of that noted Christian statesman, James B. Angell. Mr. E. B. Pierce, the Registrar of the University of Minnesota, when Dr. Burton accepted the call to Michigan, sent the following letter to the students of Michigan:

"You have asked me to tell you what we think about Pres. M. L. Burton. My first impulse is to tell you what we think about his leaving Minnesota, but anything that I might say on that subject would not make very cheerful reading, so I shall try to stick to the text.

"To those who have not seen President Burton, let me say that he is a sizable person, six feet two inches tall and proportionately built, weighing 200 pounds. One is not conscious of his bigness, however, until one sees him alongside other men. President emeritus Cyrus Northrop was never considered a small man; however, when President Vincent came, we noticed with surprise how he loomed above President Northrop. When President Burton was introduced to us as Mr. Vincent's successor, again we were amazed to see how the new president towered above his predecessors. Yes, President Burton is a large man, well put up, active, virile, of pleasing appearance, and redheaded. A stock conundrum, much overworked during his first year here, is 'Why is President Burton like a piano?' and the answer to it is, 'Because he is grand, upright, and square, and has a mahogany top.' His hair is not a fiery red, but a becoming auburn. I don't know whether Mr. Burton would be called handsome or not. I do know, however, that he looks mighty good to us.

"It is quite impossible for any one at Minnesota to analyze Mr. Burton completely, for he has been here only three short years. The first year he spent studying the situation at Minnesota; the second year was the period of the S. A. T. C., which doesn't count (Mr. Burton won't agree with that); and in the third year he was taken from us. Yet despite this all too short period of service, certain characteristics appear clearly and definitely to have impressed themselves upon the University.

"First of all, Mr. Burton is out and out a students' president. That was clear almost from the beginning. I remember his saying in one of his first addresses, 'I am interested in knowing what the alumni are thinking. I am interested in knowing the mind of the faculty, but I am profoundly concerned to know what the students are thinking about.' His subsequent policies were fully consistent with this statement. President Burton sincerely covets contact with the students. He likes to mingle with them much as a big brother would, not to boss the proceedings, but to enjoy their comradeship. He enters heartily into the problems of the students, is wonderfully expert in catching their point of view, and, having caught it, is so peculiarly able to visualize for them the ultimate goal of their strivings that presently the entire student body has caught the vision of a finer college spirit, a cleaner campus and a better Minnesota in every way.

"In the past we have heard lots of talk about student self-government, but during the last three years there has been among the student body a larger interest in the welfare of the University, a more spontaneous concern for the good name of the institution than ever before; and all this without much talk or conscious machinery. I know the students love President Burton. They like to have him around. They respect and admire him, and they are proud of him.

"President Burton is a firm advocate of intercollegiate athletics. He is athletic himself and enjoys all sports. He never misses an intercollegiate football or basket ball game, unless he is away; he plays a good game of tennis, is an enthusiastic golfer and thoroughly enjoys the out-of-doors. I have never seen him appear weary. Always about him there is an enthusiasm that is contagious. His presence inspires activity. It is utterly impossible for him to be an indifferent spectator at a contest. He is too red-blooded and human for that. He always wants his side to win and cordially lends his efforts toward the winning.

PRES. M. L. BURTON

"The faculty were, I think, a little doubtful about President Burton at first. They thought that in some of the things he said he showed too much egotism. Mr. Burton did make a number of promises and did assert that he intended to do certain things, all of which may have sounded egotistical; but to the wonder as well as to the satisfaction of his critics, he accomplished in every instance just what he had said he would. I think that this trait of his still creates surprise. He has a most astounding faculty for carrying out his program regardless of apparently insurmountable obstacles. He is tactful and diplomatic. He appreciates the efforts of others and doesn't hesitate to express that appreciation. He takes the entire faculty into his confidence. He has frequently called a mass meeting of the teaching staff to set before them the problems of the University, so that all might understand thoroughly the plans of the administration, participate in their formulation and lend hearty cooperation in their fulfillment.

"President Burton has been wonderfully successful in presenting the needs of the University to the Legislature. Practically alone in insisting that 'what ought to be done must be done,' he carried through successfully the biggest and by all odds the most far-reaching program for expansion in the history of the institution. It was not fighting methods that won the appropriation from the legislators. There was not ever a suggestion of friction. It was the overwhelming conviction of a big leader, forcefully expressed, that won the sympathetic and cordial support of the individual members of the legislative body for the state's institution of higher learning. President Burton takes considerable time in determining what is the best thing to do, but once he has made up his mind, he allows nothing to interfere with the accomplishment of his purpose. Nature knew her business when she gave him that crown of auburn.

"President Burton is thoroughly human. His laugh is a whole-souled, deep-rooted chuckle that shakes him all over. He enjoys a joke and a good story. He is full of appropriate short stories and witticisms that take the tenseness out of overweighty conferences. One instantly feels at ease in his presence. His cordial good will and sympathetic attention command instant and lasting loyalty. He reminds one of Lincoln. He honestly and sincerely likes folks and always wants to have folks like him. In this he has succeeded wonderfully at Minnesota.

"The announcement of President Burton's resignation brought a universal sense of loss among students and faculty. We haven't yet quite fully realized that he is going and we don't like to think about it. We congratulate the students and faculty of the University of Michigan upon the acquisition of a splendid friend and leader whom we relinquish with genuine sorrow. It will be exceedingly hard for a new man to fill the place President Burton has won in the hearts of the students and the faculties of Minnesota."

It is not too much to say that President Burton has during his three years at the University of Minnesota been one of the outstanding figures in the educational world. He has rendered great service to the profession of teaching. He has been the speaker at gatherings of the profession in all the states from Pennsylvania to Washington and has rendered large service to denominational colleges and other educational institutions.

Any word concerning President Burton would be very incomplete without mention of Mrs. Burton, the daughter of Rev. Leonard H. Moses, who during the whole of his professional career was in the Congregational ministry. Mrs. Burton has been actively identified with Dr. Burton's work at the University and has been devoted to the interests of the institution and the lives of the students in a wonderful way. She has served as Chairman of the North Central Field Committee of the Y. W. C. A. for five Northwest States and has responded to a multitude of calls from almost every quarter, calls for help and inspiration. Michigan University will, undoubtedly, under the leadership of President Burton, go forward to fulfill the promises that inhere in its noblest traditions.

How to Get and How to Keep Prepared Teachers

Educational Foundations in Jeopardy

By A. E. Winship

It is high tragedy that the sons and daughters of Pilgrims and Puritans are to celebrate the three hundredth anniversary of the first footfall on Plymouth Rock with a genuine scare lest the foundations of our schools, which have made these three hundred years famous, be washed away in the undertow of the New Democracy.

Can we fence in the rock upon which our Democracy rests as we fenced in what was left of the Rock on Plymouth beach after it was chipped for souvenirs?

Never, in all the ebb and flow of civic unification and social stratification, has there been such need of sanity in educational leadership, such need of statesmanship in education, such need of consecrated service in all schools as now.

The Education of Citizens

It is beyond human imagination to conceive of any way to make Democracy, national or international, safe without the best possible educational preparation of all the children of all the people.

Machines can perform examples, but only the human mind can solve the simplest problem. A machine can add, subtract, multiply and divide better than man, but no machine can by any possibility tell what to add, subtract, multiply or divide.

A motor can draw a plow that will turn a dozen furrows of any depth; a planter-machine can drill in any desired number of seeds at any desired depth; a machine cultivator can keep down weeds; a machine can harvest ears from the stalks, take husks from the ears and shell the corn. But no machine has ever invented or will ever invent the simplest of new machines. Problems of all kinds must be solved by the mind of man.

We can make voting machines and vote-counting machines, but no machine will ever be invented that will provide intelligence and conscience for a voter. We can make machines for field, forest and garden, for mill and factory, for spinning and weaving, for diving into the depth of the sea and flying into the heavens, but no machine will ever create industrial peace or commercial honor, domestic tranquillity or social purity.

Nothing but education adequately broad and deep and high can promote and protect those domestic, industrial, commercial, social, civic and religious conditions without which Democracy is as impossible as pure water in a stagnant pool.

The Endangered Foundations

By universal consent the educational foundations of Democracy are in jeopardy. There are schoolhouses in vast number that cannot be opened in September, there are thousands of children that will have no school privileges this season. Tens of thousands of teachers will be accepted simply because of the emergency. High school graduates are not preparing to teach in sufficient number to meet future demand for prepared teachers. Worst of all, many of the best men and women who expected to continue in the profession in June will decline to fulfill their contract in September.

It is not primarily the high cost of living. In so far as that is a cause it seems to have been adequately and skillfully promoted by campaigners for salary increases, and we may neglect without intending in the slightest degree to minimize it.

The Call for Teachers

The real trouble is the unexpected popularity of teachers at all points of the compass. Girls who were in the waiting line, while fathers were pulling political wires and mothers were wielding social charms to get them into a school position, are now ready to turn down positions with salaries that would have been considered equal to an oil gusher five years ago.

The business world has suddenly discovered that the woman teacher of today is not the spinster of the caricaturist, is neither spectacled nor famished, and that the man teacher is neither a thrashing machine nor a whaling craft.

The woman teacher became a social comrade when women's clubs multiplied and it was discovered that no one could function better in convention proceedings than she. The man teacher became a chum of bankers and brokers when the Rotary Club, the Kewanis Club, and the Lion Club came into the field of business and professional activity, and the schoolmaster proved to be as attractive a Mason, Odd Fellow or other good fellow as the doctor, the lawyer, or the bishop.

As a schoolmaster dealing with children, as a schoolma'am making children mind their p's and q's, the employing public had no way to estimate the teachers' commercial value as men and women. But when the war came on with drives for selling of Liberty Bonds and War Saving Stamps, rounding up knitters and braiders, collecting books and magazines, securing members in the Red Cross, raising funds for War Camp Community Service, Salvation Army, Knights of Columbus, Young Men's Christian Association, Young Women's Christian Association, few were so blind as not to see that there were no better leaders in any phase of war work than these men and women teachers.

THE PLACARD TELLS THE STORY

Then came the influenza with its demands for devoted service and again the teachers came to the front and there was appreciation of their devotion to humanity in peace as there had been of their services to their country in war.

A Change of Estimation

These experiences have tended to change entirely the relation of men and women teachers to the professional and business world. The teachers must live better because of the new social and business associations. They can go out of the teaching profession if they like. And they will not stay at too great a sacrifice.

No school system can be continued on the present basis. We have radically changed the equipment of all fire departments and we shall as radically change our educational equipment. We have completely faced about in the national attitude toward good roads, and we shall as completely face about in our national attitude toward good schools.

American schools are not going to be less efficient than the times demand. No schoolhouses will be permanently closed. Teachers will be more and not less well prepared.

I have lived through the changes in fire departments and have seen the coming of national highways, north and south and east and west. While education has been my major interest I have had my place in good roads conventions and on national fire department programs. I have taken my share of abuse because I championed a new hose house, a new fire engine, and better pay for firemen, and the only real personal danger I ever experienced was because of a successful campaign to do away with the system of letting men work out their taxes on the highway.

Schools and Roads

Good schools are of infinitely greater importance than good roads, and yet a Congress that provided millions for good highways will not look squarely in the face a proposition of vastly greater importance and almost negligible financial requirement.

Why? Because Congress is listening to men who in education are where their fathers were on the road proposition fifty years ago. When I hear the opposition to Federal aid to education I think I am back fifty years because the arguments sound precisely like those of the men who got so frantic because they could not pay their taxes by filling in a mud hole or two in front of their own house.

If you want a good highway the county will make an appropriation, and the state will make an appropriation, and the Federal Government will make a big appropriation. But it is an entirely different proposition when you want a good educational highway to a real Democracy.

No Democracy equal to the new demands can be based on any education of today, any more than you can have a fire department to deal with a fifty-story office building on the basis of a fire department provided for five-story buildings.

You can no more have teachers equipped for the school work of the next decade on the basis of salaries of this decade than you can estimate the cost of motor power by the price of gasoline five years ago.

The politician who listens to the tax-dodging, tax-whining voter is on the road to the political infirmary, or possibly the nursery for civic imbeciles.

The Indispensable Element

Education is the one thing that is absolutely indispensable in the New Democracy. It must be as new as the Democracy is new. It must not only keep pace with the fire department, the police department, the street department, the health department, it must lead them all in public attention, in public support, in public appreciation, in finance and in statesmanship.

The immediate need is the enlistment of enough young people to prepare for teaching with the assumption that the salaries will be adequate.

Yet salaries alone will not be adequate inducement because of the tradition, which cannot be eliminated, that all salaries must be the same for the same service. This makes it impossible to compete with the commercial world which picks those whom it regards as prizes.

The appeal for teaching as service will attract some and they will be of great value. But we need too many for that to be adequate. We need nearly 100,000 new teachers a year, and there are other appeals to those who desire to serve. The Red Cross, the Junior Red Cross, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Young Men's Christian Association, Community Service and innumerable other callings compete with teaching.

The Problem of Preparation

The great handicap is the expense in time and money for preparation. Not many girls at graduation from the high school really expect to stick to anything for life. A girl can become a nurse and be at no expense; she can equip herself to begin as a stenographer in a few months and improve in speed and accuracy and increase her salary as fast as she increases her ability. Personally, I am satisfied that the problem of teacher preparation is the really great problem.

There are several real solutions. First. Show that teaching is a good stepping-stone to almost anything. Of course sentimentalists object to that. Theoretically, none of us want teaching to be a stepping-stone, but it is an open question whether ninety per cent. teachers in the system four years each are not better for the profession than sixty per cent. teachers each for forty years.

Second. We can change our present scheme of teacher preparation, select the brilliant girls in the graduation class and prepare them for teaching in less time than is required for others. Or we can let some brilliant girls leave the high school a year early, just as Harvard allows a young man who is to take the law or medical course to do his undergraduate work in three years, so that any one can take the four years in both courses in seven years. This would be attractive.

Or, as in the University of Wisconsin, the high school students can take a correspondence course in teacher preparation while in the high school and get a certificate without residence study. This has many objections, but would meet the emergency.

Or, the state can subsidize them by granting a scholarship to be applied on their living expenses while in the Normal School, as is done in Maryland.

SCENE FROM THE MARIETTA COLLEGE PAGEANT

Rev. Manasseh Cutler introducing the first minister and teacher of the Marietta Colony to Gen. Rufus Putnam

The Marietta Pageant

A Pilgrim Tercentenary Celebration

The founders of Marietta were true children of the Pilgrims. They set out from New England with the same ideals which inspired the Fathers who left the shores of Old England for the New World. The boat which brought the first company down the Ohio to the junction of that river with the Muskingum, where the first settlement in the Northwest Territory was made, they christened the Mayflower of the West.

It was fitting therefore that Marietta, which was perhaps the first American community to stage a pageant, should be one of the first to celebrate in formal fashion the tercentenary of the Landing of the Pilgrims.

The Pilgrim college and the Pilgrim church each thought at about the same moment of inaugurating plans for the fitting celebration of the great anniversary. They decided to join forces and as they worked the project gradually expanded into a community affair. The services of the expert pageant-maker, Mr. William Chauncy Langdon of New York, were secured and he wrote a pageant-play which followed closely the historical events, using in many parts of the dialogue the exact words of those who were impersonated. Special music was composed by Mr. Francis Macmillan, the violinist, a Marietta boy, the themes being derived from "Time-honored Marietta," "The Breaking Waves Dashed High," and "O God, Our Help in Ages Past." The setting was the beautiful city park which extends along the Muskingum River, and in the background was the stately Pilgrim Church, out of which the symbolic figures issued.

The pageant consisted of five parts. First came a prologue, during which the symbolic figure of Marietta came from the church carrying the torch of Learning and Inspiration. She was accompanied by the Spirits of the Wilderness and to greet her came Gov. John Carver and Gen. Rufus Putnam, as she voiced the theme of the pageant, the coming of the Pilgrims to New England and to Marietta. The first two scenes which followed the Prologue treated of the life of the Pilgrim Fathers and took up first Cape God and the Compact and then Plymouth and the inauguration of organized life in New England. Then came the interlude, in the midst of which the audience joined with the Pilgrim group in singing "O God, Our Help in Ages Past." Then followed two scenes from Marietta history, the coming of the second Mayflower and the establishment of civil government and religious and educational institutions in Marietta under Gov. Arthur St. Clair. The pageant closed with an Epilogue in which Marietta with her attendants appeared again and as, facing the church, she said:

"America, where'er thou art we live!
Where'er we go there may thy spirit lead!"

the figure of America came from the central door of the church, clad in white with a golden liberty cap and golden girdle, carrying the Stars and Stripes and wearing the shield of the United States. She was followed by the figure of the State of Ohio in blue with blue girdle and fillet and carrying the state flag. As they appeared the sun burst through the late afternoon shadows of the elms and brilliantly illuminated the figures, and it was with deep feeling that audience and Pilgrims and pioneers sang together, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee."

The celebration was a real community matter and being a part, too, of the commencement work of the college, it united town and college in a most inspiring undertaking. It enlisted the interest of the patriotic organizations and many of the leading citizens—judges, ministers, professors, business men—took part in it. A touch of added picturesqueness was given by the elaborate costumes of the Order of Red Men and the Daughters of Pocahontas who took the Indian parts. Out of the treasure chests of the old families came many quaintly interesting costumes which gave a touch of vivid realism.

All this success was not won without hard work and much of it, but it was abundantly worth while to unite and labor in stirring a new community interest in such a theme.

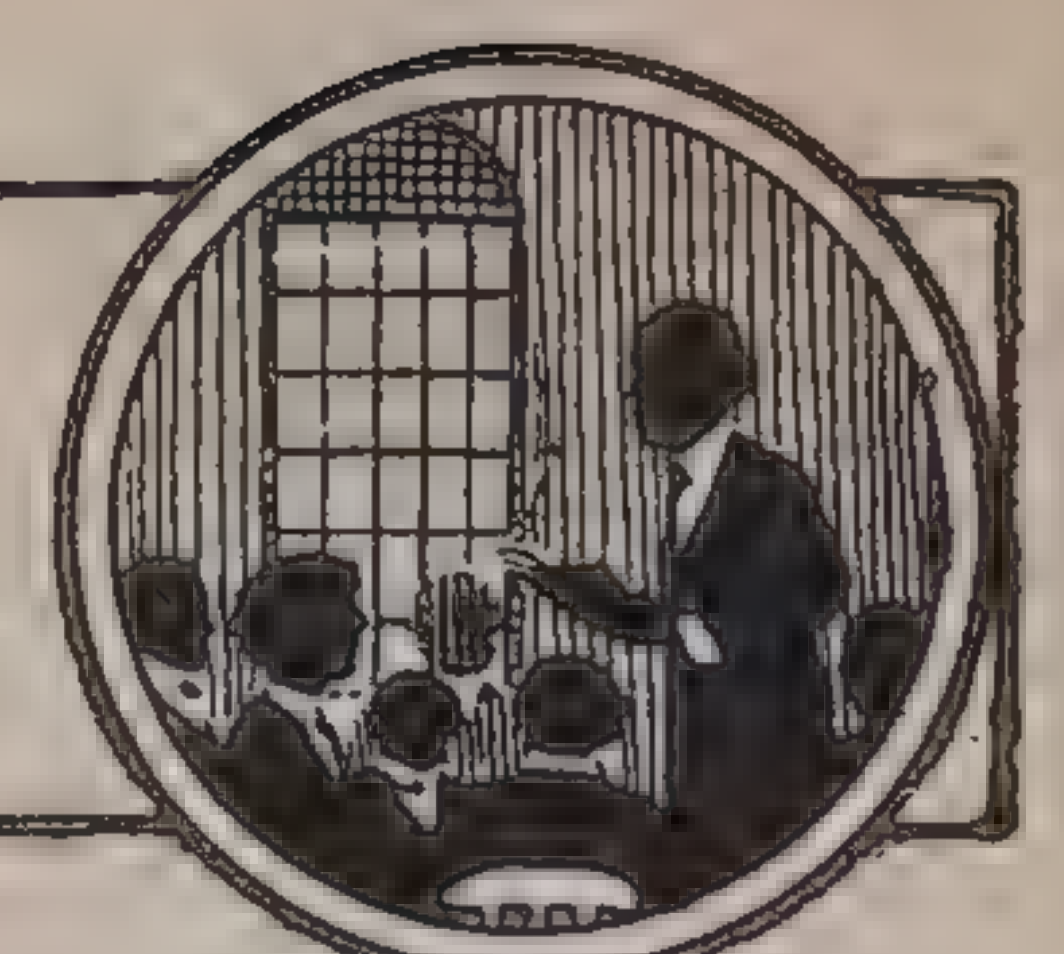
En Route to Japan for Music, Pageantry and Art

Prof. H. Augustine Smith, head of the department of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University, left Boston July 5 for Chicago, Seattle and Japan. He will be gone until the middle of November. During his three months' stay in Japan, Professor Smith will organize a thousand native Japanese adults and children to take part in pageants and another thousand to sing such choruses as Handel's "Hallelujah," Gounod's "Unfold, Ye Portals," and Lynes' "Lift Up Your Heads." Special costumes and lighting will be worked out by native artists and electricians on plans to be submitted by Professor Smith. Since boys and girls do not rehearse together in Japan and children never with adults, daily rehearsals of small groups will be the order of the day. All pageants and giant choruses are being worked out for the World's Sunday School Convention which convenes at Tokyo Oct. 5–14. The Emperor has given 50,000 yen to the fund. Nearly 1,000 delegates will go from the United States. A feature of the trans-Pacific trip will be daily rehearsals on the boats both of music and pageantry. Professor Smith will be accompanied by his wife who is the pianist and soprano soloist for convention sessions and concerts and who will also take leading parts in some of the pageants.

Professor and Mrs. Smith will tour the empire, singing, speaking and dramatizing in the interests of better music, better art, better pageantry. They sail from Seattle, July 30, on the Fushimi Maru, going the northern route, and will return on the Columbia by way of the Hawaiian Islands. Professor Smith has just prepared a service of worship and song for World's Sunday, Oct. 10, which is now being translated into many languages for use on the above date all over the world.

IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL



DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

The Kingly Kindness of David

International Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 8. 2 Sam. 8:15; 9:1-13.

1. Regal Justice. The first picture that we have of David as the king of united Israel is given in 8:15. He executes justice and righteousness "unto all the people." This is the mark of a noble character and true king. Every government ought to be grounded deeply in justice and truth. The executives of the will of the people ought to carry out righteous principles. A democracy demands justice as much as a kingdom or empire. In what ways are similar courses of action expected now in the United States from our elected rulers?

2. The Power of an Old Loyalty. David has become king of a united people. But he does not forget days when he had enemies and a kingdom seemed far away. Note the words "for Jonathan's sake." The old loyalty that we studied in the lesson for July 11 still remains in the heart of King David. He never could lose the grace of this friendship. Has personal loyalty a similar power now? Give a concrete example. Do we tend to forget old friends and promises when we grow rich and strong? What does this indicate as to our character?

3. A Faithful Servant. Old Ziba must have been an interesting and lovable man. Imagine him with his long beard and venerable look. He must have been a loyal soul also for he had given himself in full devotion to the needs of Jonathan's crippled son, Mephibosheth. The boy was perhaps afflicted with club-foot; or in some way he was hopelessly lamed. And Ziba had taken care of him, both when his father was living and now that the house of Saul was defeated and disgraced. What are the admirable points in such a character as this? Name at least three.

4. A "Dead Dog." Now the lame son of Jonathan is brought face to face with his father's old friend. It is strictly according to the custom of the time that he should speak of himself to King David as a "dead dog." Dogs were a pest in Oriental cities; a dead dog was the symbol of something undesirable and worthless. Mephibosheth meant only to express his sense of unworthiness in the presence of the king's kindness. Does this indicate an admirable character in Mephibosheth? What name would you give to it?

5. The Guest at the King's Table. It would have been easy for David to restore the land and the servants which would have belonged to a son of Jonathan had all gone well with his fortunes. And David did this, fully and freely. But now he added the personal touch and gave a new and added sign of his favor. He made Mephibosheth his perpetual guest at his own table. That brought the personal factor into the transaction and made the act of kindness something more than an official deed. For all acts become gracious and beautiful according to the amount of personal contact and affection that are put into them. Discuss this principle in relation to charitable work or the activities of the church in the community. To write a check for an appealing cause is not difficult; but to give yourself to the cause involves something far more important. A man may support the church and attend its services without involving any real gift; but to assume a piece of definite Christian activity by which the Church will perform its religious function in the community and put himself into it makes a far greater demand and becomes immensely more valuable.

6. Mercy Consecrating Justice. Close the study with a discussion of the way in which justice is truly ennobled and given meaning by kindness. All the great truths from which we act habitually are made up of apparent contradictions. There is no essential conflict between justice and mercy. Each is necessary to the full expression of the other. Christians must be kind. The world needs kindness, for every one is fighting a hard battle in some way. How can we work out a better relation between justice and mercy this week?

A Young Woman's Attitude

On this page last week was an article which gave the statement of the religious convictions of a young man. This week's article gives an equally frank statement from a young woman in her senior year in college. Many of her conclusions have been omitted and those given are abbreviated in order to give space for the approach to her statement. The approach reveals her attitude toward God and life, which is of far more importance at this age than definite conclusions:

"It is little wonder when we consider the vast amount of intellectual development which has taken place from infancy to maturity that the average college woman finds herself unable to make the old ideals of religion conform to the new ideas of life which she has gained through her studies. One reason for this is the fact that her religious training has not received the same thought and care as her secular training.

"Too often the student comes to college with the same idea of religious matters that she had gained in her first years at Sunday school. It is absolutely impossible to fit them entirely into her present life and the result is that she drifts more and more toward atheism. But seldom does she become an atheist if her early religious training has been anything at all. While she may grope around trying to adjust her religion and education in their true relation she clings with pathetic faith to the beliefs of childhood.

"I have found it thus in my own case. At first I could not find a logical basis for the things I was taught to believe and for that reason I felt at times that I must give them up. But further reasoning would not allow me to do that. I noticed that the kind of people I liked best and admired most were those who were truly religious. The books that were the most enjoyable and represented the best in life were those in which religious ideals had a place. And then there was something within me that clung to this faith in Christianity. It was what I wanted in life. If I let it go, all that was beautiful and worth while in this world would vanish for me. Nothing would matter then.

"Yet I would ask myself, 'What right have I to believe in such a creator other than the reason that I wanted to believe in him?' Naturally my earlier religious beliefs were narrow and I wanted something to replace them which would be as comforting and still have a logical foundation; for now I could not rest on faith alone. At first I felt almost guilty that I should even question these sacred things. But surely if they are genuine they will stand any test to which they might be put and if they are not genuine it is best that they be discarded.

"It is hard to overestimate the value derived from actually facing these problems and feeling the necessity of working them out from a purely logical standpoint, weighing all evidence for and against and finding the preponderance of evidence to be on the side of the thing you really want.

"I am about to close my four years' college career. I have gained many valuable things during the course of this career, but the most valuable to me is the forming of a definite religious creed which I believe will determine the course of my life more than anything else. Doubtless this creed will undergo changes during the remaining lifetime, yet I believe the fundamental principles will remain the same.

"1. I believe in a God. First, because I want to believe in a God and I can find no logical proof that he does not exist and we certainly have a right to believe what we want to believe, other things being equal. Second, life is full of things which point to the existence of some supreme being. Man seems to have been born with the consciousness of a higher power and the desire to reverence and worship it. The closer one comes in contact with nature the more he is convinced that a divine creator exists.

"To me this God is a personal God of divine power and wisdom, loving and forgiving.

"2. I believe in the immortality of the soul or personality. Exactly what the future life is I do not know nor am I greatly concerned about it. But death cannot end all. God would not have spent centuries to develop a being similar to himself only that he might fill a grave. Nor is it probable that a loving God would implant this innate desire for immortality in the hearts of men only to deny it to them. The more we learn of life and humanity the more we are convinced that human personality like divine personality is immortal.

"And lastly, I believe Christian service to be the most vital part of a Christian life. To express our religious convictions in our every act be it great or small, is the real important thing after all."

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

Walking with God

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for August 1-7

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Passage. Psalm 116.

Where Is God Going? The suggestion of the subject is that God is going somewhere. The Psalm pledges the singer to walk before God. But if we go back to the earliest servants of God of whom we have Biblical account we shall find that Enoch and Noah walked with God. We have had more than was good for us of a thought of God as standing still outside the sphere of our activities while we paraded and worked before him. That is not Christ's thought of his Father and ours. The God of Jesus is an attentive, active God who is doing something and who calls us to work with him. The parables are pictures of such co-operative engagements and activities. God is accomplishing something in our world and uses us as his helpers. In the progress of the ages he is going somewhere and we are called to walk with him. If we think of life as a pilgrimage, we are never at any moment or in any peril away from the companionship of God. It is another figure, where all our thinking must be in figures, of the ever-present Spirit of God.

Does He Want Our Companionship? God's invitation is the all-sufficient answer to this question. The whole New Testament is a record of that revelation in Christ which comes to us as invitation. One proof of it is in the call to witness which rings through his utterances to the disciples as he was about to leave them. That is the good news—that God loves and wants us. And it is our business as a church and as individuals to get that invitation home to the attention, the need and the desire of the people. We must show them, so far as it is possible in our own lives, what are the results, in faith and simplicity and sympathy, of walking with God. We are not all fitted to be preachers or even evangelists though we need not be so dumb as we often are. But we can all let our light shine, if it has once been lighted in our hearts. The churches have an uneasy sense that they are not doing their duty by the community. They are half disposed to accept the cry which we hear on every hand that they are failures. But there has been no failure if they hold in their community that reputation for honor and honesty and peace and quiet living which made the authorities of Leyden hold up the life of the Pilgrim Church as an example to others. Men will find it out if we are walking with God.

How Shall We Know His Way? We none of us have a map or a horoscope, such as the old fortune tellers used to provide. But we do not need one if we have a guide. This is our security, which we too often forget, that we are walking on in God's companionship through a country which we do not know but which he knows perfectly. I had rather have God's company than a map. And I do not expect or even desire that he should inform me about more than the next few steps ahead. The spirit of Newman's hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," is the true spirit of every one who deliberately chooses to walk with God upon his way.

REMEMBERING GOD

For I will remember thy works of old. I will meditate also upon all thy work and muse on thy doings.—Ps. 77:11.

What had he forgotten from his calculations? Only God!—Joseph Parker.

There is a strange deep saying of the Old Testament in which a psalmist charges the Hebrew people with limiting the Holy One of Israel. We limit God when we think meanly of him and teach men an impoverished doctrine of his grace. We limit God when we will not keep his commandments and do his will. We limit God by every act of rebellion which blocks his way. But there is one way in which we limit God most effectually of all. That way is by our prayerlessness.—W. M. Clow.

O Lord, seek us, O Lord, find us
  In thy patient care;
Be thy love before, behind us,
  Round us everywhere;
Lest the god of this world blind us,
  Lest he speak us fair,
Lest he forge a chain to bind us,
  Lest he bait a snare.
Turn not from us, call to mind us,
  Find, embrace us, bear;
Be thy love before, behind us,
  Round us everywhere.
—Christina Rossetti.

It is well if life's graver crises bring us face to face with God.—Alexander Ramsey.

We rejoice so much in the gift that we lose sense of the Giver, and when the temporal gift ceases, our hearts are forlorn, though the eternal Giver remains.—Cleland B. McAfee.

The condition of our security is close contact with Jesus Christ. If we knew the facts of life, the temptations that ring us round, the weakness of these wayward wills of ours, and the strength of this intrusive and masterful flesh and sense that we have to rule, we should know and feel that our only safety is our Master's presence.—Alexander MacLaren.

Lord, our desire and confidence is in thy good and holy will toward us, that we may be thy children indeed, serving thee in faith and confidence all the days of our pilgrimage. We thank thee that thou lovest us. Let it be the joy of our awaking in the morning and the peace on our pillow at night. May we remember it in trial and temptation with the glow of an answering affection which shall enable us to overcome and to endure. Keep us from forgetting thy commandments or desiring what thou in thy loving mercy hast denied to us. And may the joy of thy fellowship be shown forth in our lives as we love thee with all our hearts and our neighbor as ourself. In the name of Christ. Amen.
—Isaac Ogden Rankin.

Recreation that Re-creates

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Aug. 8-14

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Problems of Recreation in Our Community. Rom. 14:7, 13-19.

Light from the Bible Passage

Responsibility is the big thought in these verses. Verse 7 very simply puts it that in everything we are responsible to the Lord. No one can say, My life is my own and I can do with it as I choose. His use of it should be such that God will commend it. Not only are we morally responsible to God; we are also responsible for one another. As far as in us lies we should keep the feet of the weak from stumbling. Because we can do certain things and not stumble ourselves is not sufficient. Personal rights may have to be waived if in our claiming them we cause others to fall. It is a terrible thing to undo God's work in another's soul by our insistence on our maintaining our own personal liberty. If mutual responsibility is the first thought, mutual edification is the second.

Leads for Leaders

Of course this topic is seasonable; it is also highly reasonable. Amusement and recreation are not only possible but very desirable. The important question is, What kind?

Some suggestions for study and comment:

1. Is it possible to overwork the personal liberty argument? Is there something bigger than that?
2. If the Kingdom of God is the great thing, how can we fit our ideas of recreation into it? Can we play "to the glory of God?" Or is it a thing entirely apart from religion?
3. Do we lead or follow the lead in the choice of recreations prevalent here?
4. Could not a more definite relation be established between this Society and the work of the Boy Scouts and Camp Fire Girls?
5. If your community permits Sunday sports shall the Endeavor Society do anything more than criticize? As young people can we help to steer things rightly?
6. Do we consider enough "the other fellow" in choosing our type of recreation? Especially, when he may be a newcomer to our land?

Thoughts for Members

Your "good" may easily become another's "ill."

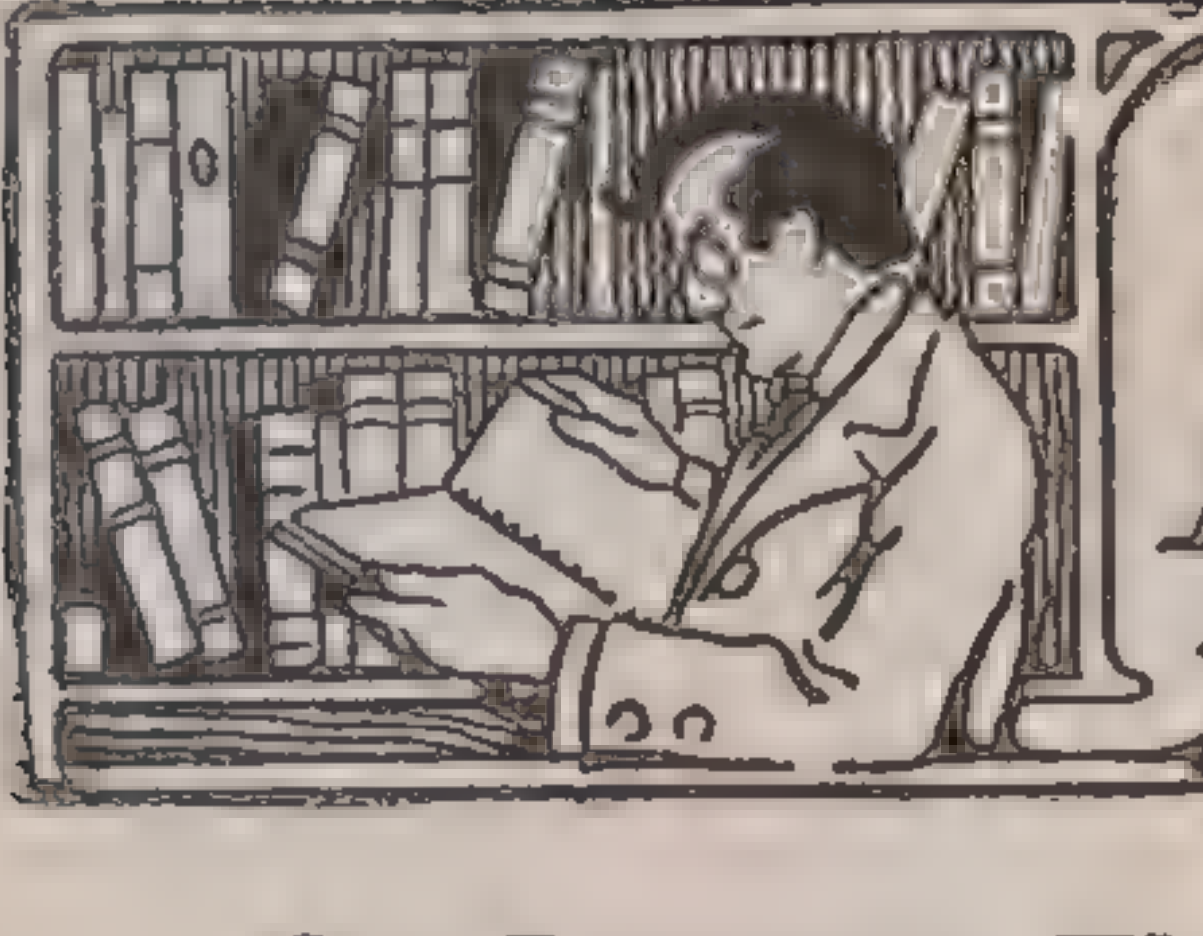
We can often run with ease and safety where others stumble and fall.

The recreation spirit in the community should be created by the best and not the worst elements of the place.

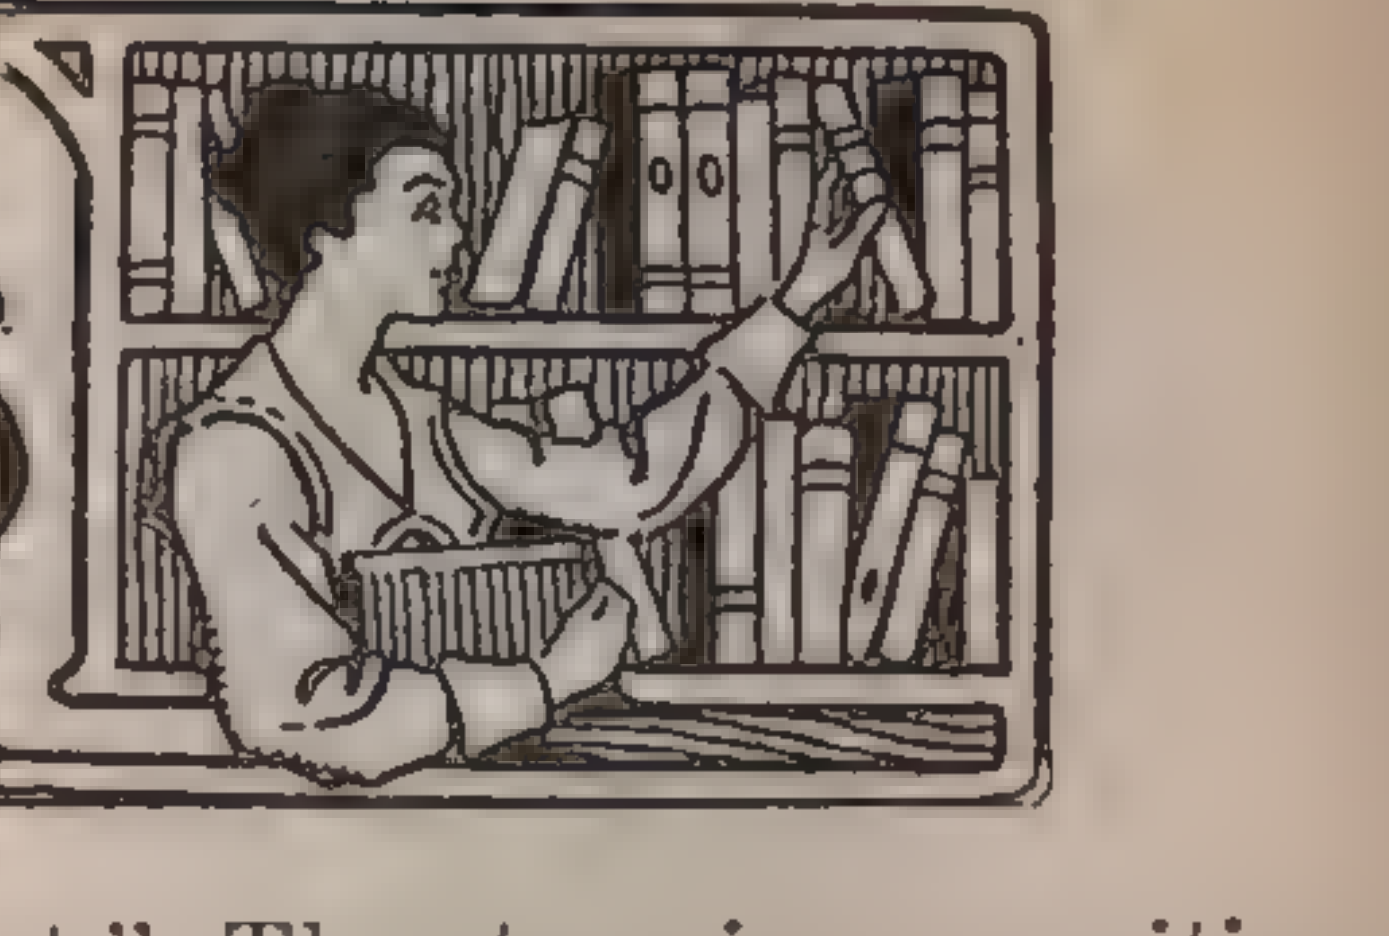
That "other one," whose welfare is our concern is also one for whom Christ died.

A Moment of Prayer

With all the privileges thou dost grant us, O Father, send also such holy consideration of the weaker souls of others that we may wisely and Christianly use these gifts. Through these may it be that thy Kingdom will come not alone to me but to all whose lives receive an impulse from mine. Amen.



AMONG THE NEW BOOKS



On Literary Themes

The Learned Lady in England, 1650—1760, by Myra Reynolds (Houghton Mifflin). A study of the women of England during the period from the accession of Charles II. to that of George III., when Jeremy Taylor, Isaac Walton, Dryden, Swift, Addison and Steele, Pope, Richardson, Fielding, De Foe and Hume were some of the men contemporaries. It was also the period of Puritan migration to the United States. By "learned," the author means those "whose interests were intellectual, whose chosen pursuits had to do with books and things of the mind, and who were demanding a new freedom of self-expression, new training and new opportunities." To this period belongs Mrs. Behn, "the first English woman to write definitely for money," Mrs. Haywood and Mrs. Manley writing fiction, and Mrs. Blackwell "doing superb botanical work." Among the best known women of the period are Lady Fanshawe, Lady Mary Montagu, the Duchess of Newcastle, and Mrs. Makin who wrote on the education of women. A very interesting chapter is entitled, "Miscellaneous Books on Women."

Arthur Hugh Clough, by James Insley Osborne (Houghton Mifflin). Mr. Lowell once declared that this English poet "will be thought a hundred years hence to have been the truest expression in verse of the moral and intellectual tendencies, the doubt and struggle towards settled convictions, of the period in which he lived." Mr. Osborne in his excellent biography reveals the experiences which thus found voice. In school Clough was a favorite pupil of Arnold and he left Rugby somewhat of a prig, "morally overtrained." He "learned too early to regulate and analyze his thoughts." When he entered Oxford it was to find the Oxford Movement in full swing, and he changed "from the least skeptical of schoolboys to the most speculative of college men," a not uncommon experience. He was greatly influenced by Carlyle, but declared, "Carlyle led us out into the Wilderness and left us there." Half the volume is devoted to Clough's poetry. "Amours de Voyage" is called Clough's "most carefully wrought poem;" The Bothie, "a poem of youth and illusion;" Dipsychus, "a work of disillusionment and maturity."

Satire in the Victorian Novel, by Frances Theresa Russell (Macmillan). A study of thirteen novelists, Peacock, Lytton, Disraeli, Gaskell, Thackeray, Dickens, Reade, Trollope, Brontë, Kingsley, Eliot, Meredith and Butler. The work is interesting as a thesis written for a doctor's degree, but it would be more useful if presented in a different arrangement.

How to Write Special Feature Articles, by Willard Grosvenor Bleyer (Houghton Mifflin). The author is Director of the Course in Journalism in the University of Wisconsin, and the volume is intended primarily for students of journalism, but it is full of practical advice which will be of value to any one who desires to write clearly and forcibly in a way to interest the public. Many illustrations are given to enforce the advice and the latter half of the book is devoted to well selected special feature articles from a wide range of newspapers and magazines.

The Lure of the Pen, by Flora Klickman (Putnams). A practical volume of advice "for would-be authors." It first emphasizes the importance of cultivating the powers of observation and the value of wide reading. Then under the heading, "Points a Writer Ought to Note," it deals with such matters as the choice of subject, style, local color, the method of presenting a story, some rules for story-writing, etc. The author is an experienced English magazine editor and evidently writes from long experience.

A Treasury of English Prose, by Logan Pearsall Smith (Houghton Mifflin). A choice collection of brief passages chosen from the masters of English style, from Chaucer, Walter Raleigh, Philip Sidney, to Emerson, Pater, Shaw and Santayana.

French Literature in the Great War, by Albert Schinz (Appleton). The author is Professor of French Literature in Smith College and his review of the poetry, plays, fiction, diaries, etc. of the war period is both instructive and interesting. No masterpiece has yet appeared, nor should be expected for years to come. But the mind and heart of France, in their varying emotions during the war, are well revealed in this review. It is interesting to find the philosophy of Bergson, "a philosophy of unmanly sentimentality," included among the influences "responsible for the dangerous apathy of France" before the war.

Moments with Mark Twain, selected by Albert Bigelow Paine (Harpers). It may fairly be claimed that Mark Twain's writings possess a unique vein of humor, for no other writer is like him. He was far from being simply a humorist. There was much sound common sense combined with most of his funmaking. This volume presents twenty-four chapters of selections from his writings, arranged chronologically. It is a delightful book to pick up and dip into when the problems of life are depressing.

Mystery Stories

That Affair at St. Peter's, by Edna A. Brown (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard). A delightful mystery story, with no gruesome scenes, though there are some anxious moments. A valuable communion service disappears from the church safe, taken apparently, on Sunday, either during or quickly after the morning service. How it happened and who was the culprit is a mystery which perplexes many people. A detective is called in, and there is a suspicion that the author is laughing quietly at the usual proceedings of the typical story detective.

The White Moll, by Frank L. Packard (Doran). Another of this author's peculiar type of detective stories. An attractive and capable young woman becomes, by force of circumstances, involved in a crime and compelled for a while to join a group of criminals. She goes through a series of startling adventures in which she is generally aided, just in the nick of time, by a man who calls himself "The Adventurer."

The Triple Mystery, by Adele Luehrman (Dodd, Mead). Within a week three Hungarian musicians die suddenly. In each case the attendant physicians say "heart failure." But circumstances lead to investigation and the conclusion that each was a case of murder. The quest for the criminal or criminals makes an exciting and perplexing story.

Follow the Little Pictures, by Alan Graham (Little, Brown). Somewhere in Scotland lay hidden treasure, once intended for Prince Charlie but afterward bequeathed by its owner "to him among his descendants who has the wit to seek it out." The story is an exciting account of the discovery of a key to the hiding place—a mysterious document which must be interpreted—and its final solution.

The Searchers, by John Foster (Doran). A group of Italian adventurers, who shrink not from murder to gain their ends, possess half an ancient document describing the location of a casket containing rare gems. They are bent on finding the other half, which the reader knows is in the keeping of a certain Scotchman. The contest is keen and the story thrilling.

The Mystery in the Ritsmore, by William Johnston (Little, Brown). The body of a young woman is found in the closet of a fashionable hotel. Suspicion falls upon various persons, and a private detective presents a plausible solution of the mystery, but another young woman takes the situation in hand and proves to be the better detective.

The Foot-Path Way, by Henry Milner Rideout (Duffield). A series of unusual and exciting stories of a group of characters in India, one of whom is a daring agent of the secret service. Love, adventure and mystery are features that run through all the pages.

During War-Time

The Great Menace, by George Whitefield Mead (Dodd, Mead). The menace is Bolshevism, the autocracy of a working-class minority, openly and avowedly hostile to our democratic institutions and commending armed violence in this country as a means to overthrowing the government. The remedy is to be found only in the promotion and practice of Christian principles of fair dealing. The unjust and oppressive employer is a promoter of Bolshevism as well as the red revolutionist. Only a Christianized social order can permanently overcome the revolution. The little volume is full of information concerning conditions in America.

Across the Blockade, by Henry Noel Brailsford (Harcourt, Brace & Howe). This is the record of the author's impressions of "blockaded Europe" during four months of travel a year ago. Hungary, Austria, Poland, the margin of Russia, and Germany are thus introduced. It argues that the League of Nations constitution ushers in a new age of imperialism.

Pierre and Joseph, by Rene Bazin (Harpers). Two Alsatian brothers at the beginning of the Great War join, one the French Army and the other the German. This story of their experiences gives admirable opportunity to set forth the difficulty of the Alsatian situation and also the great contrast between the French spirit in the war and the German spirit. There is but little of actual fighting in the story. Mainly it is a clever and interesting study of the psychology of the situation.

First Reflections on the Campaign of 1918, by Major R. M. Johnston (Holt). This little book of constructive criticism by a military expert, who was at General Pershing's Headquarters for more than twelve months, is welcome. Its fundamental criticism, that American lives were wasted because of our unpreparedness will probably fall on deaf ears. Still, he recommends for the United States "a comparatively small force of extremely high efficiency," with a small reserve force of "low-power troops who would be immediately available in an emergency."

WITH THE CHILDREN

China's Great Opportunity

By Janet L. Savage

Perhaps your first question would be, what kind of a person could have such a funny name as China? That wasn't all her name. The rest of it was Jones-Robinson. The name had been handed down to her as a sort of an heirloom, for it had come into the family before most people in her parents' position in life had such things as family names. China's parents had been the children of slaves and they had spent most of their lives on a big plantation in Georgia, later coming to Alabama to live. Here in a little log cabin, all covered in front with roses, China had first seen the world with her questioning eyes—big and brown they were too.

The family who owned the big plantation in Georgia was named Jones-Robinson and China's grandparents had been well treated by these white people; one of the ways in which they showed their thanks was to take their name. It is a responsibility to have a great name because one must live up to it, and China wanting to do it honor, longed for an education. Her heart yearned for books and the chance to study as the white children did, and deep down in that same little heart was the hope that some day she might become such a wonderful teacher that she could open a school herself and teach other little children whose lives were as dreary and empty as her own. But China wasn't a complaining child. She loved to walk in the fields, and often when the birds sang she would catch a note and begin to sing.

Today the little cabin looked very dreary in spite of all the roses that were climbing over the front. The rough picket fence had a stocking on each picket to dry, and pieces of linen and white clothes were spread out on the green grass to bleach in the sun. The clothes were pretty and China looked at them and then down at her own worn and faded calico. Even if she had money to pay for books, wasn't this the only good dress she owned? Wasn't there some way that a little girl, who worked long and hard in the cotton fields, might earn money to help out with an education?

Bones, a pup who had been rightly named, seeing his little mistress, crept up and began to rub his nose against her hand, trying to attract her attention. China remembering that she must carry back the washing when it was ironed, decided to have a walk down as far as the swamp and started off in that direction. Bones was at her heels, lazily following. The long swinging Spanish moss that hung from the oak trees made shadows on the ground before her, the birds sang in spite of the heat, but she noticed nothing. The swamp was finally reached and as she had been forbidden to go farther in this direction because of the dangers that might be met with there, she slowly turned to go back home.

She spied a bit of white between the waving sugar cane and wondering what it could be walked faster. Now she would see it and then it would quite disappear. What could it be? She made up her mind to go around the field and come out ahead of the shadow. Running along with Bones at her heels, tugging at her calico gown, she finally reached the opening of the field, to learn it was a lovely golden-haired child, the most beautiful she had ever seen. Her head, a mass of curls, was hatless, but she wore a lovely pale blue bow that filled China's heart with longing for one like it. Her white dress was touched up with small bows of the same color, and the little half-socks were tipped with blue, while the tiny feet had fine kid, low-cut shoes. China stared—and little Golden Locks stared. Neither one knew what to make of the other, but finally little Golden Locks spoke, "Take me home, please. I'se losted."

China questioned her and learned she was the granddaughter of Colonel Hewitt, for whom her father worked. Somewhere she had heard that this little girl was from the North and this was her first visit to the South. She thought she had better hurry and get her home before she was missed. Taking Golden Locks by the hand she started off toward the old white mansion, when, looking ahead she saw an ugly black moccasin uncoil himself from a large rock where he had been asleep in the sun. Now China was frightened. She knew this was one of the most deadly of all snakes. Picking up the child she ran back through the sugar cane and on up through the cotton field, which she had earlier crossed. How glad she was her back was strong. Panting with the heat and the weight of the little girl she went bravely on, brushing against briars and tall grass that would scratch her, until she was in front of her own cabin. She thought that never again would she call it, even in her mind, an ugly place, she was so glad to be back. She was almost worn out, but she carried her little burden into the cabin and only dropped her when her mother looked up from the board where she was ironing to ask where she had found the little white lady. China between long breaths told of meeting the snake in the field near the sugar cane and of her hasty flight to save the child and herself from death.

Mrs. Jones-Robinson turned pale under her dark skin, and said, "You sit right down here and rest yourself, child, and I will take the little lady up to Colonel Hewitt's." China was glad to drop in a chair and because she was so young, and so tired and warm, she began to weep silently. She cried first on this account and then she began to feel sorry for herself and she cried more loudly and at last because she could not go to school as white children did she shook with sobs. Between the sobs that shook her little body she took breath to be proud that her father wasn't lazy like some people she knew, and she took greater pride because the little cabin was their truly own, thanks to the hard work she and her mother and father had done picking cotton, but how she wished there

Dear Comrades:

Everything has its use, but I sometimes find it a "sticker" to know what it is.

Now there is the mosquito, for instance. Perhaps you have heard (of) such a creature. Possibly you have felt one. They have a very pretty song which you ought to hear if you never have had that privilege. Of course, it is not quite like that of a lark or the Wilson's thrush. There is not very much variation to it. Isn't it remarkable what a volume of music (?) they can put into a room in the wee small hours of the night when you are trying to go to sleep! One little "skeeter" can give you almost as much exercise in trying to catch him as a game of tennis. The chances for him to win are ever so much better than for you.

There is one thing, however, about the mosquito you may be glad to learn. You know Kipling says: "The female of the species is more deadly than the male." He was not thinking about our little "friend," but it is true just the same. We can congratulate ourselves that only half of the mosquitoes bite. The fact is, they tell us, that it is only the females that bite. (I hope our girl Comrades will not think I am making any harsh comparisons.)

They tell us, these wise ones, that the Northern mosquitoes do not carry diseases, such as malaria, like the Southern cousins. However that may be, I am glad that none of us have to entertain the whole family, relatives and all. It is hard enough to be agreeable to those we have with us now.

I read a clever little poem recently about mosquitoes. It really made them out to be quite respectable creatures, with a good many qualities we might well copy. I remember only this verse:

"One merit theirs quite often lacked
In acquaintance I might mention,
For even when they bore us most
They always get attention."

I should prefer, however, to have my attention secured some other way.

And now do you know what is the best time to kill a mosquito? I will answer that, if some of you do not, later.

Comrade Catherine Noyes of Newton Centre, Mass., has sent us in some odd names of people: "There are five people in our neighborhood whose names are: Mr. White, Mr. Gray, Mr. Green, Mr. Brown and Mr. Black. My father knows four doctors: Dr. Slaughter, Dr. Coffin, Dr. Pillsbury and Dr. Comfort. He knows a woman who before she was married was Wylde Rose, and who married a man whose name was Bull, so now she is Wylde Bull. There are two teachers in my school whose names are Miss Hale and Miss Hart. They are often called Hale and Hearty. There is a hardware company in New Haven, Ct., called Steele and Emery. There is a tailor here whose name is Taylor."

The editors of The Congregationalist (and the printer, too) are fine friends of ours. We have to keep on the good side of them. We must be careful of what we say. Still I should like to know what sort of a house it is that was advertised in the July 8th issue. The adv. said there are "eight roofs." Just what attraction "eight roofs" can be I am at a loss to know. We are all familiar, or ought to be, with Hawthorne's "House of Seven Gables." But the House of Eight Roofs! Sounds mysterious, doesn't it? I wonder if the printer made a mistake and if the adv. should not have read: "eight rooms."

Next week I plan to write about the most perfect light in the world.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

IMPRESSIVE SCENE ON BOSTON COMMON
Final tableau in "Pilgrims of the Old World and the New," written and directed by Dr. Mary Alice Emerson and given on the Common, July 5, 1920, under the auspices of the City of Boston.

Education Through Drama

Every day during the recent International Council dramatic scenes showing life in foreign lands were presented in Mechanics Building under the supervision of Miss Ruth Seabury of the Missionary Education Department. The young people of various Congregational churches of Greater Boston were the actors.

The Japanese scene, entitled "The Pilgrims," introduced a village father, his wife, his daughter, an elderly neighbor, and the neighbor's young son, returning wearily from Fujiyama. They approached a Shinto shrine and confided to the priest that they had made the pilgrimage to save the soul of an only son who was "called by Buddha before he was old enough to repeat the holy words of the sacred books." The Youth said aside, "No baby is going to be saved by a weary old woman climbing a hill. I believe that babies are saved any way. That is what the Bible says." The priest scorned the Bible and advised them to avoid new things which teach irreverence. The boy and the girl got into conversation about what they had learned from their English readers, especially about superstition and civilization being like buckets of a neighborhood well, when one goes up, the other goes down. The girl said she wanted to help her mother to get the new ideas of Christianity, and the youth concluded in an aside, "The priest up there believes that women have hearts and no brains. I doubt his wisdom." The scene not only showed Japanese customs, but vividly illustrated the powerful working of Truth through the young people, who are so surely "the hope of the world."

The African Episode, set at Inanda Seminary, was a transcript of Episode VII. in "The Gift of Light," a missionary pageant written by Anita B. Ferris for the Jubilee celebration of the Woman's Board of Missions in 1917. The characters were Mrs. Edwards, the first missionary sent out by the Board, Miss Fidelia Phelps, principal of the seminary, twenty or more Zulu students, a raw Zulu girl from a kraal and three graduates. This was a remarkable study in contrasts. The Princess Nomdehe brought the climax of testimony to the beauty of the "Jesus way." "I have taught as you have taught me, and because I knew all the life of the kraal I could teach other girls who came from a home like mine. In the village I save the lives of the poor babies who cut their upper teeth first and show the frightened mothers that no evil spirit dwells in them, and that it is wicked to drown their helpless little ones in the lake or throw them into the bush. I have told my people that there are no hungry ancestor spirits lurking in every wind, in every chance illness or accident, and that the evil witch doctor fools them."

Illuminating scenes in China, Turkey, India and other foreign missionary fields were portrayed. Two facts stood out above all others —the great need and the great promise. The challenge of the appalling blackness can be met in the spirit of the great hope resulting from the mighty works which God hath already wrought by his servants in the darkest regions.

Another form of education through drama was the civic pageant, "Pilgrims of the Old World and the New," given under the auspices of the City of Boston on Boston Common, July 5. Mr. Frank Christian Brown, Chairman of the Entertainment Committee, asked for a swift succession of historic scenes to commemorate the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims, and to form a fitting close to the patriotic celebration of the evening.

A platform, thirty-two feet square, which had been built into the Frog Pond for the use of the musicians and dancers of the earlier part of the program, was our stage. This was brilliantly lighted from above, and further illuminated by colored spot lights cast from the shore. Two large screens supplied the text necessary to the understanding of the seven scenes, as obviously the speeches could be heard by very few of the 100,000 people massed on the four sides of the pond around which we tried to play. D'Arino's Band furnished the music which was chiefly familiar hymns.

My problem was to stage the seven brief scenes so that they should have beauty and meaning enough to please an audience of all nationalities and creeds. In this attempt I was ably assisted by Mrs. Anna Spencer Frost, who besides impersonating America, helped to pose the groups, and by Miss Gladys Hale Russ who had the important part of Faith, whose encouraging appeal at the crisis of every scene decided for victory. History was played by Miss Grace Sue Nies of Boston University and Prophecy by Miss Grace Brown.

The plan was as follows:

Prologue. Vision instructs Faith as to what she may expect of the Pilgrims of the Old World and the New, commissions History and Prophecy, and challenges America to be worthy of her high destiny.

EPISODE I. The Persecution in England (showing the arrest of William Brewster, but the triumphant pledge, "We will obey God rather than man").

EPISODE II. The Exiles in Holland (showing the Englishmen begging John Robinson to go to America as their leader, the Dutch begging him to stay, and the decision, "There is still greater freedom in the land beyond the sea").

EPISODE III. The Signing of the Compact (showing Governor Carver persuading his companions in the Mayflower to sign the document that is given them, "Peace and safety through an orderly government").

EPISODE IV. The Landing on Plymouth Rock (showing the Pilgrims landing in spite of the opposition of Neptune, since "brave hearts are not daunted by material obstacles").

EPISODE V. The Night Attack (showing the warning of the Indian Princess, and the support of the friendly Indians, and proving the truth that "true men know one another however they may meet").

EPISODE VI. The Founding of Harvard College (showing John Harvard passing over his £750 to "promote the education of Christian manhood").

EPISODE VII. America's Greeting to the Pilgrims of the Future (showing America, supported by Law, Education, Religion, the Army and the Navy, greeting the Pilgrims of all nations; and Old Boston commissioning New Boston to hold to the ideals of his Pilgrim ancestors).

The unifying effect of a big idea was shown in many ways. When the audience joined the actors in singing "America the Beautiful," at the close in one small group near the Mayor's seat, Americans originally from seven different European countries joined with full-throated fervor. When Faith triumphed in one of the strong crises, an aged minister said, "Faith is the victory that overcomes the world," while his neighbor's version was, "You said it. Faith's a mighty good thing to hold to, when you're down and out." Strange to say, it was not the skirmish with the Indians, or the gambols of Neptune that interested even the children most, but the scenes in which sedate Pilgrims and dignified America figured. The familiar facts of history came back with new force when acted out before them.

News from School and College

Drury Raises Endowment Fund

Drury's 47th year came to a close on June 2 with a song of victory. The enrollment of students in regular academic work has been the largest in the history of the institution, and a spirit of confirmed hopefulness has been in the atmosphere.

Early in the year a campaign was organized to raise $700,000, thus bringing the total endowment to a million. Within a week of commencement it was not known whether the terms of the General Education Board's offer of $200,000 had been met, but when at last assurance of this fact was received, "we were like unto them that dream. Then was our mouth filled with laughter and our tongue with singing," and on all lips were the words, "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad." The long struggle for a stable economic basis for Drury was won.

Credit for this really great achievement is due chiefly to two men—Mr. C. H. Cole, Chairman of the Board of Trustees, whose business sagacity and unstinted devotion have been beyond words, and Pres. T. W. Nadal, whose dauntless faith and statesmanlike grasp of the situation, coupled with a self-effacing modesty, have given courage and determination to all the workers. Perhaps the distinguishing feature of the campaign was the enthusiastic support of the host of friends who have thrown themselves into it—from Hon. H. M. Beardsley who is largely responsible for Kansas City's $125,000, to the old soldier who came unsolicited into the office of one of our Springfield trustees and from his monthly pension subscribed $15. Students, former students, alumni, friends near and far—all and all together have made the result possible.

Not much in the way of immediate expansion is to be done. The first thought of the president and trustees is to provide a substantial increase in salary for members of the faculty who have been living with more economy than comfort; and new and needed departments are to be added as the income of the college may allow. The key to the commencement spirit was struck in the baccalaureate sermon by the president on "The Divine Proprietorship"—the text being "The Earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof; the world and they that dwell therein"—a very stimulating and fresh discussion.

The college was blessed, as the trustees were inspired, by the presence of Mr. C. E. Harwood, now of Upland, Cal., in whose parlor the college was organized in 1873, who has served continuously as a trustee, and, who, in his 90th year, keen and alert, came to the annual meeting of the trustees, and went on to Williams College for the 68th anniversary of his graduation. As part of his contribution to the campaign, he established the Harwood Lectureship which is to be filled each year by some distinguished scholar who is to be for a month a member of the faculty.

The graduating class numbered 44, of whom 17 are young men. Five honorary degrees were awarded—Master of Arts to Mr. Rudyard S. Uzzell of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Doctor of Letters to Principals G. Byron Smith of Iberia Academy and George W. Shaw of Kidder Institute, men who for more than a quarter of a century have made the Christian Academy a force in secondary education in Missouri; Doctor of Laws to Judge John T. Sturgis of the class of 1886, who as presiding Justice of the Springfield Court of Appeals, has set a high standard of judicial worth and efficiency; and Mr. Francis K. Ball, of the class of 1887, the literary critic for Ginn & Company, whose address on Commencement Day discussed in searching fashion the question, "What is the College for?"

The outlook for the college under the inspiring leadership of President Nadal is altogether encouraging. Now that he is in a measure free from the drudgery of the financial agent, he plans to devote his energy and thought in part to the upbuilding of the educational work of the college, and it is his ambition to do some teaching for at least one semester each year. Hearty applause greeted the announcement that the trustees had decided to have his formal inauguration in the fall. A. P. H.

DISTINGUISHED OFFICIALS RECEIVE DEGREES AT COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

Beloit Going Strong

Following Dr. Bridgman's recent article, "New England in Wisconsin," where he shows the far-reaching pioneer part played by Beloit College in the building of the Middle West, it will be of interest to thousands to learn that Mr. John D. Rockefeller, through the General Education Board, has just made a grant to the college of $300,000, conditioned on the raising by the institution of $600,000 more for the necessary increase of equipment and salaries.

This announcement by President Brannan at Commencement on June 22 was greeted with applause. But even in the presence of this, the largest gift Beloit has ever received, the high spot of her graduating days was reached later in the same hour. It was the spirit of two generations of the fathers, rugged men of Wisconsin, who had sacrificed and prayed for Beloit as for a member of the family—which rolled up in song from the citizen multitude, from the ranks of cap and gown, of faculty, trustees and chorus:

> Before the hills in order stood
> Or earth received her frame,
> From everlasting thou art God,
> To endless years the same.

And as one saw how many were singing from memory he murmured, "It's the same old Beloit!"

In the graduating address Dr. Gunsaulus furnished the high spot mentioned. His subject was, "The Education of an American." The typical American was described as a man who will sacrifice everything to win his soul. Such was Abraham, such Columbus and such Joan of Arc, Bradford, Brewster and Whitman. Like them the typical American has always been ready to "go forth into a land which he knew not." To win personality, to draw with Christ from the deep well-springs which feed the inner life, "this is education, this is Christian education, this is American education!"

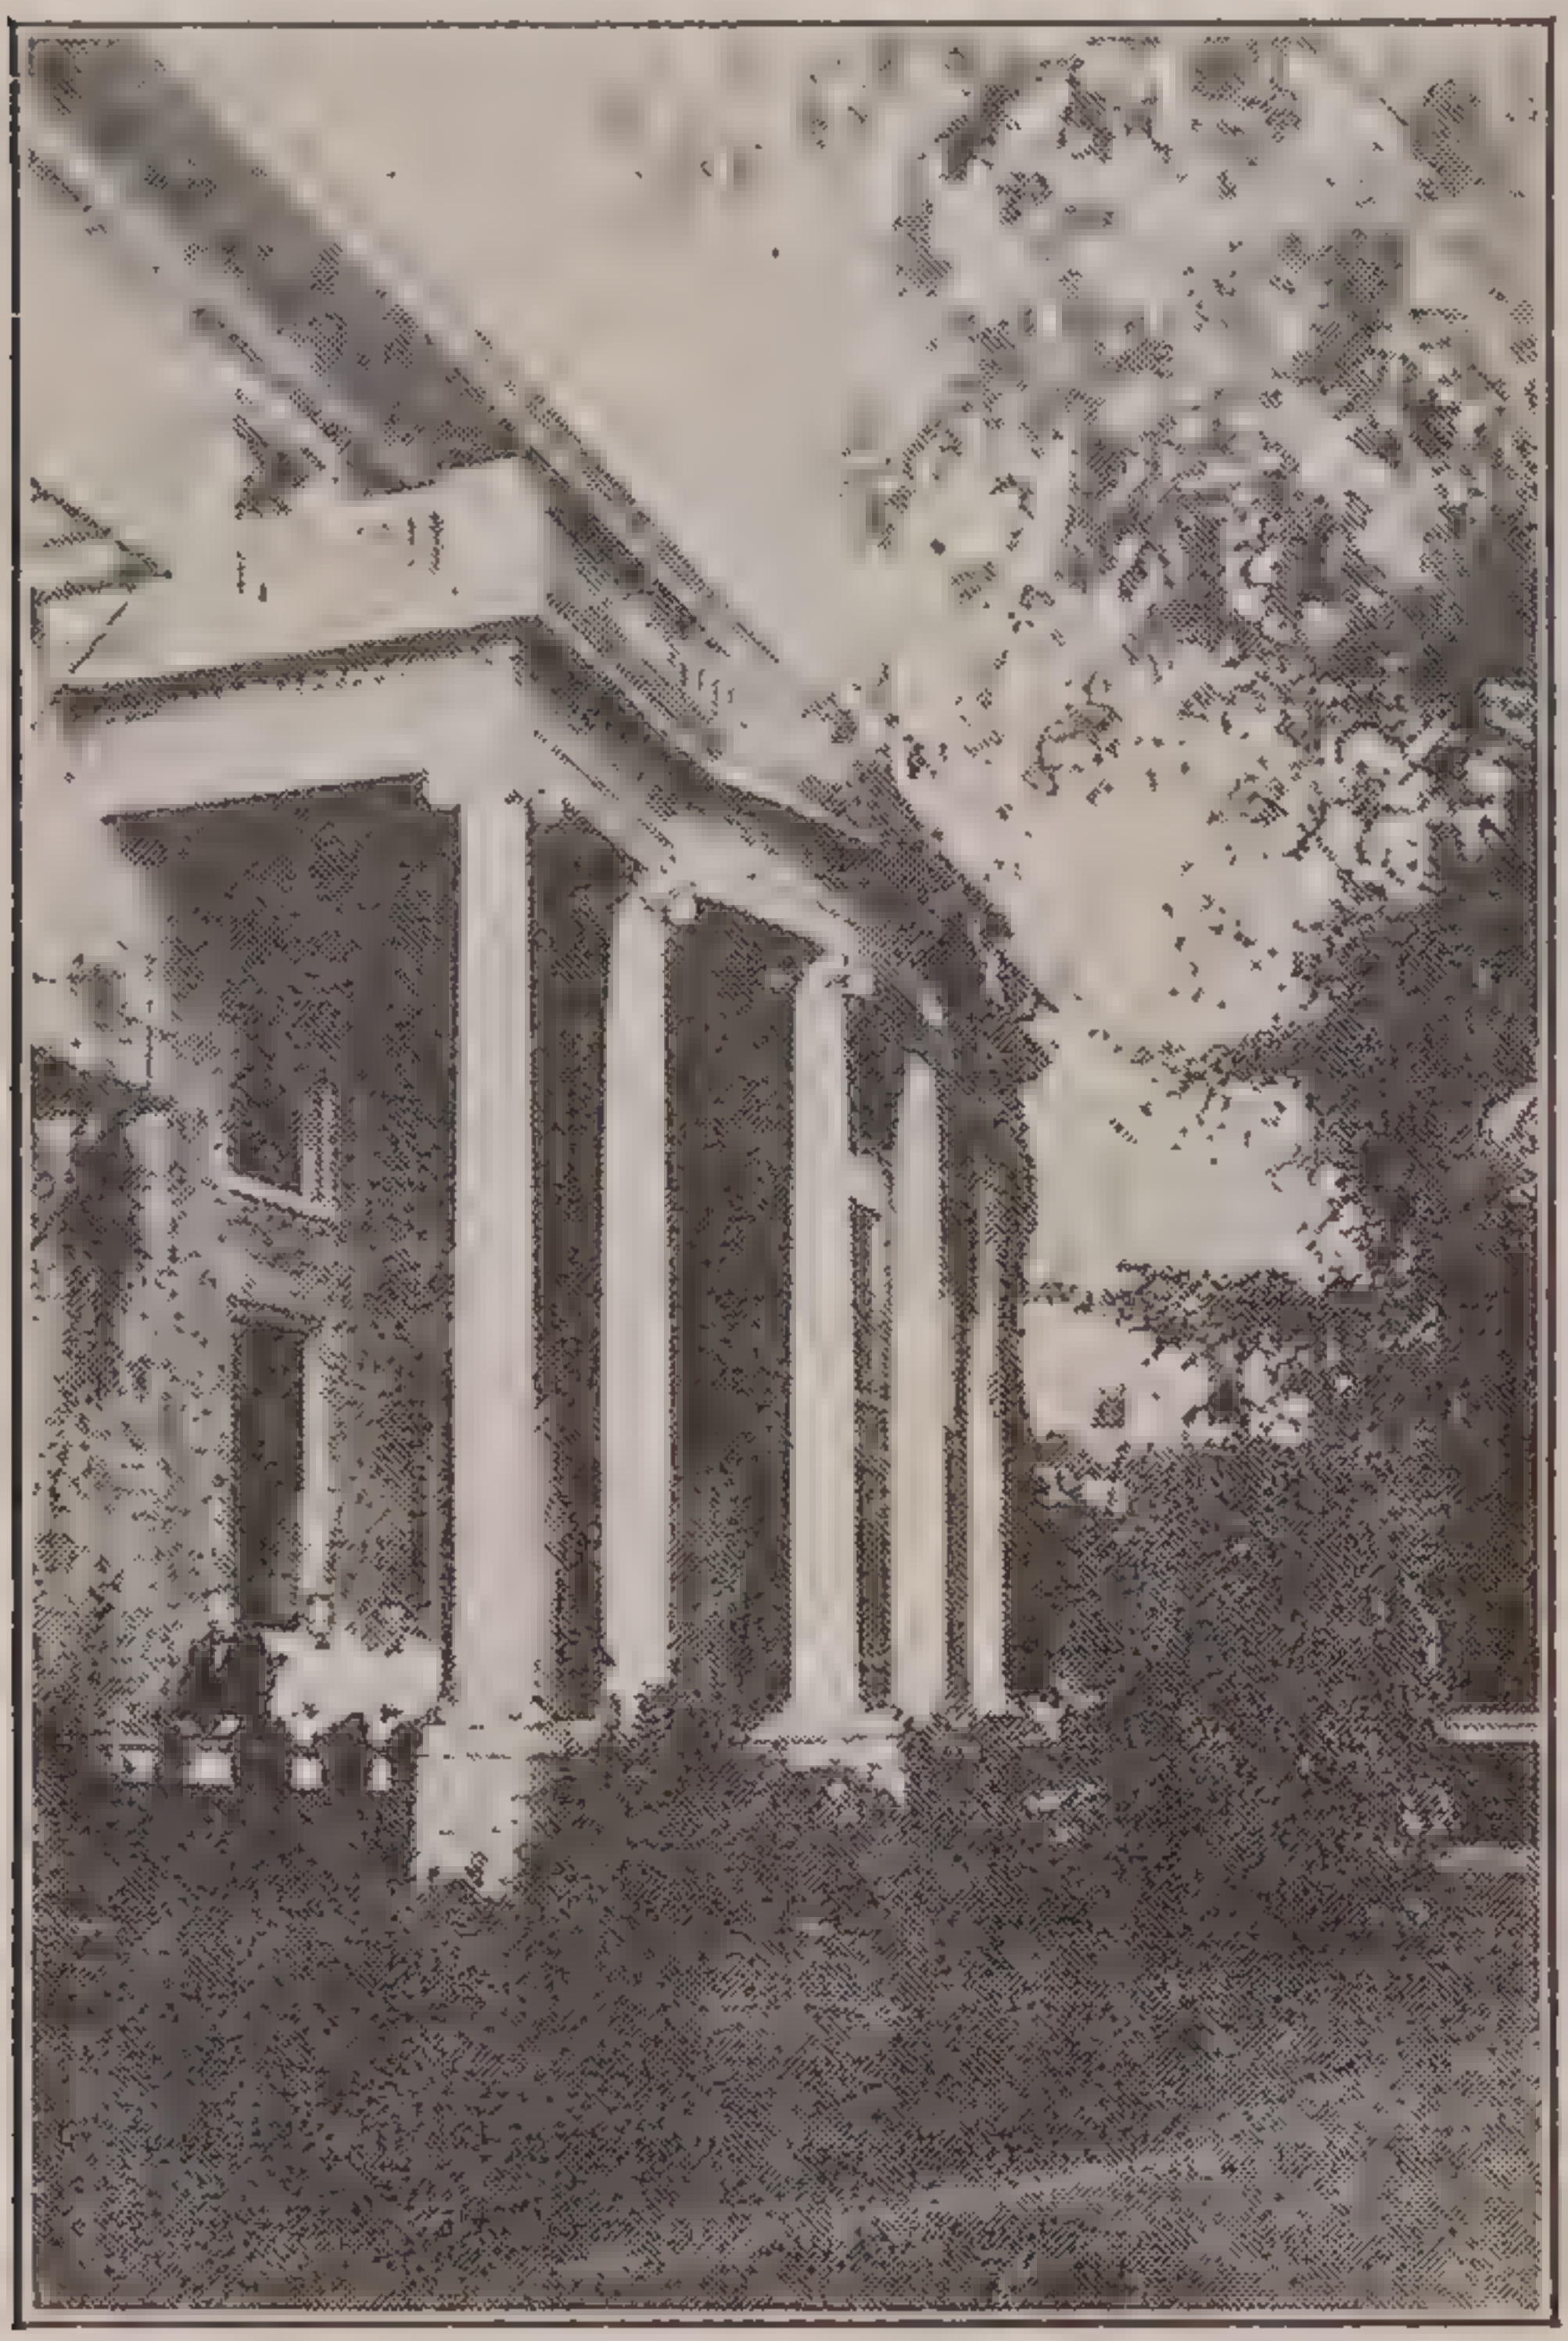
Beloit enrolls 531 students this year, with an enlarged faculty, and enthusiastic plans for carrying on the Beloit specialty, Education for Personality, Service and real American Citizenship. H. J. K.

Ripon Raising Half a Million

In educational circles Ripon College is often spoken of as "the college with the campus beautiful." The hills and dells, grassy swards and stately trees make a fitting environment for the historic old stone buildings, with their plain but dignified colonial architecture. Newer buildings of brick, such as Ingram Hall of Science, and the Indoor Athletic Field, merge pleasantly into their surroundings and give an added beauty to the place.

The locality has many interesting associations. Only a mile distant is still standing the old common house of the Fourierites, idealistic pioneers who attempted to establish a communistic settlement house at the same time that their friends in the East were establishing the famous "Brook Farm." On the campus of the college is the little white frame schoolhouse known as "the birthplace of the Republican party," because in that building, on March 20, 1854, was held the first meeting of the movement which has grown to be so influential a factor in our national life.

Ripon College was founded in 1851, by men of faith and prayer, and high ideals. Although independent of ecclesiastical control, it has been associated in sentiment and traditions with the Congregational Church, and also with the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Church, and many ministers and missionaries of these denominations, throughout America and throughout the world, received their college training and the spiritual impulses and purposes of their lives at Ripon.



ENTRANCE TO SMITH HALL, RIPON COLLEGE

During the Civil War the building and campus of Ripon College were used for military purposes, and a monument marks the gathering place of the troops in those heroic days.

Today Ripon stands as one of the distinctive leading small colleges of Wisconsin and the West. The enrollment of more than four hundred students is made up of ambitious young men and women, many of whom are earning part or all of the money to pay for their education. In recent years, Ripon has suffered from the suddenly increased cost of living, without having, like the larger universities, a wealthy clientele from whom to draw the funds necessary to pay higher salaries and larger cost of maintenance. The General Education Board has offered $100,000 toward $400,000 additional endowment, and Ripon is asking help from those friends all over the country who believe in her work of training these splendid young men and women for constructive Christian leadership in the tasks of the coming age.

Commencement at Tabor

Not in many years has commencement at Tabor been marked by such enthusiasm as this year. Numbers of alumni, former students and friends of the Institution, returned to the college for commencement week. The address at Senior Chapel was given by Rev. Allan L. Eddy of Red Oak. Rev. J. H. Blanchard, D. D., delivered the sermon before the Christian Associations. President Wehrham gave the baccalaureate sermon, and the commencement address was delivered by Dr. H. R. Best of Des Moines. The trustees of the college face the future with courage and faith and have undertaken a much larger budget than ever before. A department of business administration is to be established, a new athletic coach has been secured and games are being scheduled with other colleges. On recommendation of President Wehrham, Prof. F. Kline of Ohio Wesleyan University was made Dean of the College.

Pushing Forward at Howard

The United States Interdepartmental Board of Social Hygiene has approved the Howard University budget of $12,440 for social hygiene work at the University next year. Of this budget the University is to carry $3,900, which amount represents what has actually been spent during the past year for three instructors. The Interdepartmental Board is to provide the further sum of $8,540. This is an important forward step for the great University which, under the able leadership of Pres. J. Stanley Durkee, is helping to educate the Negroes.

Doane and Franklin

Doane and Franklin in Nebraska entered on a new venture a year ago. Doane elected John N. Bennett president, who had been for nearly 20 years a member of the faculty. Franklin created the office of president, and promoted the principal, George W. Mitchell, to the new position; also elected a new principal. Both schools have just closed a satisfactory year, and the outlook for the future is exceptionally good.

These institutions have a unique interlocking relationship. The president of Franklin has the distinction of being the first graduate of Doane; and the president of Doane was among the first instructors in Franklin. The relationship is most cordial, and, as might be expected, Doane gets more students from Franklin county than any other except the county in which the college is located.

The progress of the past year has prepared the way for some definite forward steps. Franklin has secured added grounds and has authorized a committee to secure estimates for a boys' dormitory and gymnasium. Doane is enlarging the girls' hall and authorized the securing of plans and estimates for two dormitories.

Possibly the most vital forward step was an advance in salaries. In this regard Doane has been conservative and has counted largely on the unselfish devotion of her efficient faculty to hold them to the task. The spirit of sacrificial service still is strong—but it was evident that the time had fully come when justice to men and safety to the institution demanded better pay. On recommendation of the president, the salaries were increased from 25 to 34 per cent. These advances could not have been except for the Congregational World Movement and the special campaign for funds in the state.

The report at the close of the school year showed substantial increases in the lower classes, but the upper classes have not fully recovered from the effects of the war. However, the number receiving the A.B. degree this year—seventeen—was just the average for the past 10 years. Nine of these were men.

The launching at the Commencement of a new organization, called Doane College Association, was an important step toward enlisting a larger number in the welfare of the school. This organization will include the alumni association and all students who have matriculated in the college. All the work of promotion formerly carried on by the alumni association will be conducted by this larger body.

Two years hence and Doane will reach her 50th anniversary. The trustees took steps in preparation for a fitting celebration.

The college conferred the degree of D.D. on Rev. John H. Andress, an alumnus of the school, and one of the state's most successful pastors. Doane has been sparing in conferring honorary degrees, Mr. Andress being the second man on whom she has conferred this degree.

Doane College stands high in scholarship, but higher still in the character of her graduates. The class this year built the commencement program around the theme, "The Unfinished Task." The spirit of courageous, unselfish service permeated every utterance. If "the measure of a man is the measure of his sympathy," Doane is putting forth full-grown men.

Dr. Dean Goes to Carleton

In the resignation of Dr. E. B. Dean of First Church, Northfield, Minn., and his acceptance of the position of Assistant to the President and Chairman of the Board of Deans of Carleton College, the churches of Minnesota lose one of their most active and aggressive leaders and the college gains an administrator of marked ability.

Dr. Dean was born in Satara, India, in which country his father, Rev. Samuel Chase Dean and his grandfather, Rev. Amos Abbott, were missionaries of the American Board. When Dr. Dean was five years of age, his parents entered pioneer home missionary service in Nebraska. He had his training at Doane, Amherst and Chicago Seminary, being graduated from the latter institution in 1893. He served First Church, Willmette, Ill., for six years, First Church, Clinton, Io., for six years, and the church at Northfield for 15 years. He has been exceedingly helpful in all the work of the denomination, serving as president of the Iowa Home Missionary Society, as a director and moderator of the Minnesota Conference, and in various other capacities. During seven months of 1916 he assisted President Cowling as Extension Secretary of the college and for a year he was in the active service of the Y. M C. A., being stationed first at New York City and then at Paris. His ministry has been characterized by unfailing industry, by complete sincerity and by an understanding sympathy with all classs. He has already begun his work at Carleton.

Commencement of Kingfisher College

The close of the school year at Kingfisher again affords a striking illustration of the priceless ministry it continues to render the cause of Christian education. Though the graduating class was small and the trials of post-war times have kept student attendance to less than former numbers, the same splendid idealism and quenchless spirit of service which have impressed all visitors to Kingfisher, were emphatically evidenced. The address to the College Christian Societies was delivered by Rev. A. E. Ricker, D. D., the baccalaureate sermon by Pres. Henry W. Tuttle, while the commencement address was delivered by Rev. Frank H. Fox, D. D., of Oklahoma City. The achievements of the school of music, under the direction of Dr. F. L. Drake and his able assistants, were finally exhibited in the students' recital on Monday evening and by the rendition of the "Messiah" as the annual concert on Tuesday night. Sixty voices with the accompaniment of two pianos and a pipe organ, the solo parts taken by former students of the school, gave a remarkable and inspiring presentation of the oratorio.

The trustees of the college met Tuesday, transacting vitally important business. Again was the wise, constructive leadership of President Tuttle gratefully recognized. While his report reviewed the fact that, unlike any other school in our group of colleges, we had come through the war period without a deficit, yet with the increasing costs of these later months the current year entailed a debt of $10,000. Recommendations were adopted providing for the next college year, and if the assurances given us in the name of the Congregational World Movement are fulfilled, that year will be cared for financially. But it ought emphatically to be said that if our school in the great Southwest is to continue to render to the cause of Christian education that high grade and idealistic service for which Congregationalists have ever stood, and which have been so nobly characteristic of its work for a quarter of a century, substantial and adequate material support is an absolute necessity. Mt. Holyoke Women in the Near East

The interest aroused by the question of whether or not the Turkish Government shall be permitted to remain on European soil has focussed attention on the relief work that is being accomplished by American workers in the Near East.

Mount Holyoke College, through her Appointment Bureau, has kept in close touch with her alumnæ who are engaged in reconstructing shattered lives and rebuilding devastated communities in that portion of the world so sorely smitten by the war. The brief records of the college bureau offer significant reading between the lines.

"Sailed in January, 1919, as a member of the relief expedition to Turkey;" "doing relief work with her husband in Jerusalem;" "has charge of an orphanage for boys at Marsovan;" "engaged in relief work in Turkey;" "is head of an orphanage in Samsoun;" "sailed in June, 1919, to work on the nursing staff of the American Women's Hospital Unit;" "went to Turkey in November, 1919, to do work with the Young Women's Christian Association;" "doing relief work in Palestine with her husband," and "sailed with her husband for Russia to do relief and reconstruction work among Armenian and Syrian refugees."

From letters, from messages through friends, and from official reports the college is able to follow the work of her graduates in far lands. Miss Gertrude Knox, a Mount Holyoke graduate of the class of 1909, is the official representative in the Near East of the Mount Holyoke alumnæ. Miss Knox with two other Holyoke women sailed early in 1919 under the American Committee for Relief in the Near East.

Describing her work at Samsoun, where she was assigned, Miss Knox wrote:

"We have only ourselves to rely upon in dealing with a community of about 16,000 souls, mainly Greeks, with a few Armenians—a community which has suffered much by deportation, especially of the Greeks. The Armenians have been killed off until there are only about 600 of them left, mostly women and children whose houses are all in ruins.

"A great part of our problem here in Samsoun is due to the flocking in of the villagers and refugees from the surrounding country. We have three soup kitchens to run, the Armenian, feeding 300 people, the Greek, feeding 1,600, and the Turkish, feeding 150.

"There is no work in Samsoun. Consequently we have on our hands the industrial problem. The orphanage problem is our greatest, in a way. We have a Greek orphanage already started. There are 600 now, herded together, three sleeping in a bed—emaciated, diseased little creatures, the victims of the war and massacres."

The Mount Holyoke women in the Near East are carrying on the heritage of self-sacrifice bequeathed them by the early graduates of the institution. From Fidelia Fiske, who laid the foundations for the education of girls in Persia, to Alice Gordon Gulick, founder of the International Institute for Girls in Spain, Mount Holyoke women have been pioneers in movements to better conditions in foreign countries. To carry on these traditions Mount Holyoke College is now appealing to the country for help in raising a $3,000,000 endowment fund. Of this amount $1,000,000 is to be used as a building fund for the replacement of Williston Hall, the science building burned two years ago, for much-needed dormitory space and other improvements, and the remainder as permanent endowment the income of which will go to increase the salaries of the teaching staff. When Sunday Comes

A St. Louis priest says: "There are big, fat Catholic pigs who sleep and grunt and roll on Sunday mornings, but cannot be stirred up with a pitchfork to go to mass." And there are some delightful Protestant ladies and gentlemen who can not arrive at the church in time for service three hours later.

How They Do It

An Exchange of Methods in Church Work

Enlistment Week at Pasadena

"After Easter, what?" is a question that faces many a church. To avoid the usual drop at this period of the year, First, Pasadena, Cal., of which Rev. D. F. Fox is pastor, instituted a most effective week of arousement in May. The parish was districted and 60 people were engaged in visiting during the week, each making from five to ten calls. Those called upon included members of the church and congregation, and parents of the church school children.

The most interesting feature of the canvass was the data secured on the survey cards. The cards show whether the person called upon was a member of the church, congregation, Sunday school, Christian Endeavor, Woman's Society or Men's Club. It indicated also whether the person would be willing (1) to teach in the Sunday school; (2) to work with children; (3) to work with young people; (4) to do parish calling; (5) to help at the church office; (6) to help with automobiles; or (7) to render some special kind of service. The church is now equipped with a remarkably thorough set of facts regarding its parish.

The week's festivities culminated in a "stunt night." The special feature of the occasion was that the church school was on exhibition, being in regular working order. The Boy Scouts served as guides to conduct the visitors from class to class. So much interest was aroused in this demonstration that other visitors appeared on the following Sunday morning to see more of the work of the school.

The plan and promotion of this successful week may largely be credited to the Director of Religious Education of that church, Mrs. L. C. Brockway. Since her appointment in that capacity last autumn, Mrs. Brockway has been of remarkably fine service to the church school. During four weeks of July this school, in co-operation with three other denominations in near-by churches, is running a community Vacation Bible school. S. E. B.

Corralling the Elusive Brides and Grooms

Mr. Preacher, do you worry sometimes because you have so few of your young married people in your pews?

Mr. Deacon, are you fearful sometimes that the stock of good deacon material will run out and make it hard to present good tickets of candidates for annual meetings to vote upon?

Mrs. Ladies' Aid Society Worker, is it one of your laments that the younger women are not stepping in to take the places of the older mothers of Israel as they drop out from the sewing meeting?

Then do you and all similarly nervous folk listen to this tale of a new organization that has a real reason for being, even though it is new, and that has justified its existence so splendidly as to make its imitation elsewhere a possibility and perhaps a matter of wise policy.

Write down the three words, "young married folks." Isolate the first two letters of each word, assemble them into a new word, capitalize it and pronounce it with an accent on, and a broad vowel in, the second syllable, and you have "Yomafo." Organize a club with this as its title. Inject into it whatever enthusiasm you have. Give it interesting things to learn. Provide for it real work to do. Afford it legitimate opportunities to play. Minimize the machinery and red tape. Stress the liberality and good fellowship. Invite into it all the young husbands and wives whom you cannot get into the other units of the church life, without condemning them for not having been previously corralled elsewhere. And if after a year or two there is not a conspicuous access of strength to the church from sources that had hitherto been untapped, the founder of Alpha Chapter of the Yomafo League of America gives you his compassion for having failed where his experience spelled success.

Meetings are held sometimes in the homes, sometimes in the church, sometimes at a bowling alley, sometimes off amid the hills at a roadhouse where good scenery and good cuisine are not contaminated by loose morals. A program committee is ever on the job of suggesting novelty. When the high cost of living had mounted part of its terrible journey, one member who used to be a butcher offered to buy a side of beef if the Yomafites would devour it. So we consented. A Grange Hall was hired. The beef was carved, divers chefs, who a few hours ago were bank tellers and mill superintendents and rising young dentists, bustled about the kitchen until the meal was steaming and ready. The steaks were properly smothered as all steaks always ought to be with succulent onions. And after a rare feed the Grange hall upstairs reeled and rocked to dances and old-fashioned shakedowns until these fathers and mothers of little babies peacefully sleeping back in Manchester, N. H., five miles away quite forgot that time does elapse even when you have flung care to the winds. After this renewal of youth it was noticeable that a crowd that had not been very diligent in church-going was quite willing to take on the responsibility of preparing and serving the annual supper of the parish to 300 church members. And need I add, the old deacons and their wives rejoiced in having a new delegation step up, willing to relieve them of the taxing responsibility.

We have had war stories from those who had lived through them, merry tales of work among the little children of the public schools and among newly naturalized Americans, authors' readings, experiments in psychical research, amateur dramatics with an "Overall Glee Club," tournaments at bowling alleys, chestnutting parties, maple sugar celebrations, and divers other entertainments. A club where the husband and wife can attend together has its advantages. And since most of the wives are mothers of young children, every session becomes an informal mothers' conference. And the men are not forbidden to smoke.

Each couple pays a quarter for refreshment expenses at each meeting, and the hostess must not run over that sum in her expenditures. The secretary telephones announcement of each meeting two days in advance and checks up the probable attendance. Almost every night there is an informal sing-song around the piano in which all participate, though not always to the pleasure of the person standing beside some one's uncultivated vocal willingness.

The idea is not patented. The name is not copyrighted. Here is to the spread of the Yomafo Idea! The time will come perhaps when every church will have its Sunday school, Ladies' Aid Society, Missionary Circle, Young People's Society—and its Yomafo Club! When yours is organized, write to the founder of Alpha Chapter, and we will give you your proper Greek letter. An interchange of reports among Yomafo secretaries may come ultimately to have real value to our corporate church life. For the hope of the next quarter century in the American church is now lodged with the men and women in the thirties and forties.

Conservative in Management Aggressive in Ideals

For forty-eight years the Congregationalists have been building in Nebraska in an aggressive but quiet way a Standard College, true to type, in which the students may live in an environment both scholarly and evangelical.

During these years of the development of this great mid-continent state many a young person has found himself mentally, morally, socially, and spiritually, and made a place of leadership for himself in the world.

To do the great work opening to it now that the Home Missionary period of the State is passing, Doane College finds itself inadequately equipped and financed.

The two great needs of the present day are more dormitories and increased endowment.

"Never a dollar lost by poor investment or misappropriation."

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Annual Meeting of Rye

At the annual meeting of RYE, Rev. J. W. Flagg, minister, the treasurer reported that the missionary apportionment had been met in full, that all bills were paid, and that there was a small balance remaining in the treasury. The Every Member Canvass on April 11 resulted in such a large increase in the pledges that the church voted to pay the full apportionment suggested by the Congregational World Movement.

Surprise for Pastor of East, Concord

The family of Rev. W. E. Kirkpatrick of EAST, CONCORD, was recently surprised by members of the parish. After an evening of mutual enjoyment to both pastor and people, comprising a well-arranged program, the guests departed leaving their good wishes and $50 worth of groceries. This is a most practical way to help on the preaching of the Gospel.

"Golden Wedding Deacons" at Newport

SOUTH, NEWPORT, Rev. D. L. Yale, minister, probably holds the state record for "Golden Wedding Deacons," three deacons of this church—Dana J. Mooney, Simon A. Tenney and Rotheus E. Bartlett—having celebrated the 50th anniversary of their marriages.

On a recent Sunday South received 18 young people into the church on confession. The can-

Pins for Perfect Attendance at Montague

The junior congregation of Montague has been a real feature for three years, since the present pastorate began. More than 30 have been members and between 20 and 30 have received pins for perfect attendance every four months. During the winter and spring months, notwithstanding cold and storm, 30 received pins for perfect attendance at the morning service. Rev. E. F. Hunt is pastor.

Men's Club Formed at Eliot Union, Lowell

The foundations for a Men's Club were laid at Eliot Union, Lowell, recently and it is believed this organization will play a vital part in the work of the church. Dr. W. B. Tuthill is pastor.

Athol to Be Represented at S. S. Convention

Athol, Rev. E. O. Foster, pastor, held its annual meeting early in June. Contributions from absent members increased the amount pledged to the Congregational World Movement, which was already beyond the quota. The prudential committee reported that the $1,000 apportioned for church and parsonage repairs would be insufficient and the additional amount was cheerfully raised on the spot. An inspiring address by Rev. H. L. Packard, pastor of North, Winchendon, completed an evening of good fellowship.

Twenty-eight members have been added to the church since Jan. 1. It will enjoy the distinction of having the Sunday school superintendent and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Brock, as representatives at the World Sunday School Convention in Japan in the fall.

Upton Held Services Amid Difficulties

The first year of Rev. W. G. Poor's pastorate of First, Upton, has been one of unusual prosperity. Financially it has been a surprise, for after the purchase of a parsonage, with a much enlarged budget, and a missionary apportionment almost doubled, it has met its allotment on the Pilgrim Fund, and for the Congregational World Movement; and at the annual meeting increased the pastor's salary. Increased activity in various lines of work, especially in the Woman's Missionary Society and among the men, who formed a Pilgrim Men's League last fall, deserves mention.

Though storm-bound for weeks early in 1920, Upton has not omitted any service, but its plans for ingathering have been affected. At Easter two were received by letter.

A gift of $60, representing the good will of many, was left at the parsonage recently on the wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. Poor.

Barre Raises Quota for World Movement

Barre, which had its Every Member Canvass in December, included in its budget both the needs of the local church and the apportionment for Congregational benevolences. When the canvassers returned it was found that the church had gone "over the top." At the time of the Canvass the church believed there would be no more solicitation until next December. When the Congregational Emergency Campaign was started Barre thought at first that it could not bring the needs before the people. But the drive was undertaken with the result that the quota of $500 was pledged in about 15 minutes at a Sunday morning service. Barre has recently increased the salary of the pastor, Rev. L. E. Evans.

CONNECTICUT

Federation Idea Works at Willington

The annual meeting of Federated, Willington, Rev. Theodore Bacheler, pastor, was held on June 1. A revised constitution was adopted which declared that the idea of the federation was not merely the union of the two churches, Baptist and Congregational, which originally entered into the agreement, but a single organization which should embrace Protestants of all denominations. The pastor's report showed that of the 27 persons received into fellowship during the past year, nine were from other than Baptist and Congregational churches.

On a quota of $16,390 Willington pledged more than $34,000 for the Interchurch. The greatest results of the Movement were in the spiritual gains. Church attendance has increased since the campaign and there is a new sense of religious values throughout the whole town.

Mr. Bacheler's salary was increased by $300 at the annual meeting and it was voted to secure an assistant pastor better to care for the work in the whole community. C. S. L.

Among the Norwich Churches

Greenville, Norwich, Rev. C. H. Ricketts, pastor, has exceeded its quota of $1,000 in the Interchurch drive, has repaired its organ and painted the parsonage. The church also exceeded its allotment for the Pilgrim Fund and in a recent canvass for its own work pledged more than in any previous year. At the last communion 16 were received on confession.

United, Norwich, has given much thought to the readjustment to new tasks since the pastor, Rev. A. H. Abbott, came last October. Forty-nine have been received into membership, 31 of them on confession. The sum of $4,500 has been expended upon the Community House and much social work is planned. In this house a Sunday Evening-Home-Time calls together 75 young people for consideration of live topics.

NEW JERSEY

New Pastor for Waverly, Jersey City

Rev. F. S. Ritter of Ventnor City, N. J., has accepted a call to WAVERLY, JERSEY CITY, at an increased salary of $600 per year over his predecessor. He will begin work Sept. 1.

Since the beginning of the present year Rev. C. F. Echterbecker, formerly of Quechee, Vt., and now doing special research work in psychology at Columbia University, has been acting pastor of Waverly. During this period, seven new members, six by confession and one by letter, have been added to the church, one adult and three children have been baptized, more than $500 has been raised, in addition to the usual amount for benevolences, through the Interchurch drive, and the finances of the church have been put on a substantial basis, making it possible to extend a call to a regular pastor again at this time.

Paper Shortage Delays Year Book

Word has been received from the mill that the paper for the Congregational Year Book will be delivered to the Pilgrim Press the last week in July. On this basis it is expected the book will be out the last of August so that copies can be delivered early in September.

The church has voted, besides the large increase of salary, to renovate the parsonage throughout, to install a gas range in the kitchen, and to pay $100 toward the moving expenses of the new pastor. About $300 has been raised for repairing the organ and installing an electric blower, and $75 toward a church bell has been raised by the young men of the church.

NORTH CAROLINA

Southern Pines Celebrates Anniversary

Late in April, SOUTHERN PINES celebrated its 25th anniversary. The exercises included a service to which the pastors of other local churches with their memberships were invited. Representatives of the tourist congregation from Northern states spoke with appreciation of the place this church has in the lives of the many winter visitors who crowd its services. A brief résumé of the history of the church was given by the clerk. The members of the present Board of Trustees were, before uniting with this church, all members of other communions. Mr. L. H. Johnson gave the historical review on this occasion, and Mrs. Joseph White, a member of Plymouth, Brooklyn, and Prof. H. G. Doland of Medford, Mass., spoke for the tourists.

Letters were read from Dr. A. W. Curtis of Raleigh, who assisted in the organization of the church; and from Dr. H. G. Foss, a former pastor, now editor of the local paper.

The past season was a successful one for the church. The choir, under the direction of Mrs. William Gray of New Hampshire, the organist, and Miss Marion Miles of Pennsylvania, rendered service of merit.

Arrangements have been made with the pastor, Rev. E. W. Serl, to return next autumn for another season's service in the pulpit. He and Mrs. Serl are spending the summer in Chautauqua work in New England and Canada.

OHIO

Changes in Columbus Churches

One cannot well blame Central Ohio for being somewhat stirred over the choice of two men within a radius of 40 miles of her territory, for the exalted position of President of the United States.. It is interesting to note that the candidates on the Republican ticket, though adhering to the strong Federal polity in politics, are both adherents of the democratic polity in religion. Mr. Harding is a Baptist and Mr. Coolidge a Congregationalist; on the other hand the two Democratic candidates, while connected with the Democratic party in politics, are identified with a central or federal polity in religion—both are Episcopalians. Presumably this is due to the fact that they were all born into these various relations.

While these events are engaging attention just now, on the surface of things, the deep current of life moves on and the continued interest in things religious is evident everywhere. Some changes have recently taken place in the pastorates of the COLUMBUS churches.

Mr. Gysan has resigned his position as pastor's assistant of FIRST and has accepted the call to the pastorate of South and is at work. PLYMOUTH is still in search of a pastor and is hearing candidates. DUBLIN, after a year without a pastor, has called Rev. C. W. Rogers from the East, who will begin his work soon. Rev. P. L. Curtis, pastor of NORTH, has been carrying on the Union work of the M. E. and Congregational churches in the north end while the M. E. pastor is taking his vacation. During August the M. E. pastor will perform the duties for both churches. This has proved very satisfactory in the past three or four years. Mr. Curtis has just accepted a call to Garrettsville, O., and will take up his new duties Aug. 1.

Rev. Mr. Graff of MAYFLOWER, with his wife, is enjoying their cottage at Frankfort, Mich. Dr. Maurer of First Church has just returned from the Council meeting in Boston. His family are at their summer home in Massachusetts where he will join them for his summer vacation. Supplies are preaching to the churches in the absence of the pastors and the usual vacation audiences are in attendance.

WISCONSIN

Plymouth, Fond du Lac, Sends Missionary

Plymouth, Fond du Lac, Rev. W. E. Gilroy, pastor, has recently held two services of special interest on consecutive Sunday mornings. On June 28, the church celebrated its 75th anniversary, with Rev. Robert Hopkin of Denver, who in 1918 closed a five-year pastorate in Fond du Lac, as preacher, and another former pastor, Rev. D. L. Holbrook, taking part in the service. This was Mr. Hopkin's first return to his old charge, where he is greatly beloved by the people, and his presence and sermon were warmly appreciated. He spent several days among old friends before proceeding to the Council meetings in Boston.

On July 4, Miss Elsa Reckman, a member of the church, was commissioned as a missionary to Central Turkey. On being presented by the pastor, Miss Reckman was accepted by Mrs. S. E. Hurlbut of Evanston, Ill., on behalf of the W. B. M. I., and the commission was given by Rev. P. H. Ralph, representing the American Board. Miss Reckman is a graduate of Beloit and of Chicago University. She has been a teacher in the Fond du Lac High School during the last two years, and has been highly regarded in her profession and in the life of the church and city. Her own statement following her commission made a profound impression, and the audience was deeply moved as she revealed the motives that had led her to consecrate her life to work in Turkey.

Deaths

MR. ARTHUR C. WALWORTH

The funeral of Mr. Arthur C. Walworth, who recently died at his home in Newton Centre, was largely attended.

Mr. Walworth was born in 1844. He was the son of James J. Walworth, the founder of the Walworth Manufacturing Company, one of the early promoters of the steam-heating business in this country. He was a graduate of the Boston Latin School and of Yale, and received his technical training at the Lawrence Scientific School, Harvard and the Ecoles des Pentes et Chaussés, Paris. He carried on successfully this line of endeavor and became the President of the National Association of Steam and Hot Water Engineers.

Besides his chosen profession Mr. Walworth had many varied interests to which he gave service to an untiring degree. All his later years a resident of Newton, he was closely identified with all that touched the city's welfare. Through his efforts a tract was secured for a playground, which beautifully developed, has given great happiness and been much appreciated. For a year he was a member of the Legislature.

Mr. Walworth was a member of the First Congregational Church in Newton and was much interested in educational and missionary work. He was long a trustee of Atlanta University and a friend of the colored race. His life was lived along deep Christian lines.

Through his many interests Mr. Walworth created a wide circle of friends and because of the

Mrs. Harriett Hewitt Martin, wife of Prof. John Janus Martin of Bangor Seminary, died at Bluehill, Me., of meningitis, Tuesday, June 29. The funeral was held in Bangor, July 2.

Mrs. Martin was born Jan. 9, 1880, at Lansing, Mich., daughter of Mary Alice (North) and Robert L. Hewitt, the latter a conspicuously successful teacher. She graduated from Albion college in 1902, being proficient in languages, especially Greek, so that she had the leading part in a public presentation of Euripides' Iphegenia Among the Tauri. For a time after graduation she taught with eminent success at Philander Smith College, Little Rock, Ark.

May 3, 1905, she was married to Rev. J. J. Martin, who had been a fellow student at college, and who was then an instructor in Chicago Seminary. Thenceforth all her powers were devoted to her growing family and to her husband's work, as pastor of the Austin Congregational Church, Chicago, till 1910; then of Calvary Church, Montreal, till 1913; since then as Buck professor of systematic theology at Bangor. To her little family of three boys and two girls she was intensely devoted, an exemplar of finest motherhood, sharing her motherly wisdom in kindergarten and mothers' clubs. Always a student, she possessed the power, none too common amid domestic cares, of studying carefully the larger affairs of the world's life, very recently manifesting her intellectual penetration and power by an unusually broad and lucid address before a leading woman's club.

Primary with her, however, were the things of the spirit. Here, not simply because she was the wife of a minister and theologian, but in her own right, she was at home, by her alert and inquisitive mind achieving a faith well grounded in reason. She has thus left to her husband and children as her most precious legacy the memory of a singularly sane, strong and pure Christian faith, thoroughly informing her life and character and shaping every detail of her domestic and public service. She lived not long but intensely. She wrought with enthusiasm. She served with unstinted devotion. Such a soul, so richly dowered, so in love with life and its possibilities, cut off so early, lends compelling conviction to the truth of the Christian's hope.

Reunion of the Commission of Nineteen

The Commission of Nineteen, appointed by the National Council in Boston in 1910, completed its official duty at Kansas City in 1913 when the new Constitution of the National Council was adopted and the national and international work of the denomination in America came under the control of the National Council. At each meeting since of the National Council the members of the Commission present have dined together and renewed the memories of the strenuous and happy three years when they were in such frequent association.

Seventeen of the surviving members were at the International Council at Boston. The deceased member was Hon. Samuel B. Capen. The absent member was Pres. Charles S. Nash. Those present were: Rev. F. K. Sanders, Chairman, Rev. W. E. Barton, Secretary, Rev. Nehe-

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

Reorganizing the Interchurch

At the meetings of the General Committee of the Interchurch World Movement held in New York June 18 and July 8, definite plans were made for bringing certain past and present phases of the Movement to a conclusion and looking to its complete reorganization.

At the meeting on June 18 a representative business men's committee of eight was appointed to go over all affairs of the Movement with great care and to advise the Executive Committee with reference to actions immediately desirable. Raymond B. Fosdick was chairman of this committee and the other members were E. M. Bulkley, Starr J. Murphy, Trevor Arnett, Fleming H. Revell, George Innes, James M. Speers, George M. Fowles and G. Warwick Murray.

The result of this committee's investigations and of the actions based thereon was presented to the General Committee on July 8. At the latter meeting a committee of 11 denominational representatives was appointed to sit with the business men's committee to consider the report and bring in recommendations. Rev. William Horace Day, D. D., was the Congregational representative on this committee.

At the afternoon session this committee reported as follows:

1. The Committee is unanimous in the conviction that the main purpose and objects for which the Interchurch World Movement was created should be conserved, and therefore the Movement should be continued, though on a greatly modified scale.

2. We heartily approve the action of the Executive Committee in closing the accounts of the Movement as of June 30, in calling upon the churches to meet their obligations, and in making a clear distinction between the past and future operations of the Movement.

3. That inasmuch as material must be cared for, subscriptions collected, and an irreducible minimum of work must be carried on pending the reorganization hereafter to be recommended, we recommend a budget not exceeding $75,000 which shall become a part of the obligations already incurred by the corporation.

4. Inasmuch as the time is manifestly too short for working out a feasible plan of reorganization today, we recommend the appointment of a committee of fifteen members which committee shall confer with representatives of the denominations co-operating in the Movement, and, if they deem wise, with representatives of other Interchurch bodies, and shall recommend plans for the future. The Executive Committee is requested in the meantime to utilize the surveys, literature, and all such material of the Interchurch World Movement as can be operated through the boards and other agencies of the denominations without expense to the Interchurch World Movement as such.

5. This committee of fifteen shall be authorized to call together the General Committee of the Interchurch World Movement and representatives of the denominations, in order to consider the report on reorganization when the report is ready. It is understood that eventually the direction of the Movement shall be in the hands of a Board officially appointed by the co-operating denominations.

6. For the purposes mentioned in this report, the Business Men's Committee shall be authorized to employ such assistants as in its judgment shall be necessary.

7. We further recommend that no budget of expenditure other than that heretofore and herein provided shall be authorized, until it has been properly approved and the expenses provided by the proper authorities of the co-operating denominations.

This was unanimously adopted by the General Committee.

The following persons were elected as the Committee of Fifteen referred to in the above report:

Bishop Thomas Nicholson, Chairman, Methodist Episcopal.
Rev. W. B. Anderson, D. D., United Presbyterian.
Rev. Joseph H. Apple, D. D., Reformed in United States.
Mrs. Anna Atwater, Disciples.
Bishop S. G. Breyfogel, Evangelical Association.
Bishop James Cannon, Jr., Methodist Episcopal, South.
Mrs. Frank Gaylord Cook, Congregational.
Rev. William Horace Day, D. D., Congregational.
Rev. T. H. Lewis, D. D., Methodist Protestant.
Rev. J. H. Mohorter, D. D., Disciples.
Rev. S. L. Morris, D. D., Presbyterian in United States.
Rev. W. G. Parks, D. D., National Baptist.
Rev. A. C. Siddall, Church of the Brethren.
Rev. H. C. Swearingen, D. D., Presbyterian in United States of America.
Mrs. May Leonard Woodruff, Methodist Episcopal.

Financial Situation

The business men's committee reported indebtedness at the banks of $6,560,000, all of which is covered by the underwriting of the denominations. On the most conservative basis, even if the Movement had not gone on, the assets were found to be $557,487.06. The outside figure on the liabilities, not including rents and interest, was $550,000. Thus, while it will probably be necessary to call for the entire underwriting made by the denominations, it seems certain that nothing in addition to this will be required to clear the entire indebtedness of the Movement.

Definite plans were made whereby the various lines of survey work, which are of inestimable value to the tasks and co-operation of the denominations, may be conserved and in some cases carried to completion. The Movement will doubtless be reorganized and carried forward on a greatly modified basis, but it was the unanimous judgment of all present that the objectives and values centering in the Movement were too great to be lost. The reorganization Committee will give thorough consideration to the best methods for carrying forward the major interests of the Movement.

A proposition is under consideration whereby all of the underwriting denominations will make a joint campaign this fall to secure the $6,500,000 necessary to pay the underwriting. This will save all denominational boards from having to take this amount from their funds and is greatly to be desired. F. M. S.

miah Boynton, Rev. R. H. Potter, Dr. L. C. Warner, Prof. Williston Walker, Hon. J. M. Whitehead, Rev. Oliver Huckel, Hon. H. M. Beardsley, Hon. A. S. Wellman, Rev. H. H. Kelsey, Hon. W. W. Mills, Rev. C. S. Mills, Rev. Raymond Calkins, Rev. H. A. Stimson, Pres. E. D. Eaton, and last but not least, Mr. Frank Kimball, who, on this occasion acted as host.

The Commission assembled at the Hotel Vendome, around a long table at whose head sat the Chairman and at whose foot was the Secretary, as had been their wont on many previous occasions. There were tender memories of Dr. Capen, and pleasant messages from Dr. Nash; and the members present spent four happy hours together.

No business is transacted at any of these meetings; the Commission did business enough in the three years of its active life to last for many years; but the tide of fellowship ran high, and the sweet and solemn memories of the years in which the Commission was actively engaged found expression in informal conversation and in short post-prandial talks, to which all members contributed. Certain committee meetings had anticipated the presence of some of these members on the evening on which they sat down to dine together, but the committees had to get on without them; for they continued at the table until eleven o'clock, when they adjourned with thankful prayer for God's blessing upon their work and in the years since that work was completed, and with hope for other meetings at Marietta in October next, and at Los Angeles in 1921. China's Great Opportunity

China's mother, returning soon, bustled about and washed the little tear-stained face and then unbraiding the little braids that stuck close to China's head said, as she made the hair into two neat plaits, "You-all just stop crying and hurry right over to Colonel Hewitt's 'cause they wants to see you-all, and perhaps the ironing will be ready when you-all come back and I will help tote it over. Fetch these salted nuts to Miss Sally and be polite when any one speaks to you."

China didn't want to go to the great house, but dutifully did as she was told. She imagined they wanted her to gather Spanish moss for decorations for a party, or perhaps Miss Sally wanted her to do some mending, which she had taught her to do, and which China learned so well that now all the mending that was small enough was turned over for China's skillful hands. With these thoughts she dragged her way to the house and soon stood before the wide white door and its heavy brass knocker. She was ready to lift it when a lovely lady came out and said to her, "Are you China?" It was such a kind voice and so gentle. At first China was scared right down to the soles of her little feet but remembering her mother's caution that she should be polite, looked up and in a very small voice said, "Yes, Ma'am."

Then this lovely lady began to thank her for saving her little daughter from the big black moccasin and from wandering away in the swamp. She told her how brave she was and how they owed her so much. She said, "Can't I do something to make you happy?"

China listened with mouth as wide and round as her eyes were big. What could she say to this lady? You couldn't take pay for doing your duty, and yet this lady was so polite. China was troubled about what was proper for her to do.

When asked where she went to school the whole story came out in broken sentences. She only went to school a few weeks each year. She had to help pick cotton in season with her mother and father. She was the oldest. There were three younger than she. Yes, she would love to go to school all the year round, but she had never been able to earn enough money to buy books and get clothes. Then this lovely lady asked her if she would take care of her little daughter during the rest of the vacation that she was spending at her father's home. She promised to pay her a small sum each week and to give her some of her clothes to make over, things that were good, but that she had no more use for. In addition she promised to interest some of her friends in the North when she went back home and she would try to get a barrel of useful things together to send to China and her family.

China was too happy to speak, but at last burst out her thanks and making a curtsey she ran home to tell the good news to her family.

The next fall Colonel Hewitt's daughter and little Golden Locks had returned to their home in the North, but true to her promise the lovely lady had paid China enough for her services to cover her expenses at the town school and there was some left for books, while the clothes she gave had been cut and made over to fit the new owner. China had to walk several miles each day to reach the little white schoolhouse, and often there was nothing in the little tin pail for her luncheon but a bit of cornbread and some sugar cane, but she had started to be educated and she was very happy. She said to herself many times, "Education is a mighty fine thing," and to show how much she meant it she showed her thanks by placing a bunch of roses from the cabin roof, or a bit of mistletoe, or perhaps a queerly shaped gourd, on her teacher's desk, and then she would shyly take her seat with the rest of her class. China studied hard and was a good pupil and the years sped on, but she continued to dream of some day having a school of her own where she could teach her people to grow up to be good and helpful and bring into other children's lives some of the happiness she had known since she first met the lovely lady and began to go to the little white school.

OUR READERS' FORUM

Inadvertent Autocracy

Dear Mr. Editor:

On page 79 of the Congregationalist for July 15 appears the "League of Nations Resolution" declared adopted by unanimous vote of the American delegates at the International Council after the benediction Monday night.

The resolution asks the nominees for president and vice-president of both parties "to make a public statement at the earliest possible moment that if elected they will make every effort in conjunction with the Senate to have the United States enter the League of Nations."

Is this meant as a religious and moral appeal, or a political threat? If the former, it would better have been phrased differently, so as legitimately to involve the conviction of those of us who have always striven for a league of nations but who think that the present moment is distinctly not the one for exacting pledges of this sort. For the first time in recent history America is free to think, and American citizens and statesmen are able to afford calm consideration, unconstrained by immediate action, regarding this particular covenant, or, as it was originally called, "Constitution," for a submergence of national wills and devotement of national resources.

If on the other hand the clause quoted was intended as a political threat, the thing is preposterous. It is likely as thus stated to awaken the resentment of any man not already committed by conviction or subserviency.

The second clause permits "such interpretative reservations as may be deemed essential to safeguard the life and independence of America." What does "interpretative" mean? If simply the making plain the supposed dovetailing of the covenant with the Constitution of the United States, that is something that in form begs the question and in substance is obnoxious. If emphasis is placed on "life" and "independence," this is a concession which should have been made a year ago when such things were sneered at, a concession that was not hinted in the ridicule which from the opening session of the Council was repeatedly poured upon "the politicians at Washington."

The third clause appoints the moderators and ex-moderators to present the resolution, "this committee to stand during the campaign and to have power to add to its numbers." Here is disclosed the true character of this resolution, an attempt to throw the weight of the Congregational denomination as a decisive factor if possible in the presidential campaign. In my judgment this scheme will prove abortive.

In the first place, as already shown, the position taken cannot involve the legitimate conviction of Christian people and that only. The differences are those of political competence and statesmanship. In the second place, while I do not wish to accuse our leaders of anything worse than heedless enthusiasm, the method of putting this resolution over on the American delegates was certainly below the rules of courtesy which obtain still in the most fiercely partisan contests at Washington. It was in the extreme degree un-Congregational. If the resolution had been introduced at the sectional meeting on the League of Nations, or announced there to be voted on later, and then if opportunity had been provided for deliberation upon it, citizens would have been treated as men and not as a crowd. At that meeting I took the floor, at this I could only sit in silent contempt, my presence being involved under false pretenses.

A year ago the utterances of Christian bodies were for the League without reservations. By so much they were ill-considered and irresponsible. The national mind has moved to the position of reservations if anything. The Church, so to speak, at least as clamorous, has now moved over on this ground, which had been anathema. The Nation will move yet further, as the light shines on truth and fact. But if the Church had possessed a year ago that statesmanship she deplores the lack of in politics, she could then have led our leaders very likely, just as she very likely might lead them now if she could really say one true and creative word. There is something fundamentally American, unique, indefeasible. It grips the very roots of our manhood. Constructively we heed this: Render therefore to the Constitution the things that belong to the Constitution, and to God the things that are God's—but nothing to Cæsar!

Derry, N. H. B. Alfred Dumm.

[Editors' Note.—If our brother felt at the Council as he does in this letter we wish he had not sat in "contemptuous silence." He certainly would have had a fair and considerate hearing.

The Boston action was Congregational enough for all practical purposes. Of course, it cannot bind any individual church or Congregationalist, but that it represents the beliefs of nine-tenths of the American delegates to the Council, we do not doubt. The one note sounded from the beginning to the end of the eight days that never failed to elicit quick and general response was that in favor of the League of Nations. Everything that went before prepared the way for this action. The resolution itself was carefully prepared in frank conferences between leaders of the denomination. To say that they, and those who gladly welcomed their initiative, should have kept dumb in the presence of a vital issue is but to re-echo the old cry, "The Church must keep out of politics, must never say anything about the saloon, must confine itself to good, comforting personal religion."

Mr. Dumm, we think, overstates the change in sentiment in Christian bodies during the last twelve months. As the impasse at Washington developed some came to feel that the League, even with the Lodge reservations, was better than no league at all, but they still want as effective a league as they can get.

Not long ago Mr. Dumm advocated his position—which seems to us equivalent to that of Messrs. Johnson, Borah and Reed—before his own local conference in New Hampshire, but after the subject had been duly discussed the Conference supported the League by a vote of fifty-eight to four. The other day the Boston Transcript raised a question as to the authorization of Dr. Henry A. Atkinson's statement in a London paper, cabled to this country to the effect that "all churches and Christians in America favored the League." To say "all" churches and "all" Christians is to go quite too far, but it is true that the Board of Bishops of the Methodist Church, with but one dissenting voice, many American colleges, numerous denominational, interdenominational and philanthropic organizations have gone on record in favor of the League. Here is what the Baptists voted at their Buffalo meeting in June:

> Since our Nation should be loyal to the obligations, direct and indirect, which it incurred when under clear providential leadership it threw its resources of treasure and far more precious blood into the defense of free institutions; and since these obligations have not been fully met by our victories in battle, but involve our whole-hearted co-operation with the nations which were our brothers in arms in further sacrifices to promote the ends of a Christianized civilization and a world peace: therefore we, the representatives of a million and a half of Northern Baptists in convention assembled, deeply deplore the failure of the President and the Senate of the United States to come to terms of agreement in ratification of the treaty of peace and covenant of nations, thereby leaving the world in chaos, ignoring the plainly indicated desire and will of the people, and forfeiting our conceded leadership in world reconstruction. We express our conviction that such great moral issues should not be degraded to the plane of partisan politics, and respectfully urge upon our President and the Senate the ratification of the treaty, with suitable reservations, at the earliest possible moment.

Here is the declaration of the executive committee of the Federal Council, representing thirty-one evangelical denominations, with a constituency of 35,000,000 persons:

> The Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, assembled at Baltimore, reaffirms its faith in the League of Nations, and earnestly calls upon the ministers and churches of the nation to exert every possible influence upon the President and Senate of the United States to secure the immediate ratification of the Covenant of the League of Nations with such reservations only as are necessary to safeguard the constitution of the United States and which shall not substantially alter the character of the Covenant, and shall not require its submission to the allies and Germany, and shall not in any way hinder the full and equal participation on the part of the United States in all the activities of the League.

And here again is the recent action of the American delegates to the International Council:

> Resolved, that the American delegates to the International Council representing every section of the country respectfully ask the nominees of the Republican party, Hon. Warren G. Harding and the Hon. Calvin Coolidge, and the nominees of the Democratic party, the Hon James M. Cox and the Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, to make a public statement at the earliest possible moment that if elected they will make every effort in conjunction with the Senate to have the United States enter the League of Nations in order that America may assume its full share of the responsibility of promoting international justice and preserving international peace.
> This resolution is not intended to preclude the adoption of such interpretative reservations as may be deemed essential to safeguard the life and independence of America without nullifying our loyal adherence to the objective of the League.
> Resolved, that a committee be appointed to present this resolution, consisting of Henry Churchill King, chairman, Moderator of the Natonal Council; James L. Barton, presiden of the International Congregational Council and the living ex-Moderators of the Nationa Council, T. C. McMillan, Nehemiah Boynton Henry M. Beardsley, Charles R. Brown, William Horace Day, this committee to stand during the campaign and to have power to add t its numbers.

If any Congregationalist in any part of thi country dissent from this action we shall b glad to record their views. We should also b glad to hear from those who endorse th Council action.]

Who's Who

John Howland writes on Mexico with the knowledge and insight that could only come to a man who has mingled freely with the people there for nearly forty years. He is one of the outstanding American Board leaders and has recently become the head of the Union Theological School at Mexico City.

Arthur E. Holt, whose article will appeal to all of us farmers, is the secretary of the Social Service Commission of the Congregational National Council. He points out what is coming to be a noticeable cleavage in the ranks of farmers the country over. Moreover, his interpretation of the Nonpartisan League in North Dakota deserves consideration.

Albert Peel, the British delegate to the International Council, who sets forth his impressions and findings, is pastor of the great Harworth Congregational Church, Blackburn, England, and one of the eight secretaries of the Lancashire Congregational Union. He is a writer and an authority on the history of Elizabethan Puritanism, concerning which he is now making further researches at Harvard and Yale.

Tributes to Dr. Sanderson

So large a place did the late Dr. John P. Sanderson fill in Michigan Congregationalism, and more recently throughout the Middle West, with Chicago as his basis of operations, that it is fitting that this number should contain tributes to him from those who knew him well. Dr. Gammon, our Chicago editor, draws a beautiful and unusual picture of the man himself. Professor Ward writes from the standpoint of long intimacy with Dr. Sanderson in Michigan and elsewhere, while Dr. Barton sets forth something of the work he has done in the development of Congregational polity and in the strengthening of Congregational interests.

In the Circulation Department—

Only by comparing our lot with others are we able to fully appreciate what we have. Perhaps you will pardon us for again calling your attention to some further observations from other periodicals. The following notice which appeared in the July 3 issue of The Methodist Recorder is significant.

"A WORD WITH OUR SUBSCRIBERS"

"For the past quadrennium the manufacturing costs on our publications have advanced to a place where the very life of our business was endangered. During the war we willingly assumed the burden of the 'High Cost of Living' as a part of the price of victory. The armistice brought hopes that this burden would soon be lessened and prices would seek their normal level, but our hopes have not been fulfilled. The havoc wrought in the world's economic conditions was too great for recovery to take place so early.

"Our Methodist Recorder never has been self-sustaining, in fact no denominational publication is, but the limit of our resources to make up the deficit has been reached. The only business-like solution of our problem is to make readjustment of our subscription price to partially cover our deficit.

"During the fiscal year ending March 1 it cost us, to publish and mail a year's subscription to each of our subscribers, approximately $3.00. In other words, we gave each subscriber a $3.00 value for $1.50.

"By action of the General Conference, we were instructed to advance the subscription price to $2.00, beginning with July 1, 1920. You will agree with us when we say that this is more than fair and reasonable, considering present manufacturing costs."

The Bible as a Community Book

Dr. Brown closes a two column review of this book by saying: "These are samples. The reader who tastes them will want another helping and when he reads the little book through to the end he will be repaid. He will thank God and take courage."

An Ideal Book for the Communion Service

We have often been told that no book offered finer communion themes than Dr. Oscar Maurer's Brotherhood of the Burning Heart and know many will be interested in this recent comment of Dr. Charles Stelzle of New York:

"I had almost despaired of finding a book that might suggest virile themes for discussion at communion services—the most difficult of services for the average minister to get ready for—until I ran across 'The Brotherhood of the Burning Heart' by Dr. Oscar E. Maurer."

A Call for Safed the Sage

"Now there liveth in the Centre of the Intellectual Universe—the Hub of All Knowledge—which the Vulgar calleth Boston, a Sage yclept Safed whose Bean exceedeth in value the famous Boston-Baked in that it needeth not Molasses nor Sugar for Sweetness neither Mustard for the Sting which stingeth only that good may follow whereby the Digestion may be Improved.

A Cry goeth up from the Land for the People desireth the Parables of Safed in Convenient Form whereby the Headache which cometh on the Night of the Prayer-Meeting or the Rainy-Sunday, may be relieved.

Let the Publisher hie to the Aurist that he may Hear and the Oculist that he may See, and make glad the Heart though his Purse be flattened, for Golden Apples shall fall from Heaven—One for Safed, One for Him who shall publish, and One for Him who shall purchase the Book. The Congregationalist and Advance

The Supreme Issue

THE CONGREGATIONALIST has abundant evidence that many of its readers endorse the stand which the paper has taken in favor of the League of Nations, and that other equally sincere members of its large household disagree with its position. We wish, therefore, to re-state and re-emphasize our convictions with regard to America's present duty to the world.

We regard the League of Nations as the most vital and commanding issue before the American people. The national policy on prohibition we consider settled. No other definite piece of legislation bearing on the social and industrial welfare of the people is now conspicuously before the voters or is being championed vigorously by either of the great parties. Not only because of the absence or subordination of other moral questions, but because of its intrinsic merit, that of the League of Nations continues to hold the center of the stage. We ought not to tire of it because it has been so endlessly debated, or to avoid it because it has become tangled up in politics, or because we cannot easily get a clear-cut referendum.

We believe that it is time to separate the League from exclusive association with Mr. Wilson's personality and with whatever one may think of his autocratic disposition, his "one-track mind," and his uncompromising spirit. History better than contemporaneous newspaper comment will disclose the nature and extent of the contributions he has made to the dethronement of Prussia, to better international understandings, and to the rudiments of a world alliance. But he has done about all he can do for the League (or against it, as you please), and the reins of power are soon to pass from his hands.

The question then still remains as to what part, if any, America will take at a council table where representatives of thirty-five nations are already meeting. They are working on the principle that when right-minded men, entrusted with solemn responsibilities, get together periodically to survey the world situation, to try calmly and patiently to kill the germs of strife, establish international confidence, allay racial animosities, and to mark out the right path for the feet of Justice to tread, their labors will not be in vain in the Lord. They may have to go slowly. Now and then they may have to retrace their steps, but they are headed in the right direction.

The Congregationalist believes that America belongs in such a group. They befog the question who talk about the League as a "military alliance," or who speak of the present issue as one between "crooked internationalism" and "straight Americanism." The League is an honest, determined effort to get together, to work together, and to stay together.

We believe that commitment to this society of nations involves some risks and responsibilities on the part of America, but that they should be bravely undertaken. If a great forward step in the life of civilization is really to be made, there will eventually be some risks. Why should we hesitate now more than we did in 1917? We frowned then upon every one who said "America first," "safety first." The risks are small compared with the service to be rendered. America's moral prestige in Europe and the Near East even now have not been so severely shaken that its formal entrance into the League would not produce at once a steadying effect upon disturbed conditions everywhere. The risks to this country are likely to be greater if we keep out, for we solemnly believe that the path of national duty is also the path of safety.

We believe that it is the present League of Nations or no other for decades to come. Talk about Woodrow Wilson being visionary! Is anything more visionary than the suggestion that eight months hence we can scrap the present treaty and covenant and begin all over again to remake the world? By that time it will either have gone up in smoke or the League of Nations will have attained such strength and influence that to propose another would be most discourteous to such men as Lord Robert Cecil and Jan Smuts, ex-President Taft, President Lowell, and Dr. Talcott Williams, and many others, who have worked hard to bring about the present League. It would also be defying the moral and religious forces in this country which again and again have gone on record as willing and eager to take, in substance, the League already in operation.

We believe that the duty of those who believe in the League is not limited to determining which presidential candidate to support, though that it is an exceedingly practical and momentous question. But good men may divide on that particular issue. At any rate, whatever party or man comes to power, it will still be our duty to urge upon Congress and the President acceptance of the League, qualified it may be even then by reservations, provided only that they represent not covert opposition to the idea of a League, but simply the desire to keep America in a position to fulfill throughout the years to come its full duty in connection with such a League.

Moreover, apart from pressure looking to political action, we have, even in these summer days when the mind shrinks from argumentation, to do a quiet work of propaganda, to show our friends who differ from us that they over-estimate the dangers of American participation in the League. We have now to hearten anew those who have grown lukewarm and weary of the whole subject. We have to try to make our fellow Americans who have become immersed in business and pleasure look in imagination from time to time upon the desolated fields of Europe, upon the warfare in Asia Minor, upon threatening conditions in China, to the end that they may be led to ask, "Can the United States do anything to keep the world from eating out its own vitals?"

We love America as well as those who are advising her to retreat to her shell. We would see her honored, where now she is distrusted and suspected. We would see her influential, where now she is impotent. We would see her stretch out her own hand to take those so gladly extended to her, in the hope of help and guidance.

Even more fervently does The Congregationalist believe that this issue is a moral and religious one. We believe that the Christian Gospel is meant to apply not only to individuals and society, but to the nations, that an association of nations is in line with the very genius of Christianity and that Jesus Christ's great saying, "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it," points out the only right and safe course for America to take at this critical moment in the history of mankind.

A Word for Our Times

America must dare to own her mistakes and to retrace her steps. She must dare to do the righteous thing in the Near East—difficult as it now is to find it—and in Europe and in the Far East. She must dare to face the inevitable shortcomings of our present economic system. She must dare a new age and a new world, in which she shall take her full measure of responsibility.—FROM PRES. HENRY CHURCHILL KING'S BACCALAUREATE SERMON TO OBERLIN SENIORS.

Vacation and Vocation

A Christian is a Christian always and everywhere. But though his aim is one, it does not follow that he will behave in all circumstances in precisely the same way. A follower of Jesus can be gay as well as grave. The most Christian use of a vacation, for example, is to do differently. When a busy man gets away from his business he does not get the full benefits of his going unless, so far as is humanly possible, he forgets his business. If you go to the etymological dictionaries you will discover that vacation is by derivation an emptying. You empty yourself out of your accustomed places. You empty your mind of the accustomed work.

When we hear people talking therefore of "taking a vacation at home"—and especially when we hear housekeepers and house mothers say it—we know that they are either caught in the web of circumstance, or that they have never learned the first primer lesson of the real vacation opportunity. We are all the time taking little rests and changes. We could not live a week without our nights of sleep and we cannot live well any week without our break of Sunday. But the first rule of a real and Christian vacation is to vacate, to dump the furnace of your business mind, to clear out, vamoose, decamp, absquatulate and let your tired mind recover its tone.

We have moments perhaps when we feel that we would like to sleep through a whole vacation. We are so tired or bored that nothing seems worth while. But that is, of course, merely a symptom of our need for a vacation. The real rest, after the first folding of the hands and wooing of still slumbers, comes with the occupation of the mind with other than our own workaday affairs. The real business of the Christian, held in check to a great extent by the pressure of ordinary life, is to interest himself in the needs and work of others. The walls of our mind tend to slope inward when we are engrossed with our own business. One business of a vacation is to pry them apart so that our souls shall be open to a wider sweep of the heavens and our good will be occupied with a larger segment of the great brotherhood of man.

A good many of us find it restful to attend summer conventions and to enlarge both our knowledge and our companionship in Christian work. We get effectively out of ourselves in such experiences while we are laying up material for the enlargement of our own lives on our return. But even so the aim should be to interest ourselves in somewhat different things from those which engage our attention at home, and we should be sure to mingle with different people. If it were possible, for example, for a pastor to take his whole congregation with him to some Chautauqua where they would carry on the relations of their own church life in a separated tent, it might not be a good thing either for the minister or for the congregation. We tend to lead monotonous lives under the pressure of our business needs and social conventions. We need to break away in order to recover our breadth and liberty of view.

If possible, we all should have some element of adventure in our summer resting times. It may be very mild adventure—a stirring book to read, a new game to learn, a new country to explore in the interest of some study like that of botany, a new class of workers to bring into the range of our acquaintance. Those ministers who, two years ago, spent a leave of absence as war workers in the shipyards or munition factories and those teachers who have turned themselves into "farmerettes" had their wholesome and inspiring adventures and came home with new resources for comparison and a new point of view. Somehow or other, while you are away, listen to that corner of your mind which in the push of ordinary life tends to be overlaid by cares and worries and "be a sport."

But when all is said, vacation is for the sake of work. If you are really interested in what you do at home your mind unconsciously will be laying up materials for use on your return, just as your body is laying up refreshment. But do not hurry either of them. Neither strain your muscles nor overtax your mind. You often have to chase your interests at home; now let them chase you. Be wise, tolerant, receptive. Absorb what comes to you, of information, of suggestion, of experience, with a mind at leisure and ready to appropriate what arrives. And may your vacation bring you happy memories and prepare you to make others happy when you come back to your work.

Let the Women Speak

We are just now in the thick of one of those periodical discussions about the seemliness of women's clothes, which are induced not so much by the captiousness of male criticism as by the recklessness or indifference of a small proportion of our women. That there is real ground of criticism every one who walks in our city streets or visits any of our fashionable places of entertainment will not doubt. Our humorists are much engaged in acting as censors and draw pictures which usually exaggerate the defects of quantity and the translucencies of quality in the clothes which are just now dictated by fashion. Punch, in its Summer Number, hits off the situation in one of its adaptations from Mother Goose:

"Mary, Mary, slightly airy,
How do the fashions go?"
"Scraped-up hair and shoulders bare
And vertebræ all in a row."

Now we have always been of the opinion that the kind of clothes women wear are the exclusive affair of the women and that to censor them lies outside the province of the men. But in view of all we hear and see, we can hardly admit that the matter is so harmless as merely to concern a passing style of clothes. Here is The Churchman, which feels that the unseemly dress is a symptom of a soul sickness which demands a remedy. Modesty, of course, is not determined by the amount of cloth which goes into a garment. A cannibal wife of New Guinea who wears nothing at all may be more modest in behavior than a thoughtless or reckless American girl in full dress at a ball or in a fashionable bathing suit on the beach. But if it is true that the present style in dress, the results of which often fit the description given by Mrs. Gladstone of a certain waist that it was "What I should call a 'Look at Me' body," then it follows that thought and behavior must often be improper and the garments are the outward expression of a soiled soul and imagination.

That this is often so we fear must be conceded about a certain group of American women in this moment of our history. And the law of society is that as the women are, so are the men. The Churchman says:

> The fine reserves which characterized social intercourse a few years ago are being steadily broken down. Sex relationships are discussed by young men and women not only at the private dinner table, but also in the glaring publicity of fashionable restaurants and hotels. The infelicities of married life and the latest scandals of divorce are proclaimed on the housetops. The more intimate relations of life are canvassed openly and unreservedly with a shocking lack of delicacy and reserve. Convention is defied and restraint thrown to the winds.
> No part of life seems exempt from the blight. It affects alike, dress, dancing, and the stage. So far as the theater is concerned, it is notoriously difficult to find plays which do not shock our sense of modesty.

So far as this is true—and even a little observation leaves no doubt that it is true of certain wide circles in our cities—it is a threat to the heart of our nation. But the cure is primarily with the women. It is said that girls dress to please the men. However that may be, we are sure that no man whom a decent woman would think fit to be her father or her brother or her husband likes to see the women of his own household dress as so many are now dressing (or undressing) for public places. But they have permanently enfranchised their women and they would be loath to interfere, even if they were hopeful of good results.

To the women, therefore, we appeal—the Christian women of America, the women who are good citizens, the women who are judges both of morals and of manners, of good taste and seemliness in dress, the > "Store of ladies, whose bright eyes

> Rain influence and judge the prize
> Of wit or arms, while both contend
> To win her praise whom all commend."

It is for woman to vindicate her position and her right to judge. When the good women of America frown on immodesty and unseemliness, of behavior and of dress alike, we shall have a good deliverance from the present plague of obtrusive and apparently triumphant vulgarity.

Better Music for the Youth of Today

Professor Augustine Smith in his leadership of the music at the International Council gave a practical demonstration of how completely the standard hymns of the church lend themselves to worship. He showed that it is not at all necessary to use religious rag-time to the accompaniment of a trick pianist with the leading of a clown to make music worshipful. He not only brought out the message of the musical setting of the hymns, but he also interpreted wonderfully the poets who wrote them. For two or three years he has been rendering this same sort of service to the country through the conventions of the International Sunday School Association. In other years the association was not so fortunate in its leadership because the musical leaders tried to make the music a performance rather than an act of worship. In many of the conventions held by the association also no attempt apparently was made to teach the delegates how to make the music in the home church the most worshipful.

In a large convention held by another interdenominational organization we could not help contrasting the music with that led by Professor Smith at Boston. The book used was put out by the publishing house of the organization and its preface was written by one of our foremost Christian leaders. The hymns in the book are not representative of the best music of the church, and the singing was led by a man who acted more the part of a clown than that of a leader of music in a Christian gathering. The pianist was a trick player, whose "dives" and "upper-cuts" tended to destroy what worshipful spirit there might have been in the large number of youth present. The convention was for young people. It is a crime when the music of a Christian gathering is treated as an opportunity for personal or technical display and not as a means and an ideal of worship for youth.

Professor Smith has proved conclusively that young people will sing heartily the best hymns of the church if they have the proper leadership. It is time for the great interdenominational organizations to demand that their youth in the impressionable period be given the best music under the most reverent leadership, not only in order that they may learn how to worship, but that they may fill their memory with hymns worth retaining. We ought to have a change in the kind of music provided for our youth and we ought to have it at once.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable Concerning the Evil and Good of Gossip

Once upon a time there were Two Fools. And one of those Fools was a man and the other was a woman. And that is a Bad Combination.

And there came unto them one of their friends, and spake unto them, saying,

Behold, people are talking about you; and what they say is Unpleasant. Have a care, therefore, lest what they say become More Unpleasant.

And when the Two Fools heard this, they spake one to another, and said,

We should worry about what People Say. For we have done nothing amiss, and we shall do nothing amiss. And they who speak evil of us seek only the evil that is in their own hearts. They are Idle Gossips. Let them talk. We will give them something to Talk About.

Then these Two Fools proceeded to give the Gossips something to Talk About. And they succeeded beyond their Fondest Hopes.

And the more people talked, the more Defiant these Two Fools became.

And when they had gotten themselves into a Pretty Bad Mess of Publick Scandal, then did the Woman Fool come unto Keturah, and the Man Fool came unto me.

And we had what might be called a Foursome.

And the Woman Fool wept much; and the Man Fool swore.

And I said unto them, Ye are Two Fools with less than a Single Thought; two Nuts, and both of you Cracked.

And they said, Behold, we have done no wrong. Let the evil be unto those who evil think.

And I said, Nay; the evil is also unto those who cause others to think evil.

And the man said, When a man knoweth that he hath done nothing wrong, then may he stand in his Conscious Rectitude and face the Lying, Foul-mouthed world.

And I said, Save thine eloquence. For a righteous cause a man may face the world, but not for the sake of indulging his own Folly.

And Keturah spake unto the Woman Fool, and said, My dear, this world is prone to judge that things mean what they seem to mean. Thou must not do the things that seem evil and expect the world to reckon it unto thee for good. If we are taught not to let our good be evil spoken of, much more must we not let our folly appear as if it had been evil.

And the Woman Fool said, I think that Gossip is the Vilest Thing in the World.

And I said, Gossip is indeed an unlovely thing. But it hath its Value to a Community.

And the man said, Thou speakest falsely. It hath no Value.

And I said, If it were not for the fear of Gossip, and the Wholesome Dread of what people would say, then would Fools such as ye are behave even worse than they now do; and that is a Plenty.

And I said, There are Fools that may be brayed in a Mortar with a Pestle and their folly will not depart from them. That Mortar is Public Sentiment, and that Pestle is Gossip. The braying is a Painful Process, but for you it may be Profitable.

Now it came to pass that those Two Fools were not quite Hopeless Fools. And they did as I and Keturah told them to do. And by this time their Folly is well-nigh forgotten.

Neither presidential candidate of the old parties is a college graduate. That proves nothing but the familiar fact that in the United States the right sort of a boy can if necessary get an education without going to college. Both the vice-presidential candidates are college graduates and, incidentally, both got their training in Massachusetts colleges. The fact of the matter is that college is an opportunity rather than a necessity. It puts the tools of training conveniently at hand, but they will accomplish little unless the student uses them for all they are worth. In the final analysis every educated man is self-educated, whether in college, in a newspaper office, or in his experience of the world.

Former President Taft, not being a candidate for any office because already elected to the good will of the whole American people, is free to express his mind on any topic when and as he chooses. He does so unequivocally in regard to the enforcement of the prohibition amendment. He says in a letter just published:

> As a matter of fact, I am not in favor of amending the Volstead Act in respect to the amount of permissible alcohol in beverages. I am not in favor of allowing light wines and beer to be sold under the Eighteenth Amendment. I believe it would defeat the purpose of the amendment. No such distinction as that between wines and beer on the one hand and spirituous liquors on the other is practicable as a police measure.

> There has been a great deal of misconception as to what was won by the victory in France. That victory will not be found to be a substitute for further human effort and endeavor. It did not create magic resources out of which wages could be paid that were not earned, or profits be made without corresponding service; it did not overcome any natural law; it did conquer an artificial thraldom sought to be imposed on mankind and establish for all the earth a new freedom and a larger liberty. But that does not, cannot, mean less responsibility; it means more responsibility, and until the people of this nation understand and accept this increased responsibility and meet it with increased effort there will be no relief from the present economic burdens.

How the old names come to the front again, names which go far back in the history of the race and are associated with ancient traditions—Damascus, Adrianople, Aleppo! Abraham had a steward from Damascus, who, except for Isaac, would have been his heir. Elisha went there to warn the Syrian king. David had a garrison there. Adrianople is the old Thracian town which Hadrian fortified against Asiatic incursions and put his name upon. Aleppo calls up a thousand associations of the crusades. The French in Damascus and Aleppo, the Greeks in Adrianople, are linking up the past and the present and sending us back to our maps and histories.

So much recent talk about Mexico has been propaganda or highly colored with prejudice that we are glad to share with our readers Mr. Howland's article on another page with its calm statement, judicial spirit, and sympathetic thought of the Mexican people. We desire nothing of Mexico but good neighborly relations and mutual forbearance under provocations from the unruly classes on both sides of the line. Carranza, we have felt, gave us less than justice, so that the lives of Americans in Mexico were often insecure and the border unnecessarily the scene of attacks and reprisals. We hope for better times under the presidency of De la Huerta and his successor to be elected this fall. We should like to be able to make an agreement with a stable and educated Mexico which would grow out of complete mutual confidence and make the Mexican border as free from forts as our border with Canada. And to this end mission and educational work like that in which Mr. Howland is engaged is steadily contributing. It is not the missionary type of American which excites suspicion or deepens prejudice in Mexico.

and duties was bound to produce a new type of American farmer. It has gradually placed on our farms a man who is conscious of his importance and determined to find ways of satisfying his needs inside the social order of which he is a part. Formerly it was possible to discuss the organization of farmers under two headings, the National Grange, and the various types of farmers' unions. There seems to be developing a new alignment, however, corresponding somewhat to the alignment in other phases of our political life. This alignment divides the farmers into what might be called a conservative majority and a radical minority. In the conservative majority there would be classified such organizations as the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the International Farm Congress, the National Board of Farm Organizations which includes:

Farmers' Educational and Co-operative Union of America.
Farmers' National Congress.
National Agricultural Organization Society.
National Conference on Marketing and Farm Credits.
Pennsylvania State Grange.
Farmers' Society of Equity.

This conservative group believe in the old line methods of farmer co-operation in self-help. To a large extent they avoid the use of governmental machinery, seeking rather to build up their co-operative efforts on the basis of private ownership in the means of production and distribution. They publish great newspapers which state their cause. They have recently erected in Washington a temple of agriculture. All of this is eloquent of a developing farmers' group with conservative tendencies in American life.

Over against this conservative group is a more radical series of organizations which have combined in what is known as the Farmers' National Council. This Council is made up of the following organizations:

American Society of Equity.
Nebraska Farmers' Union.
North Carolina Farmers' Union.
National Gleaner Federation.
State Granges of Washington, Colorado, Oregon, and Idaho.

With this organization, in more or less close federation, works the National Nonpartisan League. All of them together claiming a membership of about seven hundred and fifty thousand farmers. Two of the leaders in the National Council are Mr. George P. Hampton and Mr. Benjamin C. Marsh, who is a graduate of Grinnell College of the class of 1898, and a postgraduate of the University of Chicago in the Department of Economics and Politics. Many of the leaders in the Nonpartisan League are college men, one of their leading editors being a graduate of Colorado College. The League has recently nominated for the United States Senate, President Ladd of the State Agricultural College of North Dakota.

THE QUESTION AT ISSUE

The question at issue between the conservative majority and the radical minority is quite largely the question of how far our government should enter the realm of production, distribution and finance, and use government machinery in competition with private capital. If one believes that to take political machinery which is largely set up for the purpose of the expression of public opinion in political action and consequently was made for the "talkers" and to use it for doing the economic work of the country will result in filling our economic life full of "talkers" instead of "workers," he will probably fight the radical minority.

If, on the other hand, he believes that our government long ago entered the field of economics when it erected the protective tariff to protect the New England manufacturer, when it built state docks to enable the manufacturer to market his goods, he will not feel that organizations which favor the Plumb Plan and the building of state elevators are necessarily starting any great innovation in American life.

When he realizes that most of the farmers' successful social experience during the last generation has come to him through governmental help in teaching him how to cultivate his fields, in bringing to him a knowledge of the markets and in the introduction of better grades of live stock, he will not be surprised if the farmers say, "The government has helped us in production. Why should not it help us in our problems of distribution and marketing?"

The issue between these groups is not an issue concerning the right of private property. All farmers want to own their land whether they belong to the radical or the conservative group. That there should be a growing number, however, who believe that governmental machinery can be rightly used to furnish to the farmer advantages which have never been secured through private capital is a logical development from some very successful experiences which the farmer has been having in the recent past.

The Nonpartisan League is an organization of farmers copied after the Anti-saloon League. It has as its purpose the securing of legislation advantageous to the farmer through both political parties. Like the Anti-saloon League it has been successful in getting results for the farmers. It now exists in some seven or eight states in the Northwest. Just because the League has been successful in securing a good deal of legislation which has disturbed the sense of security of the millers and the bankers and other allied interests, it has been the object of bitter attack. Most of these attacks have been petty and have centered around non-essential phases of the issue which is simply stated "The modern issue between private capital and public ownership of the means of distribution."

THE CHURCH AND THE FARMERS' ORGANIZATION

As individuals the members of our churches will and ought to decide as to the relative merits of the two types of leadership in American life. It is not, however, for the Church as an organization to take sides in this matter. It will probably live to regret it at no distant day, if it finds itself aligned against either the conservative or the radical group among the farmers. It is rather the business of the Church to work for those deep, underlying virtues and enthusiasms which must be the undergirding of any great industrial order. The values of character grow more and more important as our social order becomes more complex. If we are to have state owned elevators, then by all means we need Christian men in political life. If we are to have a co-operative social order, the great virtues of friendliness, self-control, and the love for justice are basic in such an order. The Church has its work to do through all the turning and overturning of human society.

International Council Jottings

How did every speaker on internationalism overlook this pertinent quotation:

> That man's the true cosmopolite
> Who loves his native country best.

A prominent figure on the platform was Rev. W. C. Willoughby, who attended faithfully to his duties as one of the vice-moderators, and whose service to the Council was considerable in more ways than one. He was elected as a representative of South Africa, where he has spent most of his life as a missionary. At present, however, he is head of the Africa Department in the Kennedy School of Missions at Hartford. He was an official delegate from Britain, being one of the four specially representing the London Missionary Society.

One of the British delegates brought this exquisite story: He was traveling recently on a St. Lawrence steamer on his way to the Council. Suddenly he remembered the tragic circumstances connected with the death several years ago of Rev. Silvester Horne. Addressing the captain one day he asked, "Do you happen to remember, Captain, the death a few years ago on one of these St. Lawrence River boats of an English preacher named Silvester Horne?" The captain answered quietly but with deep feeling, "I certainly do remember. It was on this very boat." He then proceeded to show the English visitor the precise spot where the saintly man fell. "I chanced to see him fall and ran toward him. He died instantly. His wife holding his head called out in agony, 'Are you dead?' An instant later she turned to me, 'Captain, is my husband really dead?' I shook my head yes and ordered some sailors to carry the body into my cabin. Come on in, I want you to see the cabin." As the clergyman entered the captain's room, he noticed as one of the most conspicuous objects in the room a beautifully framed photograph of the deceased prophet. Then he resumed the story: "But when we brought his body into this cabin, that was not the end of the tale. Mrs. Horne came in and immediately kneeled down beside his body. I was standing near. She turned to me and commanded, 'Captain, you must kneel.' I was not a kneeling man—in fact I was altogether indifferent to religion. But I hesitated only a second, then knelt. Her prayer was the simplest, most beautiful, most natural prayer I ever heard. She mentioned all the children by name, the church and various causes that had been dear to her husband's heart. Do you know? I have never been able to escape from that prayer. It brought me to Christ. I am now a confessed Christian, and whenever I can I attend the little church of which I have become a member. I was Silvester Horne's last convert."

Overturning and Hope in Mexico

A Cheering View of the Situation

By Rev. John Howland, D.D.

Missionary of the American Board

A thoughtful Mexican, who is not directly connected with any of the political parties, recently affirmed in private conversation that the last change of government in Mexico was a much more trustworthy expression of the popular opinion of that country than any vote could be. This statement may be rather startling, but it doubtless contains much truth. Mexico is not in a condition yet to give voice by means of the ballot to any decided conviction. The system of popular election is so new and has been so persistently abused that the masses of the people either refrain from taking part or easily become the prey of shrewd politicians. On the other hand, while this last revolution had the appearance of a purely military movement and there was little of the popular agitation that marked the downfall of the Diaz régime, it was the expression of a general and profound dissatisfaction with the government and of stern resolve to submit to no attempts to defeat the free expression of the will of the people.

Carranza's Unpopularity

The rapidity with which this revolution accomplished its main object was a surprise even to those who were most active in it. Carranza's government was never really popular. He was elected because he had stayed by the revolutionary movement without becoming involved in complications which had eliminated others who might have been candidates. While it is true that he had mainly dominated the situation and that the disturbances during the latter part of his rule were largely due to men who had really degenerated into bandits, it is also true that he obtained little loyalty except from those for whose direct interest it was to retain his favor.

The Genesis of the Revolt

It is impossible to be certain as to the real genesis of the revolutionary movement. Many think that Carranza deliberately prepared to involve matters so that it would be impossible for any one to be elected or at least take possession of the government in order that there would be an apparent necessity for him to continue in office indefinitely. This, however, seems doubtful. It is reported, on what seems good authority, that Carranza sent confidential agents to the United States, England, France and Spain to sound the feeling of those high in government circles as to acceptable candidates for the presidency of Mexico. This rumor states that Obregón was not acceptable because he was considered to have been pro-German in sympathy during the world war; that Pablo González was deemed unadvisable as being a possible tool of Roman Catholic influences; that all approved of Bonillas, and that Carranza was making it so far as he could, impossible either for Obregón or González to become a candidate. It seems, however, almost incredible that, with the native shrewdness he showed in much of his course, he should not have realized that, while Mexico is tired of revolutions, the one thing it would not permit was what is called an "imposition."

How the Revolution Started

The spark that started the explosion seems to have been as much accidental as intentional. Obregón was summoned from the northern part of the country where he was stumping for his candidacy, to explain charges of connivance with some of the rebels against the government. There is some doubt as to the authenticity of the evidence on which these charges were made. At the most the thing affirmed was that he was in correspondence with some of the rebels and arranging that if he were elected they would cease their hostile attitude. The charges fairly considered, therefore, hardly referred to anything treasonable.

A report reached Obregón's State of Sonora that he had been arrested and was being brought a prisoner to Mexico City on false charges and that he was likely to meet the fate of Madero. Sonora was already on the brink of revolt in protest against governmental interference in the elections and especially to resist a direct attack on the sovereignty of the state by the sending of a strong column under General Diéguez, who was a bitter enemy of Obregón and whose methods have always been drastic and cruel. There may have been a more or less complete understanding among the leaders in the different states that under certain conditions all would rise in arms. But it seems more probable that the movement was largely spontaneous. It was remarkably rapid and news came daily of new adhesions to it. And it was accomplished, in almost every case, with little or no bloodshed.

ADOLFO DE LA HUERTA
President of Mexico

Carranza's Flight

Convinced at last that it would be impossible to hold the City of Mexico, Carranza decided to transfer the seat of government to Vera Cruz, as he had done once before in the earlier days of the revolution. His arrangements might be termed stupendous. About three hundred cars, loaded to their full capacity, left the city; the last detachment, including the President and his Cabinet, on the seventh of May. A considerable part of Congress and the higher courts and the heads of most of the departments accompanied the President. They had a considerable force of infantry, cavalry and artillery. All the public funds that could be secured were taken, all the material of the mint, and enough of the machinery to leave the offices dismantled.

It was known that the track had been torn up but material was carried on the trains and it was probably expected that, by protecting the workers with machine guns and cannon, repairs could be made and the expedition reach its destination. It is persistently reported that the President counted on the loyalty of a general who was in command of a considerable force about half way to the coast. But this man had joined the new movement and offered stubborn resistance to the troops accompanying the President.

The trains were attacked before they were fairly out of the city and soon found themselves more or less completely surrounded. It became impossible to secure not only oil for the engines but even water for the boilers except as the civilians with buckets took the rain water from the ditches. Although large supplies of provisions had been taken, those were exhausted and the situation became impossible. Many of the troops and civilians deserted. Just before the final and successful assault the President and a few who accompanied him abandoned the trains and took to the mountains. The final scenes must have been tragic. Boxes of coin were burst open and soldiers and others helped themselves by handfuls. Many of those who left took all they were able to carry.

The Occupation of the Capital

A few hours after the President left the city, General González entered it on one side and General Obregón came in next morning from another direction. They at once took charge of affairs and there was no disorder whatever in the city. Some business houses were closed for the day for fear of what might happen, but there was no shooting and people were on the street as usual. From the first very definite orders were sent to those attacking the trains to take all possible care to preserve the life of President Carranza. Repeated offers of safe exit from the country were made to him, but he refused to accept.

The assassination came as a sad surprise, and has not been fully explained. As would be inevitable in such a case, many will doubtless always believe that it was arranged by those high in authority, but that seems hardly probable. It looks more like a bit of private vengeance, or possibly the act of one who thought he would thus gain fame and favor. Governor De la Huerta, who by the so-called plan of Agua Prieta was declared chief of the revolutionary movement, summoned Congress to meet and was formally elected President to fill out Carranza's term, which ends with the first of December of this year. Meanwhile the permanent commission of Congress, which has power to act during a recess, had decided not to take action but to concur in the action of a full Congress, so that all the legal requisites have been carefully fulfilled. Governor De la Huerta was formally inaugurated June 1; and the new government seems to have started remarkably well. It is trying to check up and remedy, as far as possible, former abuses; looking for cars, automobiles, typewriters and other things that were the property of the nation and had been sold or borrowed. It is also endeavoring to improve the monetary situation, which has been very trying on account of the lack of small change which had been cornered and held at a premium as high as fifteen per cent. by men who are called "coyotes."

The Candidates

González has formally withdrawn his candidacy and announced his intention of retiring to private life. This leaves only one candidate in the field. Nearly all who had been in rebellion against the government have laid down their arms. There was hope that even Villa would do so, but that now seems doubtful. The recovery in many things is already remarkable. Trains are running nearly everywhere, making continuous trips instead of spending the nights in the large cities, as they have been doing for some years past. Most of them are reported to be moving with no military guard, for the first time in ten years.

Elections have been postponed until September in order to give Obregón and González (if he wishes) an opportunity to comply with the Constitutional requirement that no one can be a candidate unless he has been out of the army at least ninety days before the election. Those who are in touch with leaders high in office and influence seem to be confident that the lessons of the past have been learned and that many former mistakes will be avoided.

The expressions of purpose by De la Huerta and Obregón are encouraging as indicating an effort to establish and preserve friendly relations with all countries, to promote internal reforms and national development in every possible way. The events of the coming six months will be watched with deep interest and there seems to be abundant reason for awaiting developments with a good measure of hope and confidence.

The Two Boston Councils

By William E. Barton

Of the four International Councils, I have attended three. The Council we have just held in Boston was a much better Council than that held in Edinburgh twelve years before. That Council labored under very great disadvantages. It was held in a Presbyterian city, and made little local impression. There was some sort of strife on between the followers of Peter Forsyth and Reginald Campbell, and the purpose of the makers of the program seemed to be to certify that Campbell had no rightful place in British Congregationalism. So Forsyth was given twice as long a time for his paper as other men on the program, and Campbell got no nearer to the Council than the front door where newsboys stood trying to give away his paper. The first Council, held in London, I did not attend. The real comparison, of course, is between the two Boston Councils, that of 1899 and that of 1920.

As I recall the Council of 1899, I am struck by the fact that we had then a group of outstanding leaders such as did not seem to me to be present in the same number in 1920. Then we had from England, Prin. A. M. Fairbairn, Dr. Alexander Mackennal, Rev. Sylvester Horne, Dr. John Brown, the successor and biographer of Bunyan, Sir Albert Spicer, and the rest. From the American group we missed in 1920 Samuel B. Capen, Gov. Roger Wolcott, Prof. George P. Fisher, Drs. F. A. Noble, Washington Gladden, Amory H. Bradford, R. S. Storrs, A. H. Plumb, A. J. Lyman, R. A. Meredith and others. I do not think we had as many leaders of the first magnitude in 1920 as we had in 1899.

We had no discussion in the main meeting in 1920. There was neither time nor place for it. There was not much discussion in 1899, but there was a little. We had a lively tilt in 1899 between President Hyde of Bowdoin, who told what poor work the theological seminaries did upon the students whom the colleges turned over to them, and a group of seminary professors who indignantly told Dr. Hyde what poor material the colleges turned out into the divinity schools. There was no opportunity for any little affair of this kind in 1920.

The recent Council was defective in social features. Boston homes are fewer, and delegates were farther scattered. But in 1899 there was a notable reception at the Hotel Vendome, an official reception at the State House, an organ recital at Shawmut Church, and greatest of all, a dinner given by the Congregational Club of Boston in Music Hall with memorable addresses. Where was the Boston Congregational Club in 1920?

The excursions of 1920 were good, especially that to Plymouth; but no Council will ever have such a series of excursions as William F. Whittemore and his committee planned and carried out in 1899. The Plymouth trip, the Salem trip, the Harbor excursions, the City of Boston furnishing the boats, the Tally-ho trips (we had no automobiles then) were wonders.

The worst thing about the Council of 1920, was, of course, Mechanics Hall. That was a mistake. Tremont Temple should have been engaged for all the principal meetings. Yet it is due the committee of arrangements to remember that it was the engagement of Mechanics Hall with its abundant room which gave them courage to invite every Congregational Church to send accredited delegates, and that was an admirable feature.

A GROUP OF JAPANESE DELEGATES AND THEIR AMERICAN FRIENDS

This Council was far better presided over than that of 1899. President Angell was a great and good man, but he held a feeble gavel, and the Council ran upon no schedule. This one, admirably presided over by Dr. James L. Barton, kept to its schedule all the way through. We were due to close at five o'clock; and when we rose for the closing prayer, I looked at my watch and it was 4.47. The prayer, I judge, was about three minutes in length.

This Council had a sustained interest from the beginning to the end. There was no fraying out of enthusiasm. Every seat in the Old South was filled and scores were standing in the aisles when the Council came to its close.

The Sectional Meetings, which have come in through our experience in the National Council, were largely attended, and very profitable. The discussions covered a wide range and those that I attended seemed to me to be of high order and large interest.

There was a note of deep seriousness in the addresses and papers, such as could not have been normally present in the addresses and papers of 1899. But there was no tone of pessimism. It was a sober but courageous Council. It was a body of men face to face with mighty tasks, and loyal to them, and undismayed by them.

There were no really poor addresses. If the Council lacked the outstanding leaders of twenty-one years ago, it had, I think, a higher average of thoughtfulness on the part of its speakers. I can remember one unfortunate address in Edinburgh, and two in Boston in 1899, and I have heard of two in London at the first Council, no one of which was duplicated in its essential elements of failure at Boston in 1920.

It was a Council that demanded practical results. It adopted a new Constitution looking for a little more perfect type of organization, and the possibility of international denominational work. It strengthened the bonds that unite us to Congregationalists the world around, and knit closer the union of English-speaking peoples.

The Committee on Resolutions had all the problems which confronted the corresponding committees of the Republican party at Chicago and the Democrats at San Francisco. Prohibition and the League of Nations were with us, as with them, the crucial questions. The American delegates were divided on the League of Nations, and the British delegates were opposed to the indorsement of Prohibition, while Australia wanted Prohibition and nothing short of it, and in America it was an accomplished fact so far as the decision of the Supreme Court could make it so. The Council approved the League of Nations, but made room for all the reservations which the President and Senate can agree upon and the rest of the world approve. As for Prohibition, the report of the committee speaks for itself.

Yes, it was a vastly better Council than that at Edinburgh, and does not suffer greatly by comparison with that in Boston in 1899.

AT GRAVE OF GOVERNOR BRADFORD IN PLYMOUTH

What the Visitors Thought

By One of Them

In a recent issue of The Congregationalist we are told that the British and Australian religious papers will now be eagerly awaited on this side because American Congregationalists will there learn exactly what their visitors thought about them. May a Britisher who is left behind for a time give his impressions, and, taking his life in his hands, do so with complete candor?

The warning given by the paragrapher in The Congregationalist will not, of course, pass unheeded, for we all recognize that in a few short weeks very little of American life can be seen, and therefore generalizations, always dangerous, are specially so in these circumstances. To sum up one's impressions of American Congregationalism is almost as difficult a task as that of the boy—this story was told at the Council, but as your readers did not hear it, it may be repeated—of six, the product of one of our Primary Departments, who was busily engaged one day with pencil and paper. "What are you doing, Johnny?" said his mother, and the boy replied, "Drawing God." "But you can't draw God," his mother said, "nobody knows what God is like," and the unabashed Johnny answered, "They will when this is finished!" I do not imagine that you will know what America is like at the end of this sketch, but you will at least have one visitor's impressions.

Englishmen who crossed the Atlantic came with great ideas of American hospitality and American hustle. They had been led to expect that America was a machine—a rapid escalator—but a machine run by men and women with open homes and warm hearts. They return with the same notions still in their minds, though they are now inclined to believe that in attempting too many things and things too ambitious (dare I say Mechanics Hall?) Americans do not get through as much and they do not carry it out as well as they would if their plans were more modest and their efforts more concentrated. This hustle at first somewhat disconcerted visitors with Americans in the mass almost as much as they were delighted with them as individuals. The casual "off-hand" American manner, combined with the muddle which heralded the arrival of the major British party—I was not a member of it, so I can speak freely—was disturbing at first, but was it not caused by the fact that some overburdened persons with the best intentions were trying to do more than mortal men could do? Thus it was that while American homes were longing for British visitors in vain, and those visitors desired nothing so much as to see the inside of American home life, they were crowded together in a manner reminiscent of college days in a fellowship which, although altogether delightful, had nothing distinctly American about it.

But when things settled themselves out, and you got to know men, how warm-hearted the American was, how kind and hospitable the Bostonian hostess, how restful the American home. When the I. C. F. gathered together, and when Yale invited Oxford to tea, when American ministers took their British brethren to Concord and Lexington in their autos and chaffed them about "where the British ran away," we began to realize that what we had been told about American kindness was not exaggerated. We sailed from England intensely interested in two great questions of the day—Prohibition and the attitude of the American people to a League of Nations.

We did not find it as easy to get drink as we had been led to believe. That does not imply, as the casual reader may think, that our knights and baronets and Doctors of Divinity went on a long search for champagne—it simply means that we had been told again and again that it was just as easy to obtain "booze" as before Prohibition, and we found the statement untrue. We were delighted to discover that reasoned opinion believed that Prohibition's results were so obviously beneficial that it had come to stay, and we were interested in the frequent reports of empty jails, and of women who, for the first time in their lives, were not afraid of public holidays coming round.

The views of New England Congregationalists concerning a League of Nations were much what we expected them to be, though the depth of the resentment at Mr. Wilson's autocratic rule was a surprise to us. We had felt—and we feel still—that the President had stated for the whole world the idealist attitude in a way in which no other statesman could, or would, or dare do, and while we recognize the force of all that is to be said concerning his mistaken methods of making the ideal actual, we believe that history will place Woodrow Wilson far higher in its roll of great men than most of his countrymen do today.

And that leads me to mention a feature of American life about which your visitors remarked again and again. What keen politicians you all are, and especially your ministers! Possibly the approach of the presidential election accounts for it, but it seemed to us as if American ministers were quite obsessed by the political situation. They would go miles out of their way in a speech to make some very controversial party point, and the only times the Council was moved to anything like a demonstration was by political utterances. One morning an American minister I did not know, said, "May I speak to you for five minutes?" "Certainly," I said. Beginning with the statement that the British delegation failed entirely to understand the attitude of the American people to the League, he continued for more than five minutes to show that of all men who had ever led a people to destruction (King John, Charles I. and even George III. seemed to be angels of light in comparison) there was none so base and none so vile as Woodrow Wilson! And he said never a word about Congregationalism, or the churches, or the Council, or his own work.

And this emphasis on current events, shows itself in the pulpit as well as on the platform and in conversation. If there is one thing that distinguishes American and British preaching, it is, broadly speaking, that the first is topical and social, the second, expository and—it is hard to find the word to express it—fundamental. The British preacher generally starts from the Bible and from Christian doctrine to apply his message to modern life, the American often begins and ends with modern life, leaving the Christian basis to be assumed. A visitor to this country a short time ago called one morning on a ministerial friend and found him just starting out in his automobile, with the words: "Pardon me. No time this morning. Doing the dust-bins of the city. Preaching on them on Sunday."

A pertinent subject, and no doubt a useful sermon, but only an American preacher would have approached the subject in the same way.

If one might venture to say so after but a few weeks' experience, basing the statement on visits to churches and conversations with many from pulpit and pew alike, there is in New England a real desire that the Gospel for today should more clearly spring from the Eternal Gospel, there is an intense longing for the Water of Life which makes men never to thirst again. Time and again people have said: "How evangelical you Englishmen are! What earnestness you have! How you bring Christ into all your messages!" Well, the thing we have most regretted in the Old Country is that there was so little of the Gospel note in our preaching, so little of the passion for souls, of that fervent enthusiasm which draws and wins men. If, however, the Council has done something to show that the passion is there and that it can be fused with culture, and the Divine Gospel brought to bear with power on the perplexing problems of modern life, it will have served a most useful purpose.

But if American Congregationalism can learn from us in some ways, there is no doubt at all that she has much to teach us, and especially so in the way of church administration. We do not covet her quartets, or even her $10,000 ministers, but her system of church finance is generations ahead of ours, while the Board of Pastoral Supply meets—and, I should say, meets admirably—a great need.

And, outside church life too, we have much to learn. We smiled when first we saw American newspapers, and you, like us, have papers of which we both must needs be ashamed. But the prominent place given to educational and religious affairs in your daily press is a thing that we know not, and it is an indication that New England recognizes that religion and learning are vital for the future of the race. I go to Harvard, and there, in spite of its great attraction, I miss the tradition and atmosphere of Oxford—the red brick offends the eye that has come to assume that the buildings of a home of learning must be centuries old—and then I think of all the benefactions to Harvard, an unceasing stream, and I wish that my countrymen would put education in the same high place that Americans do. Right away from kindergarten to university, New England stresses the value and importance of education, while we leave it almost in the backwater of life. Here surely is the secret of your country's most remarkable achievement—a source of continual amazement to the visitor—I mean the way in which she can take in immigrants from every land, assimilate and absorb them, and in a generation turn out their children good Americans. The other day I went to the graduation exercises in a small grammar school. The items were mostly concerned with the story of the Pilgrims; "The Courtship of Miles Standish" was dramatized, and John Boyle O'Reilly's poem declaimed. And about half the children who took part were Roman Catholics, and their parents came from every European land. But they rejoiced in a grand and glorious history, and they were on the way to becoming good American citizens.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

Sunday is the only day some business men have with their families: why not spend part of it with them in the family pew?

What did your visitors think of you? They were impressed with a country of vast distances and many varieties, a country of untold resources and magnificent opportunities, a country with a glorious history and children brought up to know it and be proud of it, a country that, without doubt, can determine the future of the world for good or evil for the next two or three hundred years. They found its churches alive and their people friendly, and they rejoiced that the young men, above all, were anxious to stand shoulder to shoulder with their British brothers to sweep away all misunderstanding, suspicion, and prejudice and keep the world at peace.

And they had such a good time that all of them talk of returning some day, and some are coming back next year. ALBERT PEEL.

On a Summer Sunday

A Brooklyn Preacher in Boston

To fill a city church on such a summer morning bespeaks two things—a body of church members interested in their church with an all-around-the-year interest, and a preacher capable of bringing a valid, challenging message.

So ran my thoughts as I sat, waiting for the service to begin, in Mount Vernon Church where Rev. Richard Roberts, pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y., is preaching during the months of July and August.

Through the open doors came the steady whirring of the endless stream of automobiles passing along Massachusetts Ave. over Harvard Bridge. The air was clear and cool, the sun bright, the sky deep blue with tumbled clouds. The day called lustily for folk to go adventuring in the open air.

But inside the church the congregation steadily increased. Some of the people coming in smiled brightly at each other—the habitual attendants I guessed them to be, and made a mental note that the first of my conditions, active loyalty, seemed to be fulfilled. Others looked vaguely about them with an appraising air that marked them as strangers in the church. There were a surprisingly large number of young people. It was such a congregation as gathers only in the expectation of hearing something worth while. Before Mr. Roberts was well launched on his sermon I was convinced that their expectations were to be fulfilled.

He is a tall, spare man, with keen, piercing eyes, sensitive mouth, large, capable hands, and a pleasing flavor of Welsh in his accent. He is a Welshman by birth, and his experience with Welsh churches, both in Wales and in London, is not many years behind him.

His summer message is one full of significance for these times and for this country. He sums it up briefly in three propositions: 1. The greater part of man's life is lived in a world which is unseen. 2. It is the business of man to live in two worlds at the same time, the seen world and the unseen world. The business of religion is to make this possible. 3. The end of all life is to express itself in beauty.

The sermon of the day dealt with the second of these propositions—Living in Two Worlds at the Same Time. Life is not to be lived entirely on the Mount of Transfiguration as the mystic would live it, said Mr. Roberts, nor yet entirely in the dark valley of human need and human sin, but in an endless pilgrimage back and forth between the two, until the distance dwindles and the two worlds become so intertwined that one may see

"——— the traffic of Jacob's ladder Pitched betwixt Heaven and Charing Cross."

Delivered with fiery earnestness which expressed itself in gestures rough sometimes but always forceful, the sermon carried the atmosphere of long studious days and wide familiarity with history and letters. But its chief power lay in its sheer sincerity, in the conviction that the man spoke from his own experience, that he himself lives familiarly and habitually in the Two Worlds that supplement each other in making up the full Christian life.

Mount Vernon Church is fortunate in having such a preacher this summer. If you are in Boston during August it will pay you to hear him. H. F. M.

"Brown of Ceylon"

One of the gravest losses that has befallen the Ceylon Mission of the American Board was the death, March 12, of Rev. Giles G. Brown after twenty years of successful and varied service. Mr. Brown, of Canadian birth and Oberlin and Andover Seminary training, was first stationed at Udupiddi and did especially fine constructive work in the educational work of that station with its 4,000 village school children and large boarding school for girls. In 1908, however, he became president of Jaffna College, reorganizing the college courses, trebling its attendance, and placing it on a sound financial basis.

All the time he wanted to do direct evangelistic service and after he returned from furlough in 1918 he plunged into that work—house to house visitation and general personal work. Up and down the hot sandy roads he went, preaching, teaching and advising, but because of lack of transportation he could not get back each night to the coolness and healthful location of the mission houses and was not strong enough to resist the enteric fever which seized upon him. After an illness of two or three weeks he suffered a paralytic shock and died without regaining consciousness.

To the mission he was a leader, thinker and sympathetic co-laborer; the Tamil people, Christian and Hindu, rich and poor, high caste and low caste, crowded to the house to express their sorrow and sense of loss at his going.

His funeral was held in the historic old Uduvil church, and he lies buried in the Uduvil cemetery "in the row," as one of the missionaries writes, "with Miss Agnew and Father and Mother Howland"—those other "saints removed" from the Ceylon Mission.

WHAT THE CHRISTIAN WORLD IS DOING

Major Axton Selected as Chief of Chaplains

CHAPLAIN JOHN T. AXTON

THE news of the selection of Major John T. Axton as Chief of Chaplains in the United States comes as a source of gratification to a large circle of friends throughout the country. Many of them are ex-service men who have a deep feeling of gratitude for Major Axton for his activities in their behalf during the war at the port of embarkation at Hoboken, N. J. Here he had the direction of all religious work and welfare activities connected with the port, his duties taking him to embarkation camps, hospitals, and army transports. Chaplain Axton was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal for exceptional efficiency in organizing and directing these activities at Hoboken, in which 166 chaplains of different denominations, besides hundreds of civilian workers, were employed. He is a Congregational minister, his only pastorate having been at Salt Lake City. In 1902 he entered the army as chaplain, and now, after eighteen years of service, he becomes, through the selection of the War Department and the President of the United States, Chief of Chaplains, with the rank of colonel. Under the provisions of the Army Reorganization Act, the Chief of Chaplains is detailed to that work for a period of four years. His duties will include investigation into the qualifications of candidates for appointment as chaplain and general co-ordination and supervision of the work of chaplains.

Back from Switzerland

SECRETARY William E. Strong, of the American Board, returned on the Aquitania July 24, from a brief visit to Europe, where he attended the International Missionary Conference held at Crans, Switzerland, from June 22 to 28. Some forty representatives of eleven different countries and of various missionary bodies were present. Mr. J. H. Oldham acted as secretary, Bishop Root as presiding officer. Germans, French, English, Canadians, Ameri- at Crans, Switzerland, from June 22 to 28. The Harvard Summer School of Theology

THE Harvard Summer School of Theology, which closed on July 23, proved successful beyond all expectation. It will be remembered that the Faculty of the Harvard Divinity School maintained a three weeks' summer session, primarily for ministers and social workers, for the 12 years from 1899 to 1910. The school was then dropped, chiefly because of the difficulty of financing it, for, though the attendance was fairly satisfactory, there was a considerable deficit year by year. The proposal that it should be revived this summer was reinforced by the offer of the Unitarian Laymen's League to pay the $15 tuition fee of any Unitarian minister wishing to attend, and, in addition, one-half of his fee for room and board in the dormitory set aside for the school, and one-half of his railway travel. This offer, which practically assured the school of sufficient numbers to enable it to meet expenses, was eagerly accepted by about 100 Unitarian ministers from all parts of the country, many of whom were accompanied by their wives. Besides this group, there were more than 50 ministers of 10 other denominations in attendance, Congregationalists and Episcopalians being most numerous. The total registration was 152, 50 per cent. larger than ever before. In other words, the denominational representation was about the same as formerly, except for the unusual number of Unitarians, brought through the generous invitation of their laymen.

An Attractive List of Lecturers

THE success of the Harvard Summer School of Theology was not, however, merely a matter of numbers, for it was notable for the high standard of lectures by men of very various outlooks and widely divergent views, and for the eager and sustained interest on the part of the "students." Among the lecturers were Dean Platner of Andover Seminary, Dr. James L. Barton, Dr. F. E. Emrich, Rev. W. A. Sperry, President Horr of Newton, Rev. H. S. Coffin of New York, Prof. E. S. Brightman of Boston University, Dr. Crothers of Cambridge, and others, in addition to the Harvard group, among whom were included Dean Fenn, Prof. F. G. Peabody, Dr. A. T. Davison, the organist at Appleton Chapel, Professors Carver, Lake, and Perry, and Dean H. W. Holmes of the School of Education. In its selection of lecturers the school may fairly be said to have lived up to its standards for excellence and for catholicity of outlook. The school again proved to be a great opportunity for ministers to gain fresh intellectual and spiritual stimulus, lifting them out of their ruts. And the element of comradeship, promoted by the occupancy of Standish Hall as the school dormitory, and by eating together in the dining hall, was invaluable, especially for men in small or isolated parishes. Congregationalist found himself next Episcopalian, Unitarian beside Presbyterian, Baptist by Methodist—and all heard the great problems of the religious and social life discussed as matters of common interest, on a plane lifted high above the denominational issues which divide the Christian world. There is no better way to promote a good understanding among the churches, to advance unity of spirit in the bond of peace. And it may well be asked if the laymen of any church can better invest their money than by making it possible for their ministers to accept such opportunities.

Dr. Meyer's Jubilee

THE Rev. F. B. Meyer, D. D., pastor of Christ Church, London, for most of the time during the last thirty years, and author of many popular devotional books, received notable tributes when he celebrated his fiftieth year in the ministry a few weeks ago. The Archbishop of Canterbury sent a letter appreciating Dr. Meyer's influence in London. Dr. Stuart Holden and Dr. Jowett uttered their felicitations in person, and the church treasurer handed Dr. Meyer a check for £350 pounds, contributed by four hundred admirers in sums ranging from three pence upward. He has announced his resignation, to take place December 31.

The tri-national celebrations of the Pilgrim migration go on. Southampton, England, has just been calling attention to its history as the starting point of the Mayflower voyage by an enthusiastic ceremony of remembrance and pageants of the embarkation. The English Plymouth, from which the final start was made after the first mishaps of the voyage, is equally concerned to assert its interest. At home we have been surprised to note how widely the tercentenary has taken hold of the imagination of teachers and been celebrated in plays and pageants which must have cost much labor and drawn upon a great fund of latent enthusiasm. Many different parts of the country, all classes of our population, and different types of religious tradition have had a part in these celebrations. One was recently held and awakened wide popular interest, for example, in Memphis, Tennessee, at a tri-state fair representing Arkansas, Mississippi, and Tennessee, showing how widespread is the appropriation and appreciation of Pilgrim interest in communities which in the past have seemed rather remote from the Pilgrim tradition.

A Summer School for Christian Living

A new venture in out-of-door work is being undertaken this summer by the City Missionary Society of Boston in a camp on Pomp's Pond, in the beautiful town of Andover, only twenty-three miles out of the city. This year, from June 28 to July 12, boys from fifteen through eighteen years of age were in camp. From July 13 to July 27, boys from twelve through fourteen years took their places. From July 28 on, girls of corresponding ages will be given the same opportunity.

POMP'S POND, ANDOVER, MASS.

Where Boston City Missionary Society is giving boys and girls a wholesome vacation

The idea of such a camp originated with Rev. A. Sidney Lovett, minister of Mt. Vernon Church, Boston, who was quick to realize not only the need of city boys and girls having the advantage of the best sort of a vacation in the country but also two other very fundamental needs, the development of the stronger virtues of Christian leadership and a democratic sense of solidarity among the young people who must be the future leaders in the Boston churches. The camp is in no sense an ordinary fresh air proposition. The boys and girls all pay six dollars a week toward their board. To be sure, the churches and the City Missionary Society see that no worthy one is kept away for lack of funds, but nobody knows who such are, as everybody pays his money himself.

Mr. F. H. Foster, an active member in the Old South Church, Andover, placed an ideal site for the camp at the disposal of the society, and no pains has been spared to develop it in the most thorough-going fashion. The buildings were designed without charge by Mr. Derby of Derby and Robinson, architects, and everybody has vied with his neighbor in generosity to insure the successful carrying out of a perfect camp. Town water has been installed, sanitation is pronounced without a flaw, and Dr. W. G. Walker of the Andover committee generously gives the most careful medical supervision.

The personnel at camp is especially strong. Rev. Frederic B. Withington, who goes to Phillips Exeter this fall as chaplain, is in charge. He is a famous Harvard athlete and knows just how to manage boys. He is assisted by special counsellors from the colleges and by the representatives from the churches who accompany their boys.

When the girls are there, Miss Esther Parker of Winchester, a graduate of Abbott Academy, a most successful church school worker, with an experience in Y. M. C. A. canteen work abroad, is in charge of girls' activities, with a splendid corps of counsellors.

The camp routine includes lessons in nature study, swimming, and camp service, as well as the most effective sort of religious training. The two events which compare in response with the call to swimming are the calls to the "password" and the "camp fire services." The "password" service comes in the morning. Here one of the counsellors selects a sentence, often from the Bible and always worth while, which becomes the password for the day. He speaks briefly on its meaning and there are hymns and a prayer. In the evening at eight o'clock the camp fire is lighted and the boys gather around in a natural amphitheater for stunts, songs, and a talk, which vary from a travelogue to the deepest sort of an inspirational message. The meetings always close with one verse of "Abide With Me" and the Lord's Prayer.

It has been a problem for the society to keep the camp true to its purpose and to avoid too rapid expansion. The expense has been great and of course more money is constantly needed. Mr. Samuel F. Wilkins, the treasurer, will gratefully receive any donations. Two generous friends are already planning to build memorial bungalows next year, and every plan is being laid for an increasingly useful camp which, within a few years, will be open to all the Congregational churches of Boston and vicinity, and which will become a veritable power house for Christian faith. It supplements splendidly the work at Rosemary Cottage, where the society sends mothers and small children and there not only gives them a needed and a joyous vacation, but quietly instills the essentials of Christian home life to bear fruit later, under the fostering care of the churches and our missionaries, in the finest sort of character.

What Other Editors are Saying

The Primary Duty of the Churches

Of course, the primary job of the churches is to conserve and impart religion. What they do in the line of "good works," so-called, though important and beneficial, is all secondary to the duty of holding, realizing and imparting the faith. Their great office is to connect things visible with things unseen. If they don't do that, all their organization for benevolences, and all the dollars they entice from submissive contributors won't save them from failure as churches. Their award is spiritual. It cannot be accomplished by mere material activities, though such activities are bound to follow if the spiritual errand really prospers.—Life.

Fruits of Prohibition

Prohibition in the United States is bearing its fruits with surprising rapidity, but perhaps not more quickly than was expected by discerning people who saw its deeper significance. Some of the fruitage is shown by this statement of the business manager and vice-president of the United Press Association: "Never in the history of the press has intelligence been so greatly in demand as now. Prohibition is partly responsible." The journalist then says: "Another reason is that the public, awakening to the existence and effects of propaganda, has put the press on trial. There is an increasing demand that stories be written with sincerity and with intelligence, and that they be well written." A little bird might say that what the journalist calls "another reason" is really only the first again, namely prohibition, since the very thing that makes newspaper men wider awake and therefore able to raise the standard of intelligence required in journalism is also making the public more alert, so that the mass of the people can now detect the subtleties of propaganda, which before had deceived them all too easily. —Christian Science Monitor.

John P. Sanderson—A Congregational Leader

His Denominational Service and Royal Personality

A Personal Tribute

By Prof. Frank G. Ward

"Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen today in Israel?" For nearly forty years ministers and laymen have been meeting Dr. Sanderson as an official, state or national, of the Congregational churches. With one accord these folks of three generations would grant him a regal place in memory even though democracy is the watchword today. This tribute seeks to voice the hearts of many and perhaps to add some glimpses into the life of one who was loved by all who knew him. It draws on memories from Pine Lake and the banks of the Charles, from the fire-place and the prayer meeting, from the office on LaSalle Street and rides through the Michigan snows, from the meal time during the weeks that he found his home with us, and from the hospital room while waiting for the Big Surgeon to come. The picture is true to life, even where there may be slips in memory.

Dr. Sanderson was born in Philadelphia—how long ago few would guess. In talking last October about some who were getting along in years he said in a lowered tone, "I enter my seventieth year next week." His father belonged to that political group which hardened in the later years into the Pennsylvania régime of doubtful fame, but in those days it was fluid and subject to rectification. The elder Sanderson was close up to the Lincoln administration, and for a time was assistant to a cabinet officer. The war years took the family to St. Louis and the father at times to the Canadian border where thickening plots called for secret service men. Thus it was that the formative years of young Sanderson's life were spent in an atmosphere that wonted him to statecraft and national crises, and the temper never departed from him. Fifty years after, he was in France at the time Germany declared war and he saw it all with an experienced eye.

The college days in Springfield, O., the year of teaching there, the time spent in Andover in the days of its greatness, entered into the decade following the war, to which must be added an interesting fact. Three years as deputy postmaster at Springfield, which meant in this instance full responsibility, gave the young man who had just turned his majority a fine training in business exactness. Two statements show his thoroughness. "I never leave a letter calling for answer unacknowledged for twenty-four hours"; and, "I balance my personal cash every night." No wonder that Secretary Douglas of Iowa once said in response to a question, Who's Sanderson? "When you write to Michigan Sanderson's the one you get the answer from."

After three years as Lutheran pastor in Illinois Dr. Sanderson began in 1877 his three decades of service in Michigan. Michigan Congregationalism is a sort of Congregational isthmus where many ministers have halted for a longer or shorter time in going back and forth between the east and the west, and others have settled down there as in a home state. No one of us could get by without knowing Dr. Sanderson, and that in a helpful way. He had a genius for discovering young men and pushing them on. He never was too busy to give himself whole-heartedly to one who needed him; and if an engagement did make it necessary to close an interview no one was ever made uncomfortable by it. Dr. Sanderson knew how to receive as well as give. Friendship with him was mutual in as complete a way as with any one I ever knew. He thought a great deal of Dr. Ross of Port Huron, and so when a boy came into the home he named him after that Central West authority upon Congregationalism. It was Dr. Ross perhaps that started Dr. Sanderson thinking about church polity and the needs of Congregationalism in this particular.

REV. JOHN P. SANDERSON, D. D.

This leads to Dr. Sanderson's contribution to his time, second only to his capacity for friendship. I refer to his part in blazing the way for the new Congregationalism. At the state association in Detroit in 1904 twin papers were read by Dr. Sanderson and Rev. H. P. DeForest upon the problem of Ministerial Supply and Congregational Fellowship and Oversight. The discussion called out was so vital and animated that a devotional hour on the program was dropped. The matter was finally referred to a committee consisting of Messrs. H. P. DeForest, J. P. Sanderson, H. N. Dascomb, Nehemiah Boynton, and Pres. James B. Angell of the University of Michigan. Their report was given in 1905 which outlined a "method of co-operation which all may see and which all may use; a visible form for the energy of spirit which seeks the efficiency of systematized unity." The provisions of this report became operative in Michigan in 1906. Thus the dawn of the new day in Congregationalism was heralded. Dr. Dascomb and Dr. Boynton are the two now living who can tell the part played by the different members of the committee in formulating the report which has meant so much in our denominational life; but a careful reading of the minutes of that association compels the conviction that Dr. Sanderson was a wheel horse in carrying us forward toward the present goal. His ten years of service in the National societies have been a continuation of his work in Michigan.

* * * * * * *

It was the closing hour of the International Council. Two friends met in the rear of the Old South Church. The room was crowded and one was a bit hard of hearing, and so they went outdoors for a visit. They talked of many things, but the capacity for friendship already referred to made it unnecessary to stay long with any topic; a few words enabled one to catch the other's meaning. They spoke of "the boy" and his community work in New Bedford, near by; of the happy vacation weeks in and around Great Barrington and over the Mohawk Trail; when one referred to his auto trip through Ohio eastward-bound, the other said, "So you were in Springfield, were you!" and both thought, without speaking, of a few years ago when they stood together by an open grave there, never dreaming that the turn of another week would open the way for a second; they spoke of the Congregational World Movement and how the denomination could gird itself to its task. And then at five o'clock they said good-bye—the one to go to the Berkshires to meet the companion of his later years for the home trip to Chicago and the hard days of suffering ere his release; the other to a committee meeting to consider the Congregational budget for 1921. If our goal is realized it will be due in no small measure to the pioneer vision and service making for efficient Congregationalism of John Philip Sanderson, "the quiet, Christian gentleman, who went through life courteous, useful, and brave," whom some used to call "John the Beloved Disciple."

An Authority on Polity

By William E. Barton

The sad tidings reaches me at my summer home of the death on Sunday, July 11, of Rev. John P. Sanderson, D. D., Field Secretary for the Interior of the Church Building Society. I have not at hand material for a suitable obituary notice, which I doubt not will be furnished from Chicago; but I desire the privilege of saying a word in appreciation of one who has long been my friend, and whose services to our common interests I have had constant occasion to know.

Dr. Sanderson was a true Christian gentleman. He had a very unusual mind; it combined to an unusual degree the powers of analysis and synthesis. I count on the fingers of one hand the men in our denomination whom I consider our foremost authorities in Congregational polity, and John P. Sanderson is of them. When the International Council's Interim Committee appointed the chairmen of its several commissions, it gave to at least one of the chairmen the privilege of selecting the central group of his own associates; the Chairman of the Commission on Polity chose as the first man upon his commission Dr. Sanderson. In apportioning the work of the Commission, in the report presented at Boston, the chairman assigned the opening and closing portions to the two men whom he knew to be most capable. The admirable historical introduction is from the pen of Prof. Williston Walker; the closing section, with its clear outlook upon the future, is by Dr. Sanderson. I met Dr. Sanderson in Boston, and he said, "I thought you were to have edited my part of the report; I have read it and find no change." I said, "In your part and Dr. Walker's, I changed in each one single word." He read it again, and said, "I have found the word, and the change is an improvement."

In 1907, Dr. Sanderson was chairman of the Committee on Polity of the National Council, and presented at Cleveland that admirable report which prepared the way for what we did at Boston in 1910 and at Kansas City in 1913. His report included the substance of some resolutions approving the work of Associations in assuming, when requested, conciliary functions.

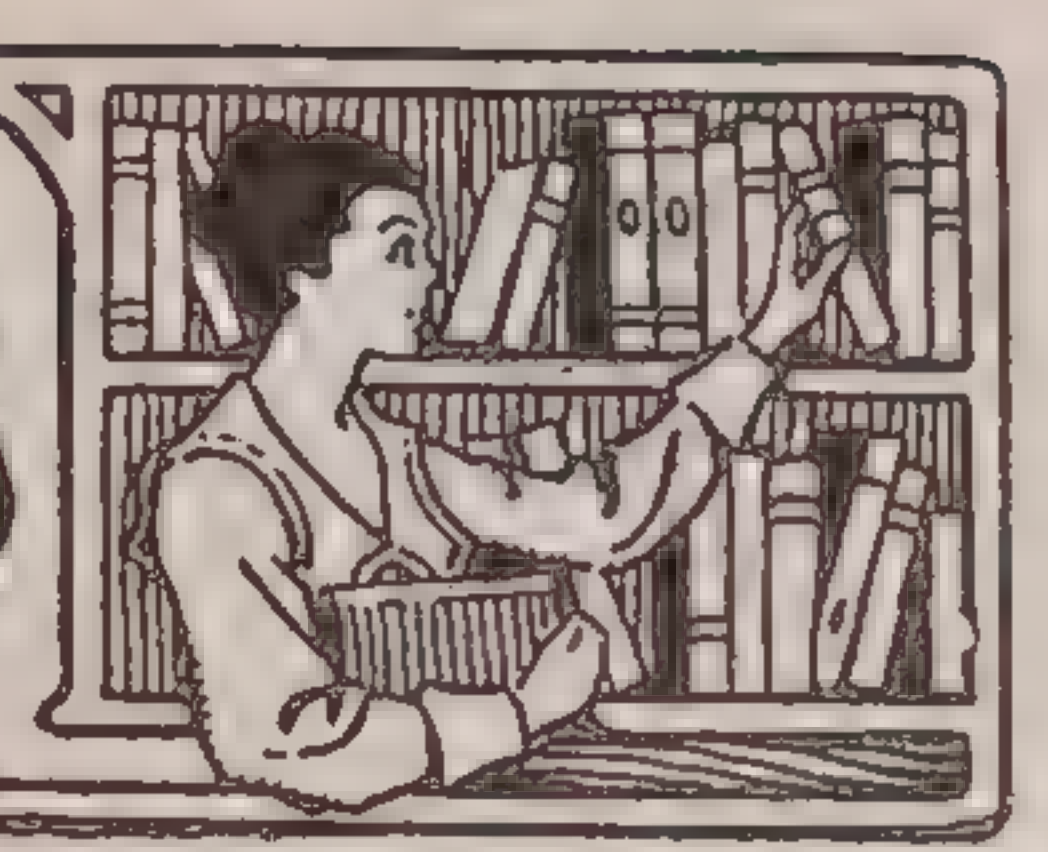
AMONG THE NEW BOOKS



History and Travel

The New South, by Holland Thompson (Yale University Press). The purpose of Vol. 42 of the "Chronicles of America" is to trace the development of the new spirit in the South, a spirit "marked by hopefulness, a belief in the future, and a desire to take a fuller part in the life of the nation." After the welter of extravagance which accompanied the era of Reconstruction the states had to follow the dull paths of parsimony even as to education. Extreme individualism has hampered progress but there now emerges the desire for common action in the interests of all. The chapter on "The Revolt of the Common Man" describes the evolution of the Tillman type of politician. "The Problem of Black and White" provides full information on the status of the Negro and is wholly sane in spirit. The author believes that the Great War, with its sacrifices and its joint activities, has really closed "the chasm" between North and South and revealed a united nation.

Our Foreigners, by Samuel P. Orth, The Armies of Labor, by Samuel P. Orth, (Yale University Press). These two volumes in the "Chronicles of America" series present admirably the history of immigration and of Labor in the United States. The one deals topically with the American stock, the Negro, the Irish Invasion, the Teutonic Tide, etc. A chapter on Utopias in America describes the manifold communistic experiments attempted by foreign colonies. The final chapter reviews efforts for the restriction of immigration. The second volume is a review of labor organizations, with accounts of the Knights of Labor, the American Federation of Labor, the Trade Unions, the I. W. W., etc., and brief biographical sketches of the principal labor leaders. Both books are readable and interesting. No better popular historical review of either of these important movements can be found. They are up-to-date, fair and accurate, maintaining the high standard of preceding volumes in the series.

A History of France, by William Stearns Davis (Houghton Mifflin). A clear, condensed but readable review of over two thousand years of history, beginning with the foundation of Massalia, 600 B.C. and ending with the armistice after the Great War. It is a popular history, based on the best authorities, referring to military and diplomatic affairs briefly but presenting mainly the story of the French people, their origins, growth, accessions, victories and defeats. The larger part of the volume is devoted to the period since 1789. It would be hard to find a better general view of the French Revolution, the career of Napoleon and the process of later French history than is given in these pages.

Japan, Real and Imaginary, by Sydney Greenbie (Harpers). The author went to Japan in 1917 and entered intimately into the life of the people. He learned Japanese, traveled and taught and has written the best account available of the Japan of today. He describes the home life of the people, their habits, recreation, craftsmanship, their slums, prisons, their labor conditions, strikes, press censorship, dramatic art, etc. He refers to the missionaries, "the best element in the foreign community," but "too clannish." They are, however, "the dynamic force in the native life." The book is well written and profusely illustrated.

Vagabonding Through Changing Germany, by Harry A. Frank (Harpers). The first four chapters of this entertaining volume describe the author's experiences with the American "Army of Occupation" in Germany—and the varying degrees of "fraternizing" which he witnessed. Then follows the account of his visits to various parts of the former empire. In general he found much suffering, no sign of repentance. "Every one of the old fallacies were still swallowed, hook and line," by the common people, who talked of the "undefeated German armies" and "the atrocities of English, French and Russian" soldiers. Though he freely declared himself American he never met with abusive treatment but was generally looked upon with curiosity and not infrequently with friendliness. No better account of the Germany of today has been written for Americans.

MARIE ANTOINETTE

The Story of the Nonpartisan League, by Charles Edward Russell (Harpers). It has been difficult to obtain unprejudiced accounts of this remarkable effort of the farmers of North Dakota and other states to organize politically for their common rights. It is an exceedingly important and interesting story. Mr. Russell claims to be simply an historian, or recorder of facts and events. It is evident that his sympathies are with the farmers, whom he represents as reacting in a truly American way against injustice. We commend the volume to our readers.

American World Policies, by David Jayne Hill (Doran). A clear analysis of the Peace Covenant of the League of Nations, showing that its acceptance without reservations would nullify fundamental American principles, overrule our Constitution, impose obligations which affect the independence of the United States and, in effect, place us under the control of a super-government of other countries who might, for example, embroil us in wars for the settlement of their own quarrels. President Hill is not opposed to hearty co-operation with other nations for the world's welfare, but he is opposed, and shows why, to action which is both imperialistic, provocative of war, and at the same time contrary to American principles and injurious to her welfare.

Mexico in Revolution, by Blasco Ibanez (Dutton). At last we have a volume which cannot be suspected of propaganda. The celebrated author visiting Mexico with the advantage of Spanish birth and speech describes men and events as he sees them. It is not a pleasant picture which he paints. A revolutionist himself he has nothing but condemnation for the "gunmen" who have been running Mexico. He knows Latin-America from six years of residence in South American lands. He deplores the attitude of Mexicans toward foreigners. Each one of the prominent "Generals" he describes personally. Here we find the facts about Carranza and Obregon, Gonzalez, Bonillas, and the present provisional president, Adolfo de la Huerta of Sonora, "a well-meaning and estimable youth," who "represents only an interlude in Mexican affairs." He deprecates American "vacillating policy." Being an avowed optimist he believes that eventually peace and order will come to Mexico. It is a readable and enlightening book which we commend to our readers. Incidentally it throws some light on the opinions and career of the author.

On Religious Themes

I Believe in God the Father, by John Faville (Stratford). In his preface the author says, "I believe that the teaching that God is our Father is the greatest truth that came from Jesus." Also, "I believe that God's Kingdom on earth cannot come till we accept this truth in all human relations." In ten admirable sermons, Dr. Faville enlarges upon and enforces these ideas. He defines what is meant by the Fatherhood, or better, "Parenthood," of God. He shows that sovereignty has been exalted in past thought at the expense of the loving paternity of God. He shows how Jesus, in person and teaching, reveals the nature of the Father and the bearing of his teaching on the Church, the individual and society. One of the most important chapters is on "The Father and the Cross." Throughout it is a clear, reasonable and convincing presentation of a truth upon which too much emphasis cannot be laid. We cordially commend it to our readers.

Every Morning, by Robert Cluett (Association Press). A little volume of Scripture readings and prayers for thirteen weeks. The readings are well chosen and the prayers are admirable in letter and spirit. The volume should be a real help to the devotional life and will bear continuous repetition for longer time than is indicated.

The Epistles of St. John, by Charles Gore, D. D. (Scribners). A popular exposition by a conservative scholar who holds that St. John was the author of both the Fourth Gospel and the three epistles. In the Introduction he gives his reasons for this faith. The exposition which follows clearly sets forth those principles, theological and ethical, which are presented by the apostle.

The Devotions of Bishop Andrews (Macmillan). English religious life in the early part of the Seventeenth Century was singularly rich in devotional works. Under the title, Manuals of the Inner Life, the Society of the Propagation of Christian Knowledge has issued a beautiful series of little books, quite handy for the pocket. These "Devotions" of Launcelot Andrews will appeal to all who love spiritual thought in quaint and expressive diction.

IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

The Sins and Sorrows of David

International Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 15. 2 Sam. 12:9, 10; 18:1-15.

A remarkable fact about the characters in the Bible is that they are not idealized. They are portrayed in all the sin and weakness of their humanity. If they had been fictitious their faults would have been glossed over or covered up. We have them truly reported.

1. "Thou Art the Man." We have not studied a lesson for a long time so full of dramatic contrasts as this. The story of David's evil desires and his practical murder of Uriah in order that he might have his way ought to be reviewed. The one outstanding figure in the scene is Nathan. Fearless, definite and terrible he calls David to account for his sins. The judgment is specific. "The sword" stands for conflict and death. David might have been so happy and so noble! What tragic failure! They who take the sword perish by the sword. The past year has seen the murder of several "gunmen" in Chicago. They killed others; they were killed in turn. The laws of retribution act steadily and relentlessly.

2. Civil War. We now see Nathan's prophecy growing into fulfillment. David had broken up a home and had murdered a brother man. Now he sees his own home broken up as his own son leads a rebellion and plunges the country into civil war. The three generals who remained true to David were mighty men. They knew how to put up a great fight. David proposed to go out with his forces and to lead them in person. The soldiers would not permit it. Were they right? Was David in any sense a coward for staying in the city? Now note the heart of the suffering father as David calls his generals together and asks them to be merciful to Absalom. He knew the conditions of warfare in those stern days and he had no delusions as to what Absalom's defeat would involve to him personally. The man who had been merciful to Jonathan's lame son now pleads that mercy shall be shown to his own boy.

3. Death by Forest and Sword. What a terrible thing is war! All for selfish ambition, all fruitlessly in the end, twenty thousand men die in the frenzy of brutal conflict with their comrades or crushed by the hostile forces of nature in the forest. It was a slight loss compared with the ten millions who have perished in the recent Great War. But surely by this time humanity ought to have learned the folly and the crime of fratricidal war. It is the supreme madness and the last folly. Vain, bloody and insane, attended by its inevitable comrades, Famine and Pestilence, War stands forth stark and brutal, the foe of mankind. It was so when beautiful Absalom hung dead in the oak, slain by Joab's javelin; it is true today.

4. The Rebel's Death. He must have been a handsome man with his long curls, as he rode on his white mule. The curls may be imaginary; but the beauty and charm of Absalom must have been a fact in order to have brought about the loyalty of so many followers. In some way his head was caught in the oak branches, the mule went on, and Absalom was left, hanging and helpless, in the tree.

A nameless soldier discovered Absalom but he neither released him nor did him any harm. When he told his experience to Joab the big general was angry, forgetting that David had commanded him personally to spare Absalom's life. Take time to study the conversation between the unnamed soldier and Joab; it reveals a clear knowledge of Joab's character. He was quick to tell the soldier how he would have paid generously for Absalom's death; but the soldier reveals Joab's character by his reply.

And now Joab hurries to the place where the living body of Absalom still hangs in the tree. A few minutes and it is all over. The javelins have found their mark and David's loved son is silent forever in death. What apology can you give for Joab's act? Did Absalom richly deserve the pain and death that came to him?

Religious Education as Related to Evangelism

There is a growing emphasis on educational evangelism. The reports show that a large per cent. of accessions come at the Easter time and are largely the fruitage of the regular work of the church, especially of the church school. In one state this year 71 churches reported 1,234 accessions from Jan. 1 to Easter, and 972 of these were received on Easter day. This shifting of the evangelistic emphasis to the regular work of the church places a staggering responsibility on the workers of the church school, for which they are not fully prepared.

There are two reasons for this changing emphasis. First, a broader and saner view of evangelism. Second, a truer and more fundamental conception of religious education.

It is becoming more generally understood that evangelism is not limited to an act springing from an emotion, or to a decision forced from a conviction, but it is the Christianizing of the entire personality. We are learning that this can be done more effectually through a process and not an act. This is especially true if the process is continued during the years when personality is forming. Educational evangelism is the Christianizing process which keeps pace with an unfolding life.

On the other hand it is slowly but surely dawning on our workers that religious education is not limited to the impartation of knowledge. It is equally concerned with producing right attitudes and right actions. Facts or even truths intellectually perceived will not leaven life. Only by a response of the entire personality including feeling and will, is life being changed. Religious education is concerned not only with a knowledge about life but also with a continuous adjustment to that life. Therefore fundamentally, religious education is progressive evangelism.

This conception of religious education has been clear as a sunbeam to our leaders for some time, but to most of the workers it is still but a gleam. If the church school is to meet this increasing responsibility for evangelism, there are a few principles which should be kept before the workers.

First: We start with the fundamental assumption that a child is God's child. This is where Jesus started with the child when he said, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." We are safe in taking our stand with him, and we may be sure that those whose hearts are warm in the service of childhood will heartily indorse this position; the child is God's child and in the Kingdom.

Second: If a child is in the Kingdom, he should be kept there. This too accords with reason and with every sense of the divine will. There is little excuse and certainly no need of his going out. This is not so commonly accepted as the first principle. Possibly due to two reasons—the prevalence of a warped theology, and the fact that religious education has not been sufficiently vital to give an adequate demonstration.

Dr. Henry F. Cope has well said that "the educational evangel assumes that men already have in them all the possibilities of the religious life, and that the really normal experience would be that no one should think of himself either now or any time in the future as other than a child of God or ever live in any other way."

This clearly sets forth the task of the church school worker. He not only starts with the child in the Kingdom, but he accepts the responsibility of keeping him there. He begins by counting him in, and he continues to count him in, until he counts himself out. But his purpose is that he shall never count himself out. Should he fail in this purpose, he would feel that, temporarily at least, the divine plan had miscarried.

It is evident that if the plan for progressive evangelism is successful, there will be no great crisis in the religious life. But the church school worker should keep in mind that there is an experience even better than being able to name the place and hour when he first believed; it is to be truly able to say that there has never been a conscious hour when he did not believe. Some have this experience even now, but there has been a sentiment in some quarters which regarded it as unfortunate. When it is generally recognized as the normal goal, the experience will become more common, and the confession of it more proper.

But while there may be no outstanding crisis, there will be several crises. These will come in every normal life. They mark new experiences at transitions in the developing of personality. They do not indicate a change in the direction of the life, but a deepening of the channel and strengthening of the current. These experiences are to be welcomed by the church school worker. They test the work to that point, and give opportunity to strike a balance in the evangelizing account.

This growing emphasis on progressive evangelism should result in the enrichment of the religious life of the church, and in the enlistment of thousands who are partners with Christ in his work of redemption. C. G. M.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

Parables of the Harvest

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Aug. 8-14

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Passage. Matt. 13: 1-32.

Life as Sowing Time. In these three parables we have three different uses of the familiar figure of the sower. The first is like Millet's famous picture, where we see the farmer scattering his seed over a whole hillside. That is the figure of God's invitation, scattered abroad through the witness of the church. But the ground is not all equally made ready. Some of the seed is wasted on the stony ground. Some springs up only to wither. The immediate harvest comes from the good ground. The second parable is of man. We plan for the world in our idealisms; but we forget that not all men are either good or ready and we are impatient of the springing up of evil. For this impatience Christ recommends patience, but a patience that remembers that God is interested in this field of the world and that the harvest time is to be a time of separation. The third parable suggests what a wonderful harvest of good and of help for others may come of a very little sowing.

What We Harvest Here. Not all the fruits of our sowing are held for us out of sight. There can be no question that faith and obedience bring their own immediate reward. It is poor policy to be careless of good. Christ's "blesseds" are of today. It is good already to be of his company and the blessedness goes on accumulating. It is not well to put all your money into the savings bank, you need to eat and be clothed and to enjoy and give in mercy and in charity today. And Christ had that in mind as he looked after the immediate needs of his disciples. It pays to be good, to be Christian, to be helpful and it pays at once.

The Need of Patience. One reason why we must not take into our own hands the pulling out of the tares is that we are not competent judges. We do not always know a potentially good man when we see him. The enemy of the parable chose the plant which in appearance was most like wheat, though in its qualities it had no resemblance. There may be spindling stalks which are wheat, not tares. The need of not judging was often in Christ's mind; but it went along with a conviction that God would judge at last. But we are tempted to take that distinguishing and dividing judgment out of God's hands. Impatience with God's ways is an enemy of our own peace as well as our efficiency.

Our reaping Time. One thought of the life beyond which we should keep in mind is that our qualities will then find elbow room for full growth. Here and now we are often like plants unthinned, which cannot show what they are capable of doing. But they will be our own qualities which will there display themselves. There is to be no exception to that absolute law of the kingdom that whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. This was as clear and certain in Christ's thoughts as that the seed we are sowing shall bring its harvest.

Closet and Altar

THE EXPECTANT HEART

Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord: for we walk by faith, not by sight.—2 Cor. 5: 6.

But further, as it is a rich and pleasant country where it lieth, it hath also this privilege, to be the only land of rest and peace, free from all possibility of invasion. There is no spoiling of it, and laying it waste, and defacing its beauty, by leading armies into it, and making it the seat of war; no noise of drums or trumpets, no inundations of one people driving out another, and sitting down in their possessions. In a word, there is nothing there subject to decay of itself, so neither is it in danger of fraud or violence.—Robert Leighton.

Never weather-beaten sail more willing bent to shore,
Never tired pilgrim's limbs affected slumber more,
Than my wearied sprite now longs to fly out of my troubled breast.
Oh, come quickly, sweetest Lord, and take my soul to rest!

Ever blooming are the joys of heaven's high
Paradise,
Cold age deafs not there our ears nor vapor
dims our eyes:
Glory there the sun outshines; whose beams
the Blessed only see.
Oh, come quickly, glorious Lord, and raise my sprite to thee.

—Thomas Campion.

How seldom the expression "going to heaven" is used in the Bible! It is rather going to be with the Lord, as if the Lord wanted to keep our eye on himself as the heart and soul of heaven.—Andrew Bonar.

How much sweetness and inspiration does that upper, invisible world bring into this! "For which cause we faint not." It consoles us, strengthens us to do and suffer, creates in us a holy joy and ecstasy.—W. L. Watkinson.

Lord, help us so to live that when our turn comes to pass hence and live with thee where thou shalt send us, we may begin at once to feel at home in those heavenly surroundings. Teach us the worth and worthlessness of our possessions, that we may value them as instruments of life spent in thy service and not lament them when the place of our serving is changed. Give us sweet thoughts, even today, of wider vision and more intimate communion with thee and with thy children who have gone before us into that unknown land. And suffer us to walk with thee in a joyful and intimate acquaintance here with good hope of enlargement and delight when our dreams are granted their fulfillment according to thy wise and loving thought. In the name of Christ. Amen.

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for August 15-21

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Lessons from the Poets. Ex. 15: 1-12.

Light from the Bible Passage

Take a revised version of the Bible and see how scattered through our Bible, the Old Testament especially, are many of these so-called poems. The earliest is found in Genesis 4: 23, 24. Lacking in rhyme and meter, they are distinguished by a certain richness of expression and thought quite different from the surrounding prose. Among the whole books of poetry are Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Lamentations. The outstanding mark of Bible poems is that its central thought is always about God and man in his relation with God. These poems are "full of God." From the books of poems, especially in the Psalms, we get a large amount of our devotional material, such as worship of God, appreciation of nature, encouragement to patriotism and principles of life.

Leads for the Leader

Life easily becomes a monotonous and mechanical thing. The routine of life soon passes into a rut. Simple change is not enough. We need what the word really means, re-creation. We need to get into the realm of ideals and hopes that are beyond our ordinary life. We need to look on things from a different height, a different angle, with a different vision. Poetry at its best does this for us.

Poetry carries us into a region of emotions. These, after all, are the controlling forces within us.

Poetry shows the possibility of enriching the simplest things of life with beauty. The poet sees what ordinary people do not see.

Henry van Dyke, Robert Service and collections of war verse will furnish fine illustrations of stimulating poetry for young people.

Thoughts for Members

"Where are more beautiful words of joy than the Psalms of praise and prayer? There thou seest into the heart of all the saints, as into fair and pleasant gardens, as into heaven itself, and walkest amongst the heart-rejoicing flowers, the happy and gladsome thoughts which rise to God and His goodness."

Poetry is itself a thing of God;
He made his prophets poets; and the more
We feel of poesie do we become Like God in love and power—under-makers.

—Bailey.

Poetry is the blossom and the fragrance of all human knowledge, human thought, human passions, emotions, language.

—Coleridge.

A Moment of Prayer

We thank thee, O Father, that among the hosts of men Thou hast included some whose minds and souls have risen above the ordinary heights of life, who have clothed its thought with a richness and beauty, not found in the usual humdrum of life. Show us the worthfulness of these lives and their output that our own may become richer and nobler. Amen.

WITH THE CHILDREN

One Good Turn Deserves Another

By Jessica Griggs Abel

The wind howled desolately around the top of the Oak Tree Apartment House. Mr. Squirrel put down his paper and gazed thoughtfully out into the darkness, as he remarked, "I think, my dear, that it's going to be a cold night."

Mrs. Squirrel looked up from her knitting; "Oh, dear, I hope Bobby's cold won't develop into the 'flu;' why, just think, Chatterer and Molly Rabbit have had it!"

As Mr. Squirrel was about to blow out the light and every one was going to bed, he heard a faint scratching at the front door. Opening it just a crack, he peeped out to see, sitting upon the doorstep, a very forlorn little bird.

"Please, sir, may I stay with you tonight? It is so cold out, and I could sleep on your couch."

Mr. Squirrel turned and looked at Mrs. Squirrel doubtfully, for it was against their principles to lodge strangers, but the little bird pleaded so pitifully that they finally decided to let him in. Bright and early the next morning, the stranger flew away, much refreshed by his night's rest in the pink guest room.

"Some day I'll come back again and do you a good turn," he said as he bade them good-bye.

Soon after the bird's visit Bobby got the "flu" and Betty had a bad cold; but worst of all, Mr. Squirrel was ill, too, and he was so worried that he wasn't getting well very fast.

Mrs. Squirrel was almost worn out, because with "flu" in the house no one dared to come near enough to help her. "Gracious me," she cried, "if only cousin Jemima Chipmunk or some one were here to do the errands for me."

Just as she was wondering whether it would be safe to leave the sick people alone while she went to the drug store the door-bell rang.

"Oh, dear me, it's probably the doctor," and she ran hastily to the old cracked looking-glass to put on her cap; but, to her great surprise, when she went to the door, whom did she see but the same little bird who had begged a lodging on that cold, stormy night!

"Go back! Go back! You'll catch it," cried Mrs. Squirrel, the border of her cap shaking as she shook her head decidedly.

"I'm not afraid," he said, "I have come to help you."

My! What a help he was, in the busy days that followed; he kept the fires burning and one day he flew to the doctor's in a great hurry, when Mr. Squirrel had an alarming relapse; but the thing that helped most of all was when the children were well enough to sit out in the fresh air upon the doorstep. Then he would sing to them and tell all about the lovely South.

But one day, when every one was well again, and no one needed him, the little bird spread his broad wings and flew away.

How dreary the house seemed after he left; several times Mrs. Squirrel said that she did wish the Squirrel family had the ability to sing!

One afternoon, a few days after the helpful bird had departed, Bobby Squirrel came scampering into the house, in a great state of excitement.

"Mother, mother," he cried, "two birds are building their nest in the tree just next to ours, and sure as I live, one of them is our little bird!"

"I do declare," exclaimed Mother Squirrel, "that's the best news I've heard since he went away."

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

You are a forgiving "bunch," aren't you? Believing so, I am asking the privilege of delaying my story about the purest light in the world a week or so. You know I said last week I planned to give it to you this week.

Instead I should like to make place for a delightful little contribution to our Corner from an older Comrade, Rev. Prescott B. Dodge of Kent, O. He says, in writing me: "Some of us may be in our second childhood, for we do enjoy your page. There is good cheer in it for some down-and-outers." The Salvation Army says, "A man may be down but he is never out" (Mr. A.). "With all good wishes for yourself and your big family of young folks"—so he closes his letter.

Follows, then, his storiette about "My Friend Across the Street."

"She was taken to the hospital the day before I was taken there. Our rooms were on opposite sides of the corridor diagonally across from each other. We made believe that the corridor was a street and that she lived on one side of the street and I on the other side. Our nurses were our kind and accommodating go-betweens to carry our messages and gifts from each to the other.

"The day after her operation I heard her moaning and sent some of my fresh flowers to her. After a little her moaning ceased and her nurse told us that she got to pulling the flowers to pieces and became so interested in watching the petals fall that she forgot for the time her pain and discomfort.

"Again, I had some of my roses taken to her, first directing that all the thorns be removed, for my little friend would find thorns enough in this world without their being sent to her under the guise of friendship.

"One day my nurse told me that my little friend asked her: 'Are you the nurse that takes care of that old gentleman across the street?' 'Yes.' 'The one that sent me the flowers?' 'Yes.' 'Well, you tell him that I thank him.' Wasn't she a thoughtful and appreciative little Miss?

"Christmas morning I sent her a fancy box of mixed candies, having learned first that her mother or nurse would take care of them so that it would be all right for her to have them. With the candies I sent a cheery Christmas greeting. In the afternoon her nurse brought me a plate of nice fruit and this message from my little friend: 'You tell him that I love him.' Wasn't that a beautiful Christmas message?

"New Year's Day her father and mother called on me and the father had little Ida in his arms. They explained that my little friend was making New Year's calls and was making her first call on me so we could see each other and speak face to face. I thanked her for her kindness and told her that when I could get about again I would want to make one of my first calls on her for I should remember her New Year's call on me.

"One evening some time afterwards the father and mother called again and Ida again was in

THE WELL MADE WELL

This story which I am going to tell you has nothing to do with sick people but it is a tale of a well which holds water and which people dig when they have no other means of getting their water supply.

About a year ago I dug a well. It was not a deep well but it seemed to me to be a good one. Not long afterward I left the well and did not see it again for several months. What was my surprise and sorrow! My beautiful well was no longer the nice hole that I had made. The sides which I had smoothed with such care with the shovel had fallen and caved in and the well was almost all filled up. My pride in the work was gone and it was with a troubled face that I greeted my neighbor as he came to chat with me.

"My son," said he with a kindly voice as he saw my plight, "the next time that you dig a well gather some stones and wall up the sides so that they will be firm and strong and your well will not again cave in like this."

And so I worked hard and long, placing fine stones in a solid wall around the well. This would now act as a lining and prevent the walls from falling in. Then I left the well, feeling that now at last it was dug and walled and would be an everlasting well.

In a year I came around and saw the well again. It looked beautiful with its water shining and sparkling in the sun. I knelt down and with my hand I scooped up some water and drank it eagerly. But I quickly threw it out. The water had a vile taste and as I looked closely the well seemed to be full of brackish and foul-smelling water. With a downcast face I hurried to my neighbor's to find out what the trouble was. "Ah," he said, "Your well was not covered and you did not keep it clean. A well must not only be made well but it must be cared for also."

And as I went back to my well I thought how much people's lives resembled them. They need to be shaped well to give them character, they need to be covered and they need to be clean.

And with this thought I rolled up my sleeves and with a pail and a rope I started to clean out my well.

A Vital Question in the Northwest

By Henry J. Kilbourn

A recent double cartoon in the Spokane Spokesman-Review shows an elderly, bearded farmer throwing himself on his knees in tragic supplication toward the endless procession of farm laborers "beating it" to the distant city, over which is a big sign: "Jobs, $7.50 a day." The second half of the scene shows what may be looked for later—the farmer and his family in his bungalow dining-room, eating down a mammoth pile of pancakes, while outside, in another tragic supplication, kneels a procession of emaciated citizens reaching from the city to the dining-room window, calling on the farmer for food, and with a benevolent smile, between mouthfuls, he replies, "Sorry, but I only raised enough for my own use this year." Widespread apprehension at sight of the farmer throwing up his hands has brought the food problem of tomorrow with a bound into front headlines, noon lunch programs and even religious gatherings.

At a recent noon of the Spokane Chamber of Commerce, President Showalter of Cheney Normal School gave the results of a questionnaire sent by him to 2,800 farmers who have given up their farms. In answer to "Why have you done it?" 71 per cent. replied that the superiority of city schools for their young people was a deciding factor. Next in order was stated the plaint of the farmers' wives that there are too few social privileges in the farm family's life, a deciding factor. Next in order of statement was the conviction of the speaker that there were too many large farms; that the future and better order of things would see a vast number of ten-acre farms with their owners working upon them.

One major conclusion of President Showalter was that simply as a matter of averting a crisis in tomorrow's food supply every city must concern itself with making life better for the people on the farm.

This address was discussed by the writer with a member of the largest firm dealing in farm mortgages in the city of Spokane, who, from a life-long familiarity with farm values emphatically urged the widest publicity to the existing absence of labor from the areas of food supply, and the necessity of winning the laborer back to the fields. He also stated that one of our best hopes for the future is the reduction of many great farms into smaller ones of forty, eighty and one hundred acres. As an incentive to serious men to enter the food-producing army he recalled that sagebrush land of good quality, with irrigation from two to five years, leaps from desert to a value, for agriculture, of $200 to $400 an acre; and in fruit-bearing regions, as in the Wenatchee and Yakima Valleys, a decade of irrigation and cultivation has in hundreds of cases seen the former abode of the coyote sold for between $1,500 and $2,000 per acre; and now smiling with seas of apple and peach trees.

After all is said, however, the average man of the fields and his wife are chanting in their souls: "Life is more than cash, and the body than dollars per acre." And the deepest students of farm life know as unerringly as did Theodore Roosevelt that near the ploughed field must stand for the farmer the best school the whole people can give him, and by its side, as that great man stoutly maintained, must stand the best church that our Universities can give him, and any red-blooded young man who aspires to fill a most urgent need of his country today can do it by fitting himself to take a pastorate among the army of food raisers in the coming Northwest.

Mental Munitions of the Ministry

What They Are Reading

By Hugh Elmer Brown

Readers of The Congregationalist will be interested in learning something about what ministers have been reading. I sent out a call recently to some well-known pastors of our own order asking them to report to me "three major books of their recent reading." Here are some of the replies:

William Horace Day of Bridgeport. "The Science of Power," by Kidd. "The Decoration of the Cross," by Patten. "British Labor and the War," by Kellog and Gleason.

Raymond C. Brooks of Berkeley. "Work and Wealth," by Hobson. "The New Social Order," by Ward. "Progressive Religious Thought in America," by Buckham.

Carl S. Patton of Los Angeles. "History of Religions," by Moore. "Philosophy of Religion," by Galloway. "Meaning of God in Human Experience," by Hocking.

James A. Richards of Winnetka. "Autobiography of Mark Rutherford." "Conflict of Religions of Early Roman Empire," by Glover. "Eminent Victorians," by Strachey.

Raymond Calkins of Cambridge. "The Army and Religion," by Cairns. "The Apocalypse of John," by Beckwith. "Prayer Book," by Orchard.

Allen A. Stockdale of Toledo. "Human Nature and Its Remaking," by Hocking. "Roosevelt's Letters to His Children." "My Generation," by Tucker.

W. A. Rowell of Hinsdale. "The Education of Henry Adams." "Contact with the Other World," by Hyslop. "What is the Kingdom of God?" by Brock.

Walter A. Morgan of Washington, D. C. "Mysticism," by Underhill. "Human Nature and Its Remaking," by Hocking. "My Generation," by Tucker.

Chester Emerson of Detroit. "The Present Conflict of Ideals," by Ralph Barton. "Theodore Roosevelt," by Thayer. "Jean Christophe," by Rolland.

R. H. Potter of Hartford, Ct. "Pioneers and Jesuits," by Parkman. "Beginnings of New England and New France," by Fiske. "Autobiography of Seven Statesmen," by White.

John A. Holmes of Lincoln, Neb. "Folk Lore of the Old Testament," by Fraser. "New Archæological Discoveries," by Cobern. "Life of Roosevelt," by Thayer.

Ernest Bourner Allen of Oak Park, Ill. "Productive Beliefs," by Hough. "Intervention in Mexico," by Inman. "The Cross in Christian Experience," by Clow.

Naboth Osborne of Burlington. "God and Personality," by Webb. "The Justification of the Good," by Solovyof. "Social Psychology," by McDougall.

Ozora Davis of Chicago. "Christian Idea in the Modern World," by Calkins. "Letters to His Children," by Roosevelt. "The Individualistic Gospel," by Gillies.

J. Percival Huget of Brooklyn. "God's Faith in Man," by Shannon. "The Utmost Star," by Boreham. "Poems," by Oxenham.

Surely none can rise to complain that these lists are sawdusty stuff. The popularity of biography is notable. The almost complete absence of poetry—only one book in forty-five—excites curiosity. Whether poetry was not regarded as "major" reading, or actually went unread, is a question.

Isles of Shoals Convention

An informal reunion and a "Welcome Back" opened the fifth annual meeting of the Isles of Shoals Congregational Summer Conference, which began at Star Island Aug. 2. The opening address was given by the president, Dr. W. E. Barton, of Oak Park, Ill., and followed by the first candle-light service in the old stone church. The daily schedule for the weeks of the Conference is briefly outlined as follows: 7.30 A. M., morning watch in the old church; 9.30, Bible hour; 11.00, conference; 8.00 P. M., occasional evening lectures; 9.00 P.M., candle-light service in the old church; all other times, fellowship and recreation.

Some of the speakers who are addressing the Conference at morning sessions are: Rev. J. L. Barton, D. D., Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., Miss Miriam L. Woodberry, Rev. H. C. Ide, Rev. M. A. Farren, Rev. J. L. Sewall and Rev. E. Victor Bigelow. Speakers at the Bible hour will be Prof. R. W. Springer of Dickinson College, Prof. I. F. Wood of Smith College and Prof. J. J. Martin of Bangor Seminary.

The program is full of interesting subjects and worth-while speakers, thus giving promise that this Conference will measure up to previous gatherings of Congregationalists at the Isles of Shoals.

Australian Delegates at Council

Here is a warm right hand of fellowship to the Australians and New Zealanders, whose attendance upon the International Council involved the longest and most expensive journey. The more we saw of them the more we liked them, as closer acquaintance gave opportunity of testing their sterling worth. Rev. Ernest Davies, Rev. C. B. Cockett, Mr. and Mrs. T. H. Horton, all of Melbourne, Chaplain and Mrs. E. A. Bridger of New Zealand, Rev. Stanley Morrison of Brisbane, and Rev. W. J. Ashford of Tasmania, will not soon be forgotten. We are glad that some of them are lingering in America.

The thirty-one Canadian delegates with a group of Canadians now in American pulpits, at their luncheon arose to the time-honored toast, "The King!" and then, after singing "God Save the King" they sang with fine fervor "My Country, 'Tis of Thee."

her father's arms. She told me that she had heard the nurses talking about my being taken home the next day. I told her I had heard the same and I thought it must be so. She replied, 'I am going home tomorrow, too.' I said it seemed a little strange that we should go the same day, but I knew she would be glad to be home again with brother and sister. Then I tried to tell her how much I had enjoyed our make-believe street with her living on one side of it and myself on the other side. She said she wished it were really so, for then we could see each other oftener. Now wasn't she a dear little friend? If you knew her you would love her just as I did.

"Those days at the hospital were not comfortable days, but always I shall have pleasant memories of my little friend across the street. May she have good friends always to brighten her life as she helped to brighten mine."

Any one can get sweet things from sweet things. People are rare who can find sweet in the bitter. These two found the secret.

Dedication of Japanese Church Building

The dedication of the Japanese Church in San Diego occurred on June 6. A gathering of over 200, with a large representation of Americans, was at the services. All of the Congregational churches in San Diego were represented.

Following the service of dedication, the minister, Rev. J. S. Kikuchi, was ordained. His examination had been made at a meeting of the Association a few weeks previously, so that only the formal ordination service occurred at this time.

The building, amply arranged and equipped, will serve as a community center. The total cost of the property is about $9,700, exclusive of furnishings. Through the great generosity of First, San Diego, with its help of $2,750, and the $2,400 grant and $500 loan expected from the Building Society, this enterprise has been rendered possible. The Japanese themselves have contributed about $3,800. On their day of dedication $750 additional was pledged by the local Japanese Association toward the furnishings of the building. Besides this, $280 was also raised at the meeting toward furnishings.

The dedication sermon was preached by Dr. G. W. Hinman of the American Missionary Association; the financial appeal was made by Rev. W. B. Thorp, whose own church has been so generous in its aid; the dedicatory prayer was offered by Rev. W. H. Hannaford; and addresses were made by Rev. Paul Waterhouse, recently called as General Missionary among the Japanese, and Revs. M. Tsuji and G. Tanaka.

This is the third Japanese church building to have been dedicated in California during the administration of Dr. Hinman and although the membership of the church is small this good plant makes possible an extensive community work which Mr. Kikuchi is well able to direct.

Rejuvenating West End, Los Angeles

West End, Los Angeles, is taking on renewed activity under the leadership of Rev. E. E. Fairchild, recently called to that field. Mr. Fairchild was ordained in the Methodist Church in 1896 and served several churches of that fellowship. He has more lately been engaged in work for the Episcopal denomination, having rendered excellent service as a general worker for the Episcopal City Missionary Society of Los Angeles.

Riding the San Diego Circuit

The San Diego circuit, including five missionary points in the mountain region of San Diego, is one of the few Southern California parishes that has a summer and winter season. After being without a regular pastor during the winter hibernation, when portions of the road are quite impassable, the circuit has now entered into its summer season under the ministry of Rev. M. A. Frost.

Mr. Frost, who is still engaged by the Y. M. C. A., which he has served ever since the war camps were established in San Diego, is giving his Sundays to riding this circuit. It requires fortitude as well as preaching powers to visit these several points and conduct the Sunday services.

Improvements at Cheyenne

The church building of Cheyenne is undergoing extensive repairs, including painting and redecorating. The lower floor has been greatly enlarged by the removal of partitions, and the rearranging of rooms. A modern kitchen has been included. The ladies serve meals during the four days of the famous Frontier Days, feeding each year hundreds of visitors.

On a recent Sabbath, 125 members of Cheyenne motored to a beautiful place in the mountains, 25 miles distant, and held an inspiring out-of-doors service. The demand is for more such services. The bulletin board, containing a fresh "vest-pocket sermon" each morning, is creating wide interest and causing much favorable comment. The pastor's salary has been increased $500. The pastor, Rev. C. F. Fisher, will spend the vacation motoring and camping with his family in the Colorado mountains.

COLORADO

Ordination of Guy M. Laird

Second, Denver, was the host to an ordaining council on June 11, at whose hands Mr. G. M. Laird was ordained a Congregational minister for missionary work in Africa under the African Inland Mission. Mr. Laird is a graduate of De Pauw University and an electrical engineer by profession. He and his wife have been appointed to central Africa where this mission is helping to evangelize 11,000,000 heathen in a section 1,000 miles square.

Daily Vacation Bible School at Mobridge

During the month of June, United, Mobridge, conducted a Daily Vacation Bible School, under the direction of the church assistant, Mrs. L. B. Esch. About 75 children registered and paid the nominal fee of 25 cents. The prescribed program was developed successfully and included a brief devotional service, a talk on habit and health, Bible stories and geography, instruction in missions, memory work, music and handwork. Plans are already being made for similar work in the future. Rev. W. F. Ireland is pastor of this church.

TEXAS

Dedication of New Church at Palestine

Under the progressive leadership first of Rev. P. C. Burhans and recently of Rev. M. C. Lambly, Palestine has taken a prominent place in the life of the community. Five years ago a struggling congregation tried to worship in an old brick church near the railroad tracks, but due to the fine spirit of these two men, their untiring efforts and the co-operation of the people of the community, a new edifice has been erected and paid for. It is modern and well equipped and designed not only for a place of worship, but also for community social life. Dedication services were held in May, with Dr. H. B. Harrison of Houston officiating.

Eager for Dr. Harper's Leadership

Central, Dallas, is jubilant over the acceptance of its call to Dr. Thomas Harper of Spokane. The new church building of this organization is approaching completion, and as it advances shows more and more the beauty and serviceableness it is to afford. The congregation is full of enthusiasm and looks forward with pleasure to Dr. Harper's leadership.

Junius Heights, Dallas, a Rising Church

Junius Heights, Dallas, under the leadership of Rev. J. L. Smith, is breaking its former record in every department of service. The congregation has added $600 to the pastor's salary for the year 1920, making the increase 33 per cent. instead of the 25 per cent. which is generally advocated by the denomination. Mrs. Smith has helped the young people to organize a social group that is becoming a potent factor in the community life. In fact this energetic church group is rapidly developing into the position of being the most influential factor in the life of its section of the city and promises to be one of the leading Congregational churches in Texas.

Federation of Churches in Sedalia District

The Kansas City Association has established what is known as the Sedalia District of Congregational Churches. The first meeting was held June 20, with 121 delegates present. Rev. Floyd Webb, of First, Sedalia, preached the morning sermon and Supt. A. R. Atwood delivered an address on Congregationalism in the evening. Twenty-three laymen participated in the service. This group of Sedalia District churches is making unusual progress. All have new pastors, for whom they are buying parsonages. The salary of each church has been increased at least 25 per cent. in the last year.

Sappington Reorganized

Sappington observed its 32d anniversary on June 13. This church has been closed for about 10 years, but was recently reopened by the State Superintendent and Rev. Neil Nissen was secured as pastor. Its 32d anniversary speakers were Rev. D. J. Bradley, Mr. W. C. Fairbank, Mr. Fred Weitkemper and Rev. A. R. Atwood.

Ford Car for Rev. M. C. Holmes

A Ford car has been purchased for the use of Rev. M. C. Holmes, pastor of Maple Valley, Pulcifer and Lakewood. This will make it possible for the pastor to give better attention to the work in the outlying places and also enable him to take up new work. Maple Valley Sunday School raised $30 during the last quarter for Armenian children. Three new members have been added to Lakewood and the apportionment for the year has been paid in full. One new Sunday school has been organized on this field. It has 28 members and three teachers, and is doing well.

New Building for First, Eau Claire

First, Eau Claire, Rev. L. A. Parr, pastor, laid the corner-stone of their new church on June 6. The copper box laid in the corner-stone of the old church 34 years ago, containing the historic records, was replaced in the new corner-stone by Mr. R. J. Kepler, who took part in the former stone-laying service. A sermon was preached by the pastor. Mrs. Cordelia Truax, one of the oldest members of the church, whose munificent gifts have helped to make possible the new building, formally laid the corner-stone. The handsome stone building, designed by Messrs. Holmes and Flinn of Chicago, is rapidly being built, and it is hoped that it will be ready for services at the end of the year.

Viroqua Lifts Debt

Viroqua has recently raised about $3,000 to pay an old debt and to make improvements on the church.

Church Building of Elroy Stuccoed

The church building of Elroy, Rev. F. N. Dexter, pastor, has been given a new coat of stucco, practically making a new building of it. The Men's Club is taking hold of the community enterprises with renewed vigor.

Men's Club Popular at First, Kenosha

First, Kenosha, at the communion service on July 11 received into membership 19 adults, 11 by letter. This makes a total of 43 members that have been received since April 1 of this year. First has three women's societies and a men's club which at two sessions last season had an attendance of over 400 men.

Mt. Hope, Detroit, Raises Pastor's Salary

The splendid way in which the members and friends of Mt. Hope, Detroit, have rallied under the leadership of Rev. P. C. Jesson has warranted an increase in his salary of $700, the second since his coming to the church. All bills are reported paid at the close of the half year and a balance is in the treasury. The church school has increased more than 100 per cent. in membership. Ten adult members were added to the church at Easter and a goodly number are to come into the church at the next communion service.

ILLINOIS

Increasing Interest in Church at Waverly

Waverly had been without a leader for several months when Rev. W. H. Fuller was called in March of this year. His leadership has met with a hearty and encouraging response. At Easter 23 united with the church. A pastor's training class of boys and girls was organized to study Rigg's "Lessons in the Path of Life." Benevolences have advanced 300 per cent. over last year. The church celebrated its 85th anniversary the week of June 15.

Mr. Collins at La Moille Twenty Years

On June 24, La Moille celebrated the 20th anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. E. J. Collins. The churches of Bureau Association and the ministers of the other churches in the villages responded to invitations to assist in observing this occasion, and added greatly to the interest of the program and social hour. As a substantial proof of the love and esteem which are felt for Mr. Collins and in recognition of his long and faithful service a purse containing nearly $900 was presented to him. This is one of the three longest Congregational pastorates in Illinois. During this period the church has grown in membership and in contributions to benevolences. It is among the oldest churches of the state, having been organized May 12, 1840. Its 75th anniversary was appropriately celebrated in 1915.

Lakewood Has Successful Campaign

In an eight days' campaign under the lead of H. H. Patterson, Lakewood recently subscribed $102,000 on the debt of $100,000. It was achieved with remarkable ease and amidst great enthusiasm. In addition to this Mr. A. F. Allen, chairman of the Board of Trustees, secured a reversal of the old rule of the C. C. B. S. that it would only pay last bills. To inaugurate this notable and wise change of policy a grant of $10,000 and a loan of $10,000 at three per cent. were made, thus enabling the church to retire immediately $20,000 of six per cent. indebtedness, with a net saving of $900 on the interest account.

Parallel with the financial campaign the regular work went forward strongly. Twelve

Collinwood, Cleveland, in Fine Shape

Collinwood, Cleveland, Rev. J. H. Hornung, minister, at their quarterly meeting in July, re-elected the pastor unanimously and increased the salary to $3,200, a raise of $1,000 since Dec. 31. This will be Mr. Hornung's fourth year. All organizations in the church are making splendid progress. Sunday evening audiences average nearly 200. A men's chorus leads the singing. A social hour, with light refreshments, follows the evening services.

The church school of Collinwood has had an unprecedented attendance during the past year; the highest number on any Sunday was 647. The largest number of men in the men's class on any Sunday was 119. The church school has become a Standard Tercentenary School. Since Jan. 1, 78 have united with the church, 40 of whom were men; 51 of the 78 came on confession. The congregation will assume its apportionment for the World Movement in October.

Mr. Driver Installed at Lansford

English, Lansford, is happy in the recent coming of Rev. G. H. Driver to assume the pastorate. From every indication fruitful days are ahead for this important church of the Wyoming Association under the able leadership which it has secured.

An installation council was convened on July 7 which was attended by representatives from the churches of a wide area. Rev. E. B. Hart, Scranton, was moderator, and Rev. F. H. Pascoe, Coaldale, scribe. The statement of experience and belief by Mr. Driver was concise, illuminating and—unlike some "statements"—inspiring. Mr. Driver's special training in post-graduate work, together with his war work experience and successful previous pastorates, has prepared him, in eminent degree, for his present tasks.

The installation service in the evening was of high order. The sermon was by Rev. C. S. Ball, a former minister of Lansford, now of Associate, Baltimore. Other parts were as follows: Installation prayer, Rev. Bernard Copping, Baltimore; right hand of fellowship, Rev. F. H. Pascoe, Coaldale; greetings from the local churches, Rev. R. H. Sinclair; charge to the people, Rev. E. B. Hart, Scranton; charge to the pastor, Dr. C. W. Carroll, D. D., Middle Atlantic District.

NEW YORK

Church Organized at Endicott

The new Congregational church which has been made possible by the work of the New York State Church Field Extension Society, is hereafter to be known as the Ideal Community Congregational Church of Endicott, N. Y. It was organized Sunday morning, May 23, "For the glory of God, for the service of our fellow men, and for mutual assistance in our Christian life." Twenty-six persons were received into membership, 11 by letter and 15 on confession of faith. Rev. G. A. Brock, who has been responsible for and active in the inauguration of this new work, preached upon "The New Heaven and the New Earth." Two deacons were ordained, five trustees elected, and a Ladies' Aid Society of 15 members formed. A complete communion service was presented to the church by Mr. and Mrs. Sumner D. Felton. Rev. C. A. Bourner is acting pastor.

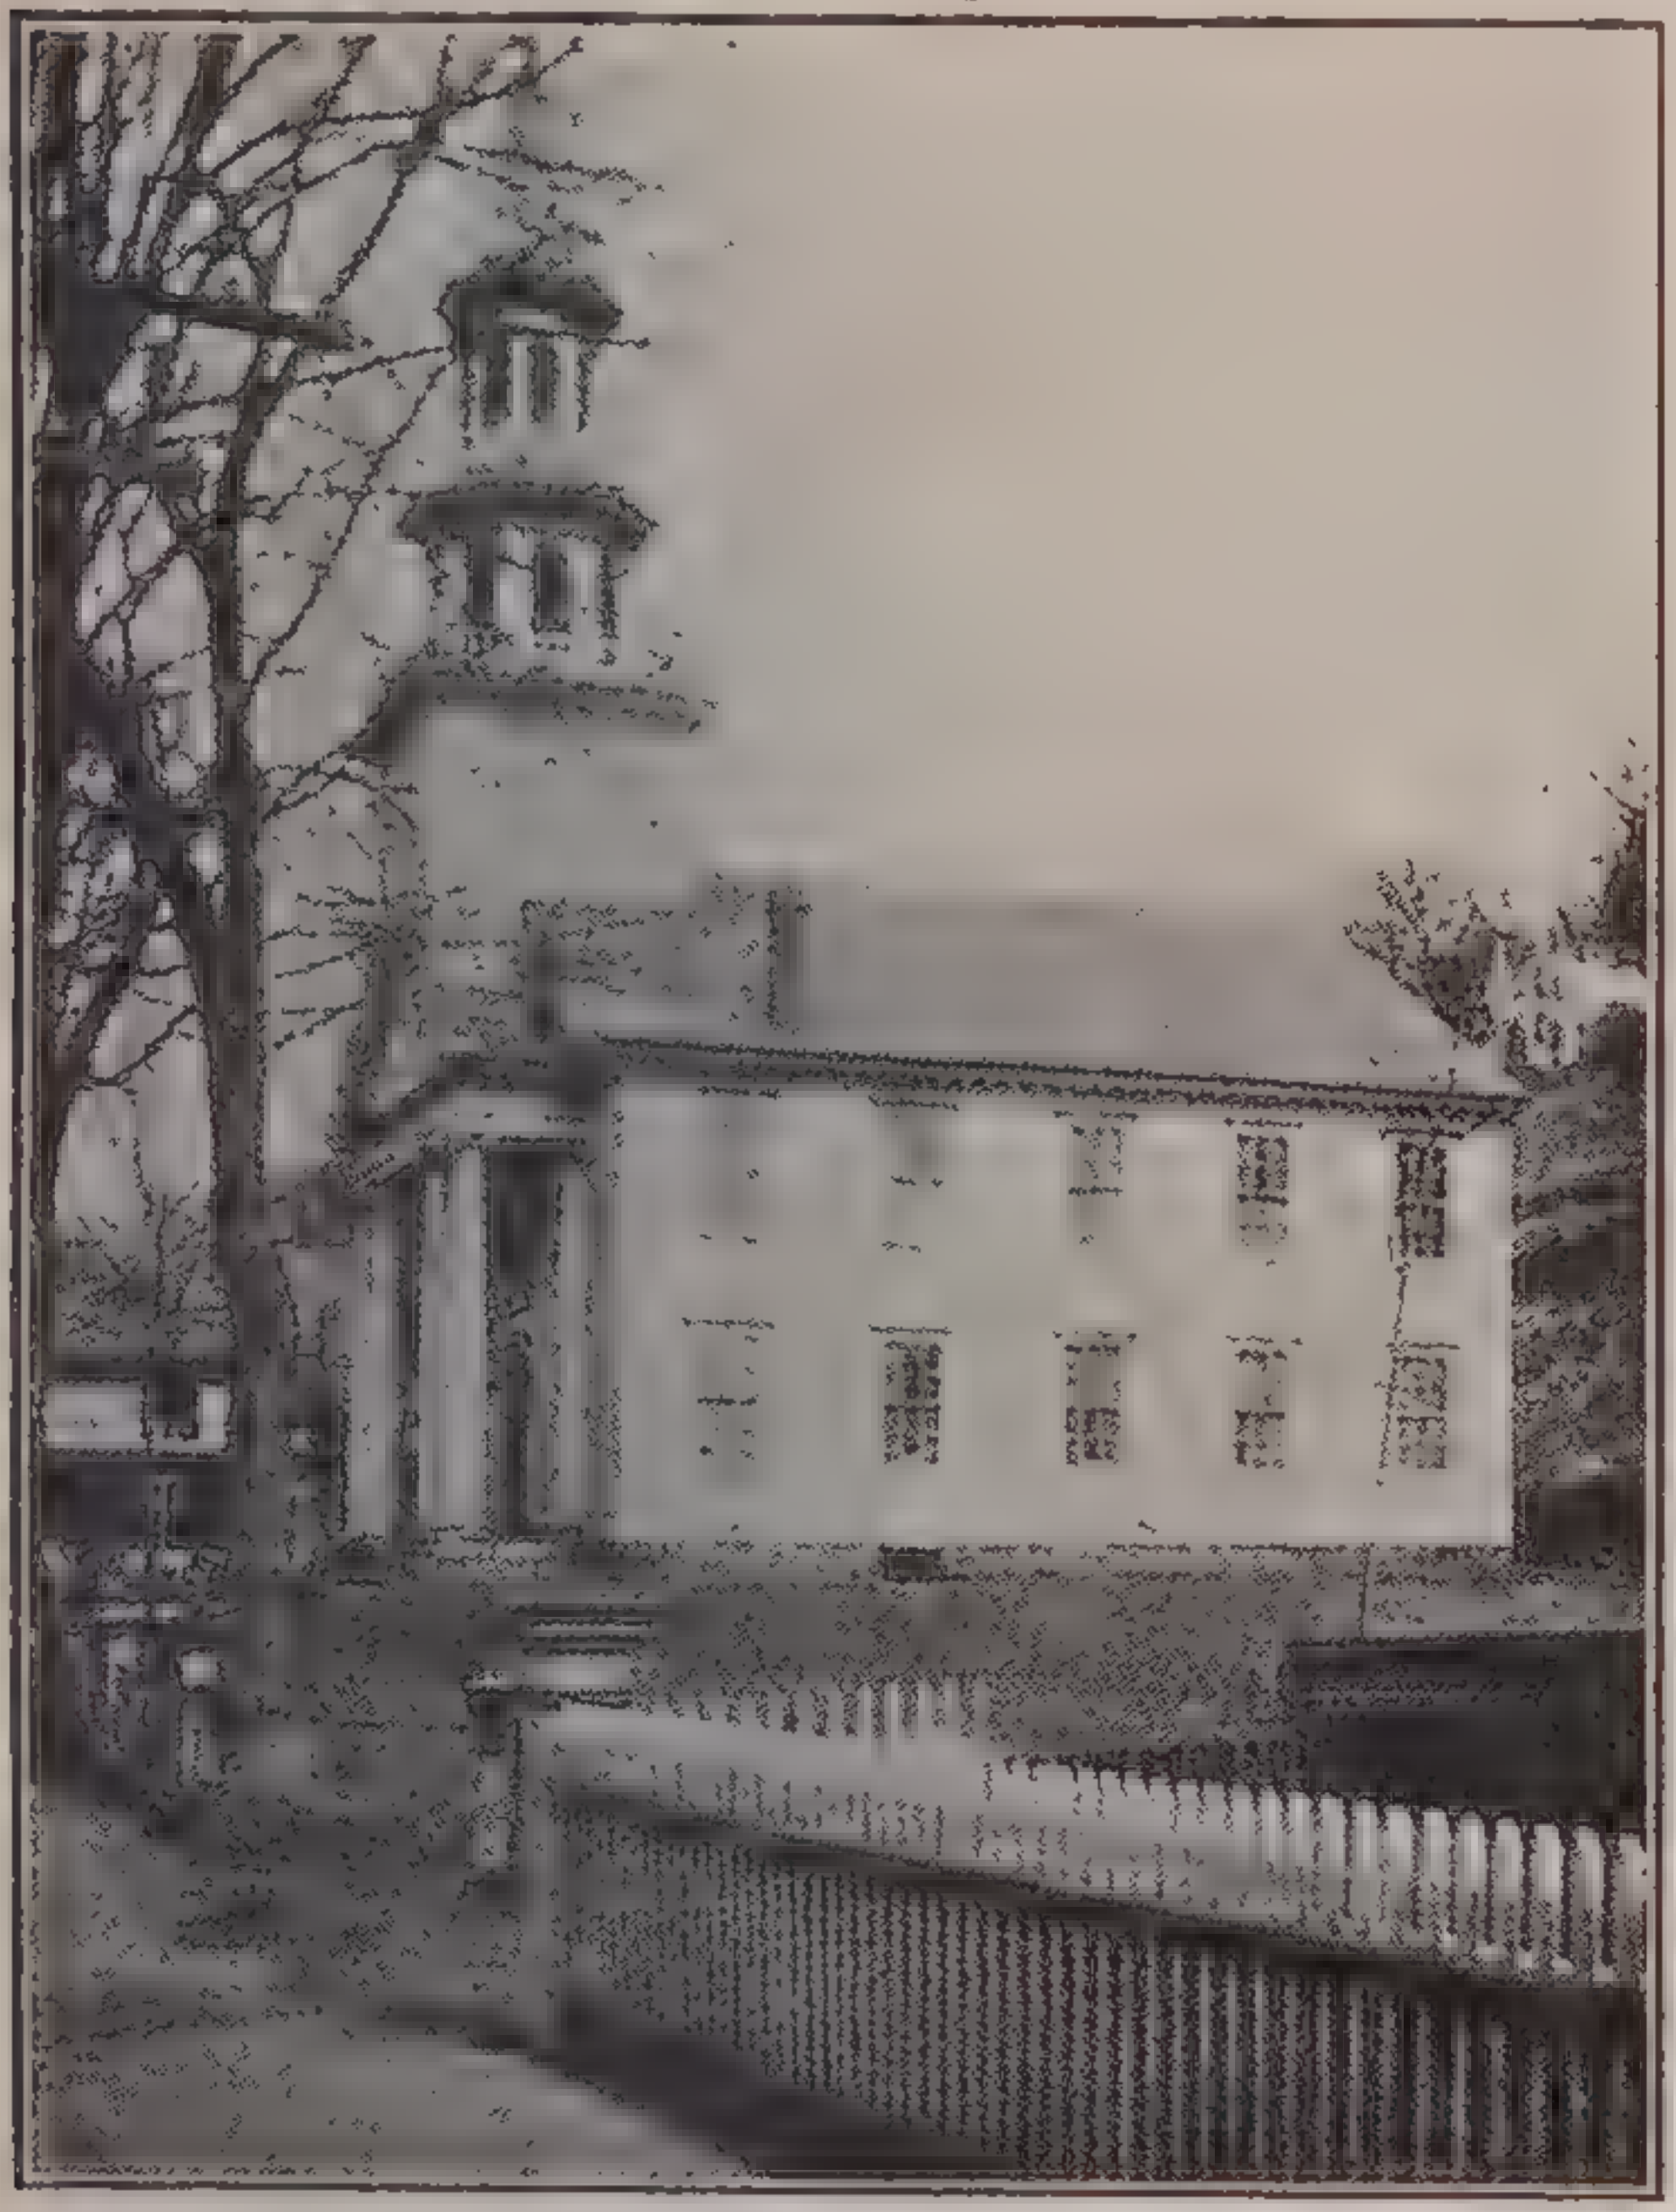
CONNECTICUT

Anniversary of First, Derby

FIRST, DERBY, Rev. W. F. Maylott, pastor, closed a week of celebration, July 4, in honor of the centennial of its present house of worship and the 250 years of the church's organization. A varied program was presented during the eight days and all services were largely attended. Those who gave historical addresses included Mr. Albert Sherwood, whose father was a member of Derby for 74 years, Mr. W. S. Brown, for 40 years superintendent of the Sunday school and organist, and George C. Allis, one of the oldest members. It was brought out that this church was the 14th to be organized in the state. It seemed fitting that the anniversary of building the present church edifice should also be celebrated at this time. It is a typical New England meeting house of colonial type, with a Sir Christopher Wren spire.



FIRST CHURCH, DERBY, CT.
Recently celebrated 250th anniversary

Five other churches have sprung from Derby: Oxford; Seymour; Second, Derby; Ansonia and Shelton. Twelve ministers have gone from it, one of whom, Dr. Amos Bassett, founded the Missionary Society of the state, the oldest society of its kind in the country. In spite of severe losses sustained by this old church, in removal, death and changing population, Derby faces the future determined to serve effectually its day and generation. That it is succeeding was brought out in the treasurer's report, which showed that this year more money had been raised for missions than in any previous year and that the recent extensive improvements to the church had been paid for. The pastor was surprised at the closing service with a gift of $250 from the people whom he has served the past five years.

Rev. A. M. Ellis Leaves Hartford

The call to New York which recently came to Rev. A. M. Ellis of WINDSOR AVE., HARTFORD, has taken from that city one of its greatly esteemed and beloved men. Mr. Ellis resigned from Windsor Ave. about a month ago to accept the call of Richmond Hill, Brooklyn, N. Y. He will assume his new duties the middle of September.

Mr. Ellis is a native of England and came to America soon after his graduation from Manchester University. He studied in Bethlehem Divinity School at Bethlehem, Pa., his first pastorate after his ordination as a Congregational minister being at Albany. After serving there for several years he was called to Kinderhook, N. Y., and in 1916 came to Hartford. In these four years he has endeared himself to the members of his parish, who are loath to have him leave; they realize, however, that the call to New York offers a new and promising field for the abilities of such a man as Mr. Ellis.

MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. Lawson Leaves Foxboro

Rev. W. E. Lawson has resigned the pastorate of BETHANY, FOXBORO, after a ministry of more than eight years with that church. His influence and power have been of a deep, constructive value. The church has been incorporated under his direction, and a vested choir, a troup of Boy Scouts and a Camp Fire group have been organized. His pastorate has also shown fruitful results in his work in Christian Endeavor, Sunday school and a Bible study class of girls of high school and college age.

Mr. Lawson has been ably assisted in his pastorate by his wife, who with untiring zeal has put splendid work into the activities of Foxboro. She has been interested in the Woman's Union, an organization which includes all departments of women's and girls' work in the church. She has also been active in the Sunday school and Christian Endeavor.

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age....... $50.61
At 50 years of age....... 71.77
At 55 years of age....... 114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

MRS. MARTHA E. O. BEAN

The United Congregational Church of Lawrence met with a severe loss when on May 22, 1920, Mrs. Martha E. O. Bean passed to her reward in the Great Beyond. Mrs. Bean was born in London, N. H., July 9, 1841, the daughter of Ira and Sallie P. Osgood. She was a young woman of marked personality and large influence in her native town and when she married the late Charles H. Bean and came to live in Lawrence nearly forty years ago, the Christian womanhood of the city received an accession of strength which never failed to the day of her death. She was interested in all good things and left bequests to the Y. W. C. A. and other public needs; but it was in her home and her church that her chief interests centered, and there she will be very greatly missed. Her husband went home to the Heavenly Father some six years before her, but a devoted stepdaughter whose filial love brightened the years of her widowhood remains in the family home.

In the days when the United Church was much smaller than it is now she was untiring in her labors for its advantage and has been a most faithful attendant upon its services. She has always been a tower of strength to the pastor in the church work. The last year of her life she and Miss Bean paid for enlarging and remodeling the church organ.

She was a loving wife and mother, a good

REV. CHAUNCEY N. POND, D. D.

Rev. Chauncey N. Pond, D. D., for many years active in church, Sunday school and missionary work, died June 12 in Oberlin, O. Born in Medina County, O., Oct. 23, 1841, he came to Oberlin in 1858 for his education. After graduation from the seminary in 1868, he held pastorates in Medina, Berea and Wauseon, O. After two years of editorial work in Chicago, he served some years as corresponding secretary of the Ohio Sunday School Association, superintendent for three states of the American Sunday School Union, president of the Ohio Conference of Charities and Corrections, and the treasurer and Northern secretary of the Industrial Missionary Association of Alabama. In 1864 he married Miss Harriet Perkins, who survives him. Of their three children but one remains, Percy Martyn Pond of Honolulu. The only daughter, Jennie Pond Atwater, went as a missionary to China, where she died in 1896.

Dr. Pond's geniality, kindliness and optimism made him a man of many friends and large usefulness.

World Wide Northfield

By Alice B. Frame

In the summer-long pageant of conferences that come and go on the beautiful lawn of Northfield, perhaps the one that considers the widest problems and includes the greatest variety of age and circumstances, assembles under the name of the Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies, which met this year July 8–16. Side by side, white hair and flaxen braids faced the facts about India and China and Turkey, given in the crowded auditorium meetings, or shared a newspaper cushion on Round Top, where one can almost see through the gorgeous sunsets to the Far East—so near, after all.

The Congregationalists had no reason to be ashamed of their contribution to the success of the whole. Of the total enrollment of 1,190 names, they owned 371. Miss Calder, after her trip around the world, was greeted with all sorts of ovations, from the Chautauqua salute to showers of sweet peas, and Miss Picken, Mrs. Emrich and Miss Hoxie, were inspiring leaders of classes. Miss Pullen was the efficient "mother" of the Aloha group.

Much missed were Mrs. Montgomery and Mrs. Peabody, though the latter came for a week-end, but the conference was fortunate in the gracious chairmanship of Mrs. W. E. Waters. Mrs. Grace G. Farmer took Mrs. Montgomery's class in the study of the new text-book, "The Bible and Missions," and also led the group who studied methods for women's societies; and Miss Ella Hoxie, formerly of India, consented to lead, at the last moment, a Bible class of girls whom Mrs. Montgomery had expected to teach. Indeed, the Bible classes, which the leaders feel should hold so fundamental a place in a world-Christian's life, made a deep impression on all. The majority of the older women drew great inspirations from the six addresses by Dr. J. D. Jones of England, to a greater sharing of our Christian joy. Deaconess Goodwin and Miss Pickering also had large classes who will never forget the teaching or the teachers. Besides the thorough study of "The Bible and Missions," there were study classes on "The Near East," led by Miss Schultz and Mrs. Emrich, and one on China lead by Dr. Heath of Peking. Practical methods were presented by Miss Peacock, Miss Bradley and Miss Bigelow.

As usual, the reception to missionaries was given the first day, and as usual was interrupted by a heavy shower. The denominational rallies all proved informal and informing family parties. Daylight saving made the "sunset services" on Round Top finish before sunset, to be sure, but they were as unforgettable as ever, because of the messages of such leaders as Mrs. Peabody, Miss Lillian Picken and others. Most impressive of all were the meetings where different young women stood gladly up under the great pines and told what coming to Northfield had meant, of awakening and purpose-making.

At the auditorium were talks about India, China, Persia, Japan, Turkey, and a partial report from some members of the Far East Deportation of the Federation of Women's Boards, all of which helped to draw the farther world a little closer about one.

"Rest and Recreation" was scheduled for each afternoon on the program, and were considered as a mild and aged joke by the leaders, but to the majority of the 750 girls enrolled in the nine camps it meant hikes, picnics, stunt parties and serenades, all culminating in a mammoth bonfire Wednesday night.

A huge company of spectators were held spellbound, when on Tuesday evening the camp girls gave a pageant, "Via Christi," commemorating the twenty years of the publishing of text-books by the Central Committee.

The closing hours summed it up. After Mrs. Emrich, whose vivid words made more vivid the pictures which laid the burden of those other women upon the hearts of all, had finished, the choir, in solemn processional, ushered down the aisle the beautiful Northfield Service Flag crowded with stars, to wave at last on the platform over the white-clad band of Student Volunteers, and nearest to the young teacher, doctor and nurse who are shortly sailing overseas. It made clear the need. It revealed also the answer.

All the doors that lead inward to the secret place of the Most High are doors outward—out of self, out of smallness, out of wrong.—George Macdonald.

Troublous Times in Turkey

As July draws to a close the news received by the American Board from its stations in Turkey is grave and in some cases disturbing.

From Adana, a large city near the north-eastern corner of the Mediterranean, the only communication with the outside world is by the French aëroplanes. Dr. William S. Dodd, of New Jersey, an American Board missionary and member of the Near East Relief's staff came out by aëroplane to Mersine, the port of Adana, July 17, and cabled to the effect that Adana was on verge of famine, having food for only four days. The population of the city is estimated to contain now 70,000 Christians and 10,000 Moslems, with many refugees. The Bagdad Railway which touched Adana has been cut for some time and although the French have promised to open it they now acknowledge that at least a month's repairs will be required to reach the next station in their possession.

A section of the road is in the hands of the Turks, and the city of Tarsus is closely besieged. Mr. and Mrs. Paul Nilson, of the Board's staff in Tarsus, who had been detained by the Turks for two weeks or more, were released, without ransom, on July 6.

Owing to censorship some cable messages seem very incomplete. However it is certain that the Aintab-Marash region is at a standstill industrially. The people attempted to open their shops and work their fields. Harvest time was approaching; but the frequent silent, mysterious disappearance of individuals when they attempted to work either in the city or outside, caused a panic and made the Armenians afraid to open their shops or gather their harvests.

Dr. Lorin Shepard, son of the famous Dr. F. D. Shepard—"Shepard of Aintab"—and a "Skull and Bones," man of Yale University in his own right. Dr. Shepard was born in Aintab, speaks both Turkish and Armenian and is trusted and respected by both races. His wife, formerly Miss Virginia Moffatt, of New Jersey, is with him and his little daughter, Alice, was born on June 2. The French had decided to turn over the city to the Turks on June 9, and it was a grave question before Dr. Shepard as to whether he should or should not send out the American ladies under care of the French troops. The Aintab orphans, with their guardians had already been sent out. Miss Lucile Foreman, of Ohio, who has been a missionary in Aintab since 1894, and has been very active in the city during these last months, felt that she should not leave her people and Mrs. Shepard was probably not strong enough to go even if she would have consented to do so.

A note from Constantinople announced the arrival there of Miss Sophie S. Holt of Massachusetts birth but University of Minnesota training, who was located before the war at Adabazar, but has been recently in charge of an orphanage at Ismid. Ismid became unsafe and Miss Holt and the orphanage were removed to Constantinople.

These American women seem to make nothing of packing their scanty supplies and starting with their hundreds of children from one desolate and dangerous city to another place only less unsafe. If ever the history of these days is adequately written a group of new names will appear in the Hall of Fame.

Inter-Seminary Conference at Princeton

By Calvin M. Clark

In 1918, at the suggestion of President Lowell of Harvard, a Conference of Theological Schools in the United States and Canada was held in Cambridge, Mass., to consider conditions growing out of the war. A continuation committee was appointed to superintend the investigation of certain problems, and to arrange for future meetings. The second Conference was held at the Graduate School of Princeton University, June 16–18, 1920. The hospitality of Princeton was in keeping with the splendid surroundings of the Graduate School. Fifty-six delegates were present, representing thirty-six schools and fifteen denominations. There were also present Prin. A. E. Garvie of London and Prof. R. Mackintosh of Manchester, England, both of them in America to attend the International Congregational Council.

The Conference elected as chairman Pres. C. A. Barbour, of Rochester Theological Seminary, and as vice-chairman, Prin. D. J. Fraser of the Presbyterian College of Montreal. Pres. George W. Richards of the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in the United States, and Prof. H. W. Foote of the Harvard Divinity School, continued their efficient work as secretaries.

Wednesday evening was given over to organization, and addresses of welcome by President Hibben of Princeton University and President Stevenson of the Seminary. The former pointed out that Jesus Christ as the great teacher had set the example to ministers to be teachers and urged that as such they ought to give their students the altruistic outlook and set before them a large end. The latter pleaded for a higher type of preacher.

Thursday forenoon was largely given over to reports of committees appointed at the last meeting of the Conference, Prof. Kirsopp Lake reporting on data relating to Opportunities for Theological Study Abroad, and Pres. Ozora S. Davis on Recruiting for the Ministry and Investigation of the Different Types of Theological Education. The latter presented as part of his report a preliminary statement of the Survey of the Theological Seminaries of North America conducted by the Education Department of the Interchurch Movement, and followed it by a full and candid comparison of different types of theological training. These reports, the latter of which caused much discussion, were followed by a carefully prepared paper by Vice-Chairman Fraser on the Function of the Ministry in the World of today, and an incisive and most suggestive statement by Chairman Barbour.

The afternoon of Thursday was given over to four addresses on the Aims of Theological Education, by Dean W. F. Fillet of Vanderbilt University, Prof. G. C. Foley of the General Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, Prof. J. H. Ropes of Harvard Divinity School, and Dean H. E. Jacobs of the Lutheran Theological Seminary, Mt. Airy, Pa. Prof. William Adams Brown of Union Theological Seminary spoke on the Common Problems of Theological Schools.

Friday morning brought a characteristically fine and finely phrased paper by Prof. F. G. Peabody on the Theologian in the Modern World, again stressing the thought brought forward at the outset by President Hibben of the need that the modern minister exercise his function as a teacher. As a teacher the minister, said Professor Peabody, must seek simplification, unification of his powers and spiritualization of his message. The morning closed with a paper on the Christian Doctrine of God, by Prof. T. F. Herman of the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in the United States.

It was felt by all that the Conference had proved so profitable that it was worthy of a permanent organization. The continuation committee appointed is to arrange for future biennial meetings, and is to appoint committees to prepare reports on pre-seminary courses of study, on the work of theological seminaries and Bible schools, and on any other matters of common interest to theological seminaries which may arise.

I had tried to get these adopted at Des Moines in 1904, but the committee accepted the rest of my resolutions and threw these out. Since the Des Moines Council I have worked constantly with Dr. Sanderson. As I chose him to be my first associate upon the International Commission on Polity, he chose me as his first associate upon the National Council's Commission upon Organization. For many years I have been chairman and he vice-chairman of the Advisory Board of Chicago Association. His judgment in the complicated and widely diversified matters coming up before that Board has been almost inerrant. I do not know another man in the denomination who was so certain to be right in such matters.

It has always been to me an occasion of sorrow that the Commission of Nineteen appointed in 1910 did not include him. He deserved a place in that notable group, and I know of no man who could have added so much to its wisdom as he.

He was modest; he was courageous; he was courteous; he was a true Christian. Those who worked most constantly with him are those who will miss him most, and will cherish his memory most sacredly. He has done the work of a good and great man. He was one of the foremost statesmen of our denomination.

The Supremacy of Jesus

By Rev. George A. Gordon, D.D.

JESUS stands supreme. In his brief career as a teacher, in the small compass of his utterance, he has been more comprehensive than any other recorded man of genius of the deepest experience of the human soul, and he has given to that experience monumental forms of beauty and power. It is here that we find the highest witness of his originality, the final assurance of his ascendancy over the mind of the world. He best of all knows our human world; he best of all has seen its tragic grandeur; he is unequaled in reading and in rendering its mighty meanings; to his influence, in kind, in range, and in promise, there is no parallel among the sons of men. He is today the centre of the world's hope, as in a tragic sense he is the need and the blind desire of all nations. His religion is the sovereign version in history of the Kingdom of the Eternal Spirit as that Kingdom lives in the best life of the race. When men live sub specie aeternitatis, they find in Jesus the only adequate utterance of their thoughts, feelings, purposes, and hopes. He more than all, he above all, is the prophet of the spiritual life of man in his pilgrimage through time.—From an article in the Atlantic Monthly, entitled "The Originality of Jesus."

The Talk of the Sanctum

Who's Who in This Week's Paper

Dr. William E. Strong is a secretary of the American Board whose interesting article about the Missionary Conference in Switzerland tells of the havoc wrought by war and war's suspicions in many of the missionary fields and of the processes of healing readjustment which are already at work. We hope all who read it will also remember the bereaved and disorganized missions in their prayers.

Henry A. Stimson, who writes the article on the Boy Scouts, was formerly pastor of Manhattan Congregational Church in New York City and has been among our most respected Congregational leaders for many years. He has written several books and is an editorial writer on the Financial Chronicle.

Mrs. Elizabeth M. Rowland, who gives some useful suggestions as to summer reading, is an old-time contributor to The Congregationalist who now makes her home in Akron, O. She and her husband, the late Dr. Rowland of Lee, are well remembered in the Berkshires, where in connection with his long pastoral service he was the willingly acclaimed Congregational "Bishop" of the region roundabout.

In the Circulation Department—

It is interesting to discover that The Congregationalist has served a variety of purposes during the one hundred and four years of its existence. Not long since, an old copy of the paper, when it was in newspaper form, was sent to us. We were somewhat amused to find the lower edge cut in scallops, clearly indicating that it had at one time served as a cover for a pantry shelf. Unfortunately, perhaps, for present-day housewives, the paper has been changed to the magazine form, which does not lend itself to such uses.

But a new idea for utilizing the many worth-while things which appear in The Congregationalist and Advance has recently been suggested to us by a loyal reader. He writes: "We would not want to get along without The Congregationalist and Advance. It beats the ordinary voluminous Sunday paper all hollow! It does one good to read the news from the churches and the able articles in every number. I have a hobby; i.e., scrap books, and hardly a week goes by that something does not find its way into one of these from your paper, such as the series of pictures of Notable Church Edifices and now the New England Homesteads. With best wishes for your continued success."

And still other friends write us that after serving their family, The Congregationalist and Advance is passed on to a neighbor or the church reading room, or public library.

What are you doing, dear reader, to help your paper render a wider service?

From Our Mail Bag

"I should be failing in a sense of due appreciation were I not to add my word of praise to those already spoken by the many subscribers of The Congregationalist.

"Allow me to say that the paper gets better each year. I don't see how you manage to keep the price at the old level when such papers as the Outlook and Independent with a larger circulation have advanced. The price of the paper used to be an objection to be overcome, but now it is cheaper than other journals of equal merit."

In order to acquaint the public with the general telephone situation, and some of the reasons for delay in completing new installations—chief among which is the difficulty of getting the numerous kinds of necessary material—we have prepared a series of announcements of which this is the first.

The General Telephone Situation

The reason orders for new telephone service cannot be completed as promptly as in the past, and that some orders are delayed weeks or even months, is that we are trying to meet an abnormal demand for service with a sub-normal supply of the materials necessary to give service.

It is not unnatural for persons moving into a house which formerly had telephone service to assume that, because of that fact, service to them is readily possible. For this mistaken assumption we ourselves are chiefly responsible, because we used to talk about "renting" a telephone, and even bill subscribers for "monthly rental." Consequently the mind of the average subscriber is still focussed on the telephone instrument as the controlling factor of telephone service.

While the telephone instrument is indispensable, it is only one of more than a hundred essential parts of telephone equipment. Lacking any of these parts, a telephone switchboard would be as ineffective as an automobile without its carburetor.

Some of these parts are made by ourselves; others by dozens of specialty manufacturers in various parts of the country. We could increase production if we could get the raw material and the transportation. But with labor troubles in the wire-drawing mills came a shortage of the copper wire necessary for cable and switchboards. Scarcity of paper caused almost a famine of the special kind of paper necessary for the insulation of these copper wires in the cables. And then came freight embargoes, following railroad labor troubles, so that for three weeks this summer one of the largest cable manufacturing plants in the country had to shut down because it could neither get the necessary raw material into its plant nor the much wanted finished product out of its plant and on its way to us.

The desire of waiting customers for telephone service is not more keen than our desire to serve them at once. We want them to feel that we are earnestly trying to do this as rapidly and as fairly as possible.

Idle Thoughts—A Vacation Message

"An instrument which recorded every word of the conversation was concealed in the room." A report of every word you said during a day would be bad enough, would be humiliating enough. But what of an instrument concealed in your brain which had recorded every idle thought! Yet the color of your character is the nature of your idle thoughts. Your idle moments, which even in the busiest life are many, are spent in the "City of Your Idle Thoughts."

There is the "Temple of Success," big, vulgar, over-ornamented and proud, a purely commercial structure. There is the "House of Gossip," known from the fact that its front door is just like its back door, a structure of mean appearance, low, unhealthy, without possibilities of privacy or seemliness within. In that City of Your Idle Thoughts are also the "Gardens of Kindness," filled with shady, cool, contented walks where your friends sit in peace and restful joy, partaking of all the pleasures which a loving imagination can plan for them. Central, alas! in many such a city is the "Theater of Passion," lit by artificial and lurid light and the morbid glow of unnatural excitement. There, too, is the "Tower of Faith," which has to be climbed but from which after the effort one can see both the future and the past, the plan of the city, and the eternal stars.

When I was a little boy my mother used to take me to town when she was shopping. I learned soon a fact that seemed very strange to me: "The shop windows at which my mother stopped were not interesting to me, and the windows at which I wanted to stop were not interesting to my mother." You cannot see everything. You must choose what you see. My mother chose to see hats. I chose to see . . .well, I was a boy, nine years old.

So likewise the City of Your Idle Thoughts is made. The buildings grow in size and importance by your visits. For one man the "Temple of Success" dominates all else and the "Gardens of Kindness" have almost been crushed out of existence by it. For another the "House of Gossip" and the "Theater of Passion" have grown so big that they dwarf all the other buildings of the city. What you choose to see, the buildings of the City of Your Idle Thoughts which grow by your visits—here lies the reason for the flavor of your personality. The color of your character is the nature of your idle thoughts.

The best thoughts are more fun than the worst thoughts and just a little harder to get started. Have you ever brought a group of young children a long journey? Mean, quarrelsome, idle thoughts work havoc with them after the first hour unless you can organize these idle thoughts in some better way. One point for a Ford car; two points for a white horse; three points for a blue bird; four points for a cat looking out of a window—and lo! by a system of idle thoughts just a little better than the quarrelsome ones, how much more fun! Try the same trick with yourself! When you are squirming back again under cover to the "Temple of Success" or the "Theater of Passion" during your long journey on a sleepless night or interval of waiting in vacation week —just put your broad foot down upon yourself, laugh when you wriggle, turn yourself back into the mental game of "thought" in "sympathetic remembrance."

Get started right every vacation day. Have a relish for good company in your mind. If you haven't a self-starter, get a good book to start you at a high level; or better still, a good friend, one who believes you to be better than you really are. Books, Nature, Friends—these are the great guests in the "City of My Idle Thoughts"; God's Thoughts, God's Works, God's Self.

This is my vacation message: Your idle thoughts—that is the part of life where you really are yourself, not what you are forced to be, or have to pretend to be, but what you really are.

The fairest, calmest, kindest place in the world must be the idle thoughts of some men and many women I know, those who love to plan in their day-dreams for the joy of their children or their husbands or their parents, whose hearts are innocent of guile and have no dark glades of deceit.

If God ever takes a holiday (and how He must need it!); tiring perhaps of angel wings and harps, He comes down perchance and spends his vacation in the peace and kindly atmosphere of some sweet hearts I know, whose dreams are ordered fair by knowledge won, cool gardens of sweet memories and golden hopes, whose imagination is all of nobleness and whose mental meanderings are along the ways of human kindness.

May your vacation thoughts be such a garden city where even God may take pleasure to walk in the cool of the day.

The Steel Industry and Christian Standards

If any considerable proportion of the millions of Christian people of the country give heed to the recently issued report of the Interchurch World Movement concerning the steel strike last autumn, there should arise such a loud protest against conditions revealed as would compel this most powerful industry to repent of its ways and do works fit for repentance.

Some dailies are seeking to discredit the report because the Interchurch Movement itself failed to reach its own goals. Some are saying that the Movement had no business to investigate the matter. To our mind, it did just what any organization undertaking to represent united Protestantism ought at the moment to have done, and we agree with a wirter in the Survey that this "searching and fearless interpretation of the facts" is one of the best things the Interchurch Movement, through its Industrial Relations Department, did.

We are asking Prof. Graham Taylor of Chicago to review and comment upon this report in a forthcoming issue of The Congregationalist. It is a document of 94,000 words soon to be published in a book of about 500 pages. Meantime we summarize briefly what competent experts discovered after four months spent in and around Pittsburgh and after availing themselves of the aid of Government departments at Washington and various welfare organizations. The report, amply supported by affidavits and other official documents, assert that:

More than fifty-two per cent. of the workers in the steel industry work twelve hours daily.

About half of this fifty-two per cent. labor seven days in the week.

The average steel worker's week in 1919 was 2.4 per cent. hours longer than in 1914.

The control of the industry is arbitrary and in the hands of financiers whose relation to the producing force is remote.

Two-thirds of the iron and steel workers earn from five to twenty-five per cent. less than the Government's estimate for "an American standard of living for an average family."

Three-fourths of a million persons have their lives determined arbitrarily by the twelve-hour day or by the lowest pay in the steel industry.

Sixty-eight per cent. of the foreign steel workers have families averaging six or more members to each household. In many of these "homes" conditions are most congested, unsanitary and dreary.

Our space does not permit more extended citations, but these will appear later, as well as some of the recommendations of the investigating committee. But what surprises us and will surprise the candid reader is the fact that notwithstanding the enterprise of all the daily papers in this country the public when the strike was on last October was either uninformed or deluded with regard to the situation in the steel industry and with regard to the issues at stake. We were told that the strike was planned and engineered by the Bolshevist element, whereas this report brings evidence to the contrary. We were told that the fight was over the open shop and collective bargaining, whereas this report shows that apart from these issues there is something fundamentally wrong in the relation of the owners of the industry to their employees. We were told, as we have been told for a number of years past, that the United States Steel Corporation had taken the lead in social betterment work, and that most of its employees were contented and prosperous. Undoubtedly the upper third, consisting of the superintendents, managers, foremen, gang bosses, and skilled workmen may be placed in that category, having been bound to the company by stock purchase, bonuses and pensions. But this report makes it clear that the lower two-thirds are far from contentment, and are working and living day by day under conditions below the American and the Christian standard.

The long and explicit report is not pleasant reading, but the Christian Church of the country cannot afford to overlook a document signed by nine such men as Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Chairman (Methodist); Dr. Daniel A. Poling (United Evangelical); George W. Coleman (Baptist); Dr. Alva W. Taylor (Disciples); Dr. John McDowell (Presbyterian); Dr. Nicholas Van der Pyl (Congregationalist); Mrs. Fred Bennett (Presbyterian); Bishop William Melvin Bell (United Brethren); Bishop Charles D. Williams (Episcopal). Moreover, the Executive Committee of the Interchurch World Movement, an entirely different body, has also passed upon this report and sends it to the public with its endorsement.

If the Steel Company is to clear itself, it must meet point by point the damaging disclosures in this report. But the best way to meet this grave accusation is to alter its relations to the lower two-thirds of its employees. If its managers and those who hold steel stock do not of themselves bring about a change, pressure of Christian sentiment ought to be so strong as to compel it, not only to prevent another strike in perhaps the not distant future, but to demonstrate the applicability of Christian principles to modern industry.

How Not to Do It in Summer

Our journeyings this summer have brought us into contact with three rural communities where the churches are meeting local conditions in three different ways. They are located in prosperous and attractive towns. Many of the inhabitants are intelligent and well educated. They have enough of this world's goods to maintain the usual quota of automobiles. The towns would be classified as quickly as any other towns in this country as nominally Christian.

In one of them two churches on opposite sides of the park are keeping open every Sunday. Overtures from one to the other for union during July and August failed, so a little stream of worshipers every Sunday morning trickles into each house of worship and in about an hour and a quarter trickles out.

We consider this method of meeting summer conditions wrong and wasteful. It proceeds on the principle that the main thing is to keep the institution going, no matter how few people sustain it. The chance to show the town that Christians belonging to different denominations are yet one in purpose is lost. The ministers supplying the respective pulpits speak to a meager few, whereas one alone might have the joy and inspiration of addressing a respectable congregation. We have not the slightest doubt that the Head of the church would condemn this competition among the churches that bear his name. It may be impossible, until some funerals take place, to bring together permanently in rural communities rival organizations. But it ought to be possible without completely destroying denominational foundations to bring together at a common center of Christian worship for six or eight summer Sundays the scattered members of Christ's flock.

In community number two the pendulum has swung to the opposite extreme. Nothing doing churchwise from Sunday, August 1, to Sunday, September 5. Anyone who desired to obey the apostolic injunction with relation to assembling ourselves together on the Lord's Day would have to travel to a neighboring town. The hermetically sealed doors of three Christian temples of worship, the suspension of everything in the form of Sunday school or prayer meeting convey the impression that organized Christianity of the Protestant type is not doing any business in August. Fortunately there is enough unorganized Christianity in this special community, enough faith, hope, and righteousness instilled into it by these very churches to keep the town from a very bad moral slump during the armistice.

But if there is any excuse for this lack of Christian enterprise and strategy, we have yet to discover it. The Chrstian church has an all-the-year-round commission. To be sure, minister, deacons, Sunday school teachers are all entitled to their vacations, but a relay system could be put into operation so that proper provision would be made for the constant spiritual needs of the community. People struggle and aspire, grieve and suffer, and long for the help of God and man in August just as truly as in January.

In a third community not far from the second, the summer congregations this year are much larger than they have averaged for the last twenty years. They include not only a good representation of the native population, but many summer residents. The Sunday school goes forward with an interesting program, modified by conditions which hot weather presents. The outsider gets the impression of a unified and earnest body of believers and workers. We put this case over against the other two as an illustration of the way in which to do it in summer time.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Kind of People in Our Town

There were two men who came newly into the City wherein I dwell. And it came to pass that they came both of them to visit me on the day of their arrival. For the one of them desired that he might borrow a Screwdriver: and the other besought me that he might use my Telephone to call up the Gas Company and the Electrick Light Company and the Butcher and the Baker and the Candlestick Maker.

And they inquired of me, both of them, saying,

What Kind of People live in this Town, and of what Sort of Folk are my neighbors?

And of each of them I asked, saying,

What Kind of neighbors didst thou leave behind thee; and of what Sort were the Folk in the Old Home Town?

And the first of them answered and said,

The Town I come from is an One Horse Town: and the Folk are a set of Four-Flushers; and they spend more money than they earn; and they are Unneighborly and Unpleasant; and they have so many Scandals that we kept ourselves apart like Lot in Sodom; because our righteous souls were vexed within us; and we shook off the dust of our feet and fled from that Burg and we looked not back.

And I said unto him, Thou wilt find this Town very much the same.

And while he yet Spake, the other came; and he asked of me the same question. And I likewise inquired of him concerning the Folk in his Old Home Town.

And he said,

They were fine Folk; and good neighbors; and it gave us pain to leave them; but Business called us here, and we had to leave our dear old friends.

And I said,

It is the same in this Town; and thou wilt find the People just as fine and good.

And the first man heard, and he was horrified; And he said,

Verily, thou art an old Liar; for thou didst tell me the folk of this Town were a Bunch of Grafters, and a Gang of Thugs.

And I said unto them both,

Listen unto me, and consider what I say. For I have told you both the truth. There are in Every Town two sorts of Folk. There are as many kinds of Folk in this town as there be in Oshkosh or Kalamazoo or Medicine Hat or Benares or Hong Kong. Thou canst find either sort.

But what I said is still more true; for each man is likely to find the town of the same sort as himself. May the Lord deliver me from having as a Neighbor a man who cometh from a Town of which he speaketh ill. For then should the word of the Prophet be fulfilled, saying,

And I will shew no mercy, saith the Lord, but will deliver every man into the hand of his neighbor.

And I said unto them both,

If thou wouldest live in a good Town, be good thyself. So shall thine own Town be partly good, and thou shalt be the good in it, and help to make it better. It is a dirty bird that doth befoul its own nest, and a mighty poor Citizen who doth knock his own Town.

In Brief

If we could only transfer the warmth and uplift of the summer conference to the local church! Well, why not?

Apart from the boosters and the notification ceremonies and the porch-visitors and the head-lines and the perfervid editorials of the tried and true partisan newspapers, it strikes us as rather a dull campaign so far.

Now that we have reached and passed the exact anniversary (Aug. 1) of the sailing of the Pilgrims from Delfshaven the Tercentenary may be said to be fully inaugurated. Hats off to the Mayflower passengers from this time on! They ought to have the center of the stage for the next three months.

The Jews are also confronted with the question of sex in their ministry. One girl, the daughter of a professor, is studying for the ministry in the Hebrew Union College at Cincinnati. The matter is thus summed up by President Kauffman of the college:

> "We have no objection at the college to women entering the ministry. The question is whether the congregations are prepared to receive women rabbis."

A newspaper man who will be missed is William Marion Reedy, owner and editor of Reedy's Weekly Mirror. He was born in St. Louis, where he made his way in newspaper work. His geniality, courage in the recognition of hitherto unrecognized talent and his incisive writing made him an influence in literary circles, and not only in the Middle West. A host of friends since his death have borne testimony to his kindliness, power, and charm in private intercourse. He brought to notice, among many other new writers, Edwin Lee Masters, whose "Spoon River Anthology" was first published in the columns of the Mirror.

Villa's desire in retiring from his career as a bandit chief in Northern Mexico for a ranch, a pension, and plenty of schools for his followers is a curious ending of a crazy career. Probably it is the cheapest way of settling the whole problem of his place in the Mexican national life to get him definitely planted somewhere. But the question, which we all hope will be settled in the affirmative, is whether he will stay planted. But the schools will be a good and much-needed investment of Mexican public funds. In the meantime the revolutionary area has moved westward and it is Southern California which is resisting the national authority and Governor Cantu, who says he will never, never yield to De la Huerta's government. And Southern California may prove a difficult nut for that government to crack.

The wages award to railroad workers, followed last week by the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission largely increasing rates both for freight and passenger service, to enable the roads to pay the increased wages and provide equipment and repairs, bring us, we hope, nearer to a workable and in some degree a stable condition as regards the largest single industry of the nation and the one on which the efficiency of all the rest depends. It all amounts to an assessment which will necessarily be felt by everybody. The new rates will reach commuters first. They will have their effect in limiting travel and keeping up the high cost of living by adding to prices. They will reduce to some extent the purchasing power of the increased wages granted and will help to make the lot of the man who has had no advance or who lives on an inelastic income more difficult. They are a new warning that only by productive work, and as much of it as we can fairly give, is there a way out of the difficulties into which the war and the inflation of currency caused by the war have brought us.

Two sidelights on the difficulties of putting theory into action in the questions of business management and the relations of employer and employed may be found in incidents of the week. One came in connection with the sailing of that Australian-Irish prelate, Archbishop Mannix, who has been going around the United States with a chip on his shoulder. Part of the crew of the steamer announced that they would strike if he were allowed on board. And another part retorted that they would strike if he were not. We used to settle such questions by choosing a captain and giving him authority. The other was the utterance of the British Communist Party at its first convention in adopting a resolution declaring it a necessity to "set up a dictatorship of the proletariat as a means of combatting counter revolution." The chairman of the convention also declared that those who resisted the revolution which the convention desired were "responsible for bloodshed, since they stood in the way of revolution."

OUR "CAMINO REAL"

Using the Vacation Season

The tendency of church schools to adjourn during the summer is being deplored by those who recognize in the summer months the opportunity for more thorough religious education than can be provided during the busy winter season, when the public school so wholly engages the child's time. Publicity in The Church School and other journals against this custom, together with organized effort to adapt summer sessions of churches to meet the local situation, is directed toward a constructive solution of this question. By properly regulating the program in the morning school, more rather than less may be accomplished.

In addition, however, various systems for daily sessions have been worked out in different sections of the country, the best known and most widely popular of which is the Daily Vacation Bible School system, originated by Rev. Robert Boville of New York City.

The first schools of this type under Congregational auspices in Southern California have been established this summer. The school in Venice and at Park Villas, San Diego, are the two experiments for which our denomination is entirely responsible. In co-operation with other churches, however, we share in financial support and leadership in the community schools in Pasadena and in Los Angeles.

The Venice Church is peculiarly well suited to conducting a Vacation Bible School, being situated in the midst of the hurly burly of that Coney Island of Southern California. Unusually fine teachers have been secured for this school and its daily sessions are attracting an increasing number of little children, some of whom are here receiving their first Bible knowledge. The handwork and other attractive features are made to harmonize with the distinctly religious emphasis which is the aim.

At Park Villas Church the school gathers the children of the community for this same kind of carefully planned program; and week after week it has increased in numbers and interest.

* * * * *

Perhaps more significant than these strictly denominational ventures is our co-operation in the community schools. In Pasadena the Religious Education Directors of the four downtown churches planned a community school which should be departmentalized and hold one division in each of the four churches. The First Congregational Church is responsible for the kindergarten, and under the able leadership of its director the provision for the smallest children was carefully planned and is being well executed. This fourfold school in Pasadena is of large proportions, the enrollment being about five hundred.

A smaller community effort developed on a somewhat different plan is in operation in Los Angeles, where the Baptist, Christian, Congregational and Presbyterian churches of the down-town apartment house section united in a school held in the First Baptist Church. An extension of the co-operation here includes the use of the Y. M. C. A. gymnasium, located but a block from the church.

* * * * *

In preparation for all these schools, an institute under interdenominational direction was held in Los Angeles, June 30 to July 3, and a smaller one the same week in San Diego. Two hundred and forty teachers were in regular attendance at the Los Angeles training conference. Experts on Bible Study, Bible Geography, music, supervised play and craft work conducted the various sessions. The Baptists and Presbyterians have gone particularly far in their development of this Vacation Bible School plan, each of those communions holding 22 schools in Southern California this year.

Altogether, the movement promises good results along the lines of vacation work in Religious Education, and not the least of its value lies in the demonstration of denominational comity in days when the establishment of that relationship is especially needed.

The American Missionary Association's Crisis

It has been increasingly evident that the American Missionary Association was facing a crisis. No one can face without seriousness the responsibility of about twelve thousand students and six hundred teachers in our schools besides the many churches and missions. But we are compelled to administer our trust not only with the need of these peoples in view, but with the solvency of our Association guarded. We must cut our coat according to our cloth. If the churches do not give us cloth enough, we must be content with a smaller coat. We have long been trying to stretch our income over too many schools—not too many for the needs of the field, but too many for both the quality of the school and for the possiblity of our resources. This, of course, has been increasingly so during these times of economic strain.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

If the employer sits in his pew and listens to the sermon when his workmen through his fault are so weary or ill-clothed that they cannot attend, then it is not their pews that are vacant, but his.

It was to meet these difficulties that we entered into the financial campaign of the Congregational World Movement with our asking of $415,000, which was the minimum for full efficient work. The whole amount was not raised—it appears at this writing that not over two-thirds will be available.

At the last Executive Committee meeting we made out our budget for the year. We added about $100,000 to the salaries, $50,000 for building repairs, for deficits and other obligations to which we were pledged in Survey for the C. W. M. When we had finished, our budget overtopped our income by about $87,000. Our cloth did not meet the design of our coat. We had to cut. We cut one-half from the repairs of buildings—many of which will be beyond repair in a few years. We cut at every point we could which would not vitally affect our main work. We allowed for $30,000 more in faith that the C. W. M. would bring more returns and we were still short $25,000. There was only one way out and that the hardest thing we could be asked to do—cut out some schools to keep others from sagging below the standard. But which schools? We proceeded on the basis that those schools should be suspended which were in such physical condition that they would require the most to make them usable or where the public schools had been brought the nearest to a standard of efficiency. After much deliberation we decided that Chandler at Lexington, Emerson at Mobile, and Gregory at Wilmington should be suspended for a year or until such time as our receipts shall justify their reopening.

After this decision was made the colored people of Mobile and Wilmington presented very vigorous protests and asked that they might be given a chance to see what they could do locally for the continuation of the schools. A. M. A. Leagues have been formed and subscriptions are coming in with the hope that the schools will continue but above all with the knowledge that the people who for fifty years have received so freely, now will also give freely.

Doubtless these words will meet the eyes of some to whom one of these schools has been especially dear or some church that has taken special interest in one of them. You are sorely disappointed and you may well be, but had we closed some other there would have been others just as sorely disappointed and we believe more strategic and needy fields would have been abandoned. If the churches of either Massachusetts or Connecticut had met their full quota in the recent campaign, we should have had enough to have continued these schools and about eight hundred needy Negro boys and girls would not be without the promise of Christian education this coming year. We regret this action more than we can express, but the only other alternative was an accumulated debt.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Comment on the Steel Strike Report

A NEED OF AMERICANIZATION

Such a disclosure gives point to the assertion that has been so frequently made in connection with recent efforts at Americanization in this country, namely, that it is Americans themselves who most need to be Americanized. It has been customary to name the steel industry as among the first of American industries. But is it American, if, with all its great expansion, and the capability of its industrial and financial directors, it can allow its thousands of workers to live on in conditions that stultify their Americanism, that can hardly fail to foster and perpetuate hostility to the established order, and in ignorance of those things which the best thought of America knows to be essential to a safe citizenship? It may be that a great industry in a so-called free country can exist half free and half slave, but the country cannot.—Christian Science Monitor.

INHUMAN AND UN-AMERICAN

When the strike started last September more than half the employees of the great corporation worked on the 12-hour schedule. The commission's report says this is "inhuman;" few are the citizens of the United States who will not say that it is un-American.—Boston Herald.

AWAY WITH THE TWELVE-HOUR DAY

And it goes back to the twelve-hour day. Wipe out a practice which makes of the man merely a laboring, sweating, sleeping caliban; give him opportunities for leisure, recreation, education—for Americanization—and very soon you render impossible the management of labor through the encouragement of racial feuds, through keeping the worker a foreigner against his will. You render unnecessary and impossible a corporation labor policy based on the spy and the agent provocateur. Open to the foreigner the facilities for becoming American, give free scope to his manhood, and we may have strikes, but we will have no fears of "Bolshevism."

The outstanding lesson of the Interchurch report is that the twelve-hour day operates against manhood and against America. It must be done away with.—New York Evening Post.

The Mission World Viewed from Switzerland

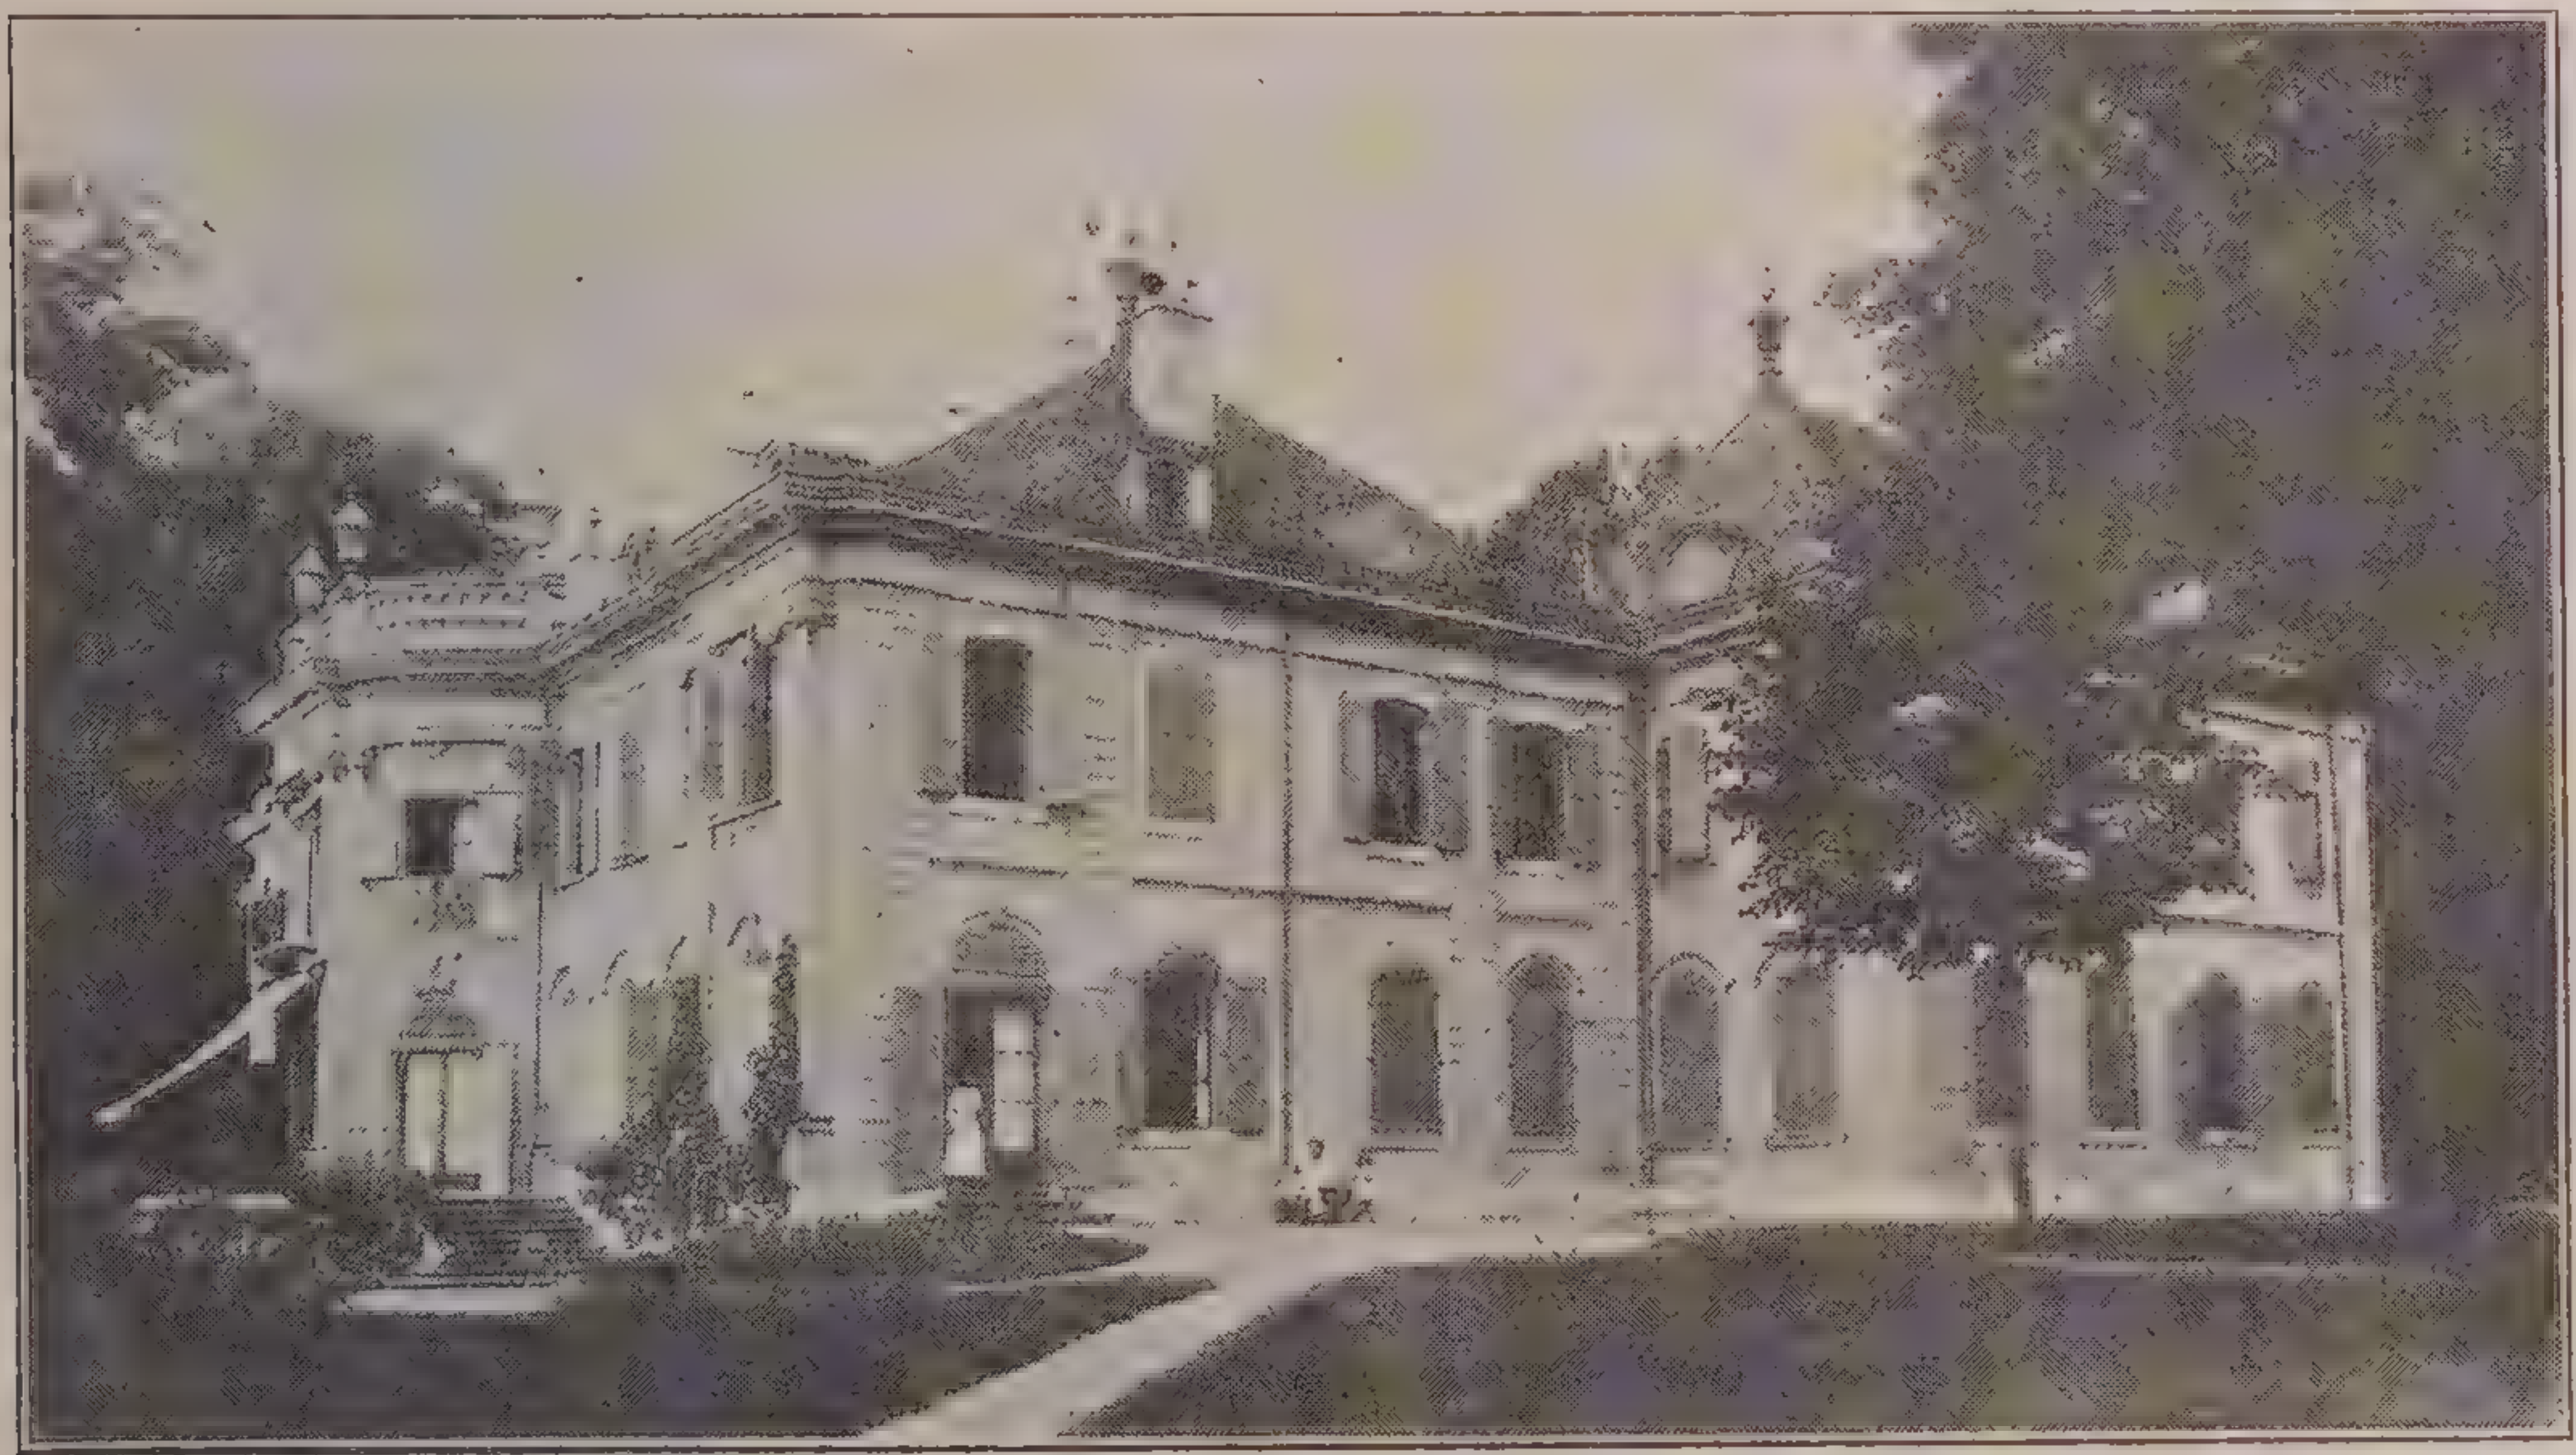
An International Meeting Held at Crans, near Geneva, June 22–28

By Rev. William E. Strong, D.D.

It was no such Conference for size or spectacle as that held at Edinburgh in 1910. There was nothing big about it, or showy; no crowded assemblies, or eloquent orations, or popular forth-puttings. Instead there were gathered only thirty-eight men, with a few ladies, who sat about a table in one room and deliberated in conversational tones and with informal remark on the several topics brought before them.

Thirty-Eight Representatives of Eleven Countries

Yet it was a great meeting and destined, it is believed, to have real effect upon the remaking of the world. For these thirty-eight men were from eleven countries and represented as many as eighty foreign missionary societies, American, British and Continental. Inasmuch as several of these delegates were from the mission fields, from Japan, China, India and Africa, it is not too much to say that Protestant Christendom was reflected in this assembly. And there was weight to the representation: such men were there as the English Bishop Westcott, Metropolitan of India and Ceylon, and chairman of the India National Missionary Council; and the American Bishop Roots of Hankow, Chairman of the China Continuation Committee, who was made Chairman of this meeting; J. H. Oldham of London, Editor of the International Review of Missions, chosen Secretary; John R. Mott of New York, made Chairman of the Business Committee; Dr. Ritson of the British and Foreign Bible Society, Rev. Cecil Bardsley of the Church Missionary Society, Bishop King of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel and Rev. Frank Lenwood of the London Missionary Society; M. Couve and Dr. Allegret of the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society; Dr. Anet, Secretary of the Belgian Missions to the Congo; Bishop Hennig of Herrnhut, Prof. Haussleiter of Halle, Prof. Richter of Berlin and Pastor Wurz of Basel, representing unofficially various German societies; Drs. Gunning of Holland, and Fries of Sweden and Prof. Tome of Denmark; Principal Gandier and Canon Gould of Canada; and Drs. Watson (Presbyterian), Corey (Christian), Wolf (Lutheran), and Fennell P. Turner, Secretary of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, from the United States.



COLONEL VAN BERCHEM'S BEAUTIFUL CHATEAU OVERLOOKING LAKE GENEVA

Within this spacious and hospitable home of Colonel and Mrs. Van Berchem at Crans, near Geneva, representative Christians from eleven countries counciled together concerning the world-wide work of the Christian Church. The meetings were held daily in the music room, at the corner of the house where the doors are open. All the delegates took their meals together in another room of the château and enjoyed the leisure moments in strolling about the terraces and gardens which slope down to Lake Geneva.

A New Evidence of Christianity

That this group of men, leaders in national as well as church life, loyal each to his own land and type, could come together so soon after the war and enter into frank discussion of subjects whereon they could but differ and whereon also they had strong convictions and prejudices; and that they could pursue these discussions without rancor or cleavage to the securing of a common judgment as to what might be approved, was in itself an achievement to make every Christian heart rejoice. As was repeatedly expressed, it was wonderful what a spirit of mutual confidence and regard pervaded all the sessions; not only that, but how friendly and intimate were the conversations of the little groups of two or three who, in the hours of relaxation, strolled together about the grounds or found themselves side by side at the dining tables. A better evidence of Christianity, it seemed, than some that are relied upon in Natural Theologies.

The discussions were not hackneyed. Their subjects were of pressing concern. They grew out of the great war, which in its shaking of the world has disturbed missionary work in many ways and to an extent not yet generally realized. For example, it has driven out from their fields of labor about one-eighth of the total number of foreign missionaries in the world. Of 2,500 men and women having care of German missions in the several countries where they have been planted practically none remains at his post. For military reasons they have been excluded; interned or, as in many cases, repatriated. Their work has been variously treated; temporarily transferred to the oversight of other missions, reorganized on an independent basis, or, too often, left uncared for and disrupted.

Whatever may be said in defense of the action from a political standpoint, it is a heavy blow, not only to the genuine missionary devotion of a multitude of the German people, but to the Christian enterprise as a whole, to the progress of the Kingdom of God on earth. It would be intolerable that such a catastrophe should be disregarded or lightly accepted. As in successive sessions of this conference, we traced the situation following the war in one after another of the mission lands, hearts and minds became united in the feeling that here was a burden to be borne together and for whose lifting we must unitedly labor. Provision was made for laying the facts before all the mission boards, through their national organizations, with a view to finding a common plan of action for the relief of this distress.

Missions and Government

Another burning question of the time grew out of the new situation faced by the educational work of foreign missions. Oriental governments are taking increased interest in popular education; are feeling its importance to national development; are becoming sensitive to and in some cases suspicious of the effect of mission schools and colleges in their influence upon the youth of the land. A more assertive Nationalism is inclined to arrogate to the State entire control of education and to weaken or suppress those institutions which missions have founded and which have won popular confidence and patronage. In some cases it is boldly said that while religion is an affair of the church, education is an affair of the State and not to be meddled with by missions. Earnest and careful hours were given to a review of the educational situations in mission lands and to a consideration of the attitude which missionaries should take to this new temper that is appearing after the war.

The delicate but inevitable intermingling of missionary activities with political affairs furnished another field of inquiry and comparison. It was made clear that as moral questions and values are increasingly recognized in political movements, national and international, the old short rule that the missionary must keep out of politics does not sufficiently meet the case. When anti-opium crusades, atrocities Korean or Armenian, student outbreaks, social and industrial rebellions, all are involved in the political affairs of the nations, it cannot be helped that Christian missions should exert an influence that must be reckoned with. In the midst of a universal popular agitation, the Christian spirit cannot be altogether colorless and anæmic. It was important for this Congress of missionary leaders representing all lands to consider what should be approved and what disapproved as regards missionary participation in public affairs; as to what a just neutrality requires in word and act and bearing.

The Lovely Environment

If there is not much to report as actual findings or results of this Conference, its real accomplishment was beyond measure. As has been intimated already, the contacts of the time were perhaps its greatest value. The meeting place was a benediction: at the small village of Crans, on the border of Lake Geneva, across which rose the French mountains with the three peaks of Mt. Blanc in the farthest background; and in the château of Colonel and Madame Van Berchem, the stately home of a family that has occupied it for generations, and whose present representatives dispensed a hospitality of medieval amplitude and of the finest Christian spirit of today. Their great house with its twenty-six rooms, their grounds and walks, their gardens of flowers and fruits from which were daily brought bountiful supplies (one will not soon forget those raspberries and currants and cherries), and above all their high-hearted friendliness, outpoured upon every guest and expressed in uncounted ministries and attentions, made every day a fresh delight and stimulus.

From beginning to end the Conference met in an atmosphere of Christian regard and good will. The spirit was infectious; it was impossible to be suspicious, prejudiced, selfish in these surroundings.

Steps were taken before the Conference ended which may lead to a permanent International Missionary organization, successor to the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference of 1910, and which shall conserve and develop all that was accomplished at Crans. It is hoped that if the Mission Boards represented approve of the plans such an organization will be effected and that its first meeting may be in America in 1921.

We parted after this week of outlook together with a heightened sense of the place and worth of the foreign missionary enterprise among the world's forces and of the absolute necessity that it shall be viewed and administered internationally. No less measure will suffice for so great a task.

The Sunday School and the Boy Scout Army

A Mighty Force for Good

By Rev. Henry A. Stimson, D.D.

The preliminary report of the Investigation of the Interchurch World Movement showing the great falling off in attendance in our Sunday schools, though for several years it has been widely known that the Sunday schools were losing ground, is sufficiently startling.

It could probably be shown that there is also a marked diminution in the number of children present at the services of the church. Here and there a great Sunday school and a church with children abundant in the morning service only emphasize the prevailing contrast. The sight of the pew with a parent at each end and a row of children sitting between is much rarer Sunday mornings than it once was.

It is quite possible that the same causes are at work in affecting attendance at both Sunday school and church. Of late it is frequently said in the homes that two services are too much for the children; and perhaps this is true, the services being what they are, though they were once not so regarded. In some churches what we must believe a mistaken attempt is made to meet the difficulty by dismissing the children in the midst of the morning service when they do attend. It only emphasizes the assumed burden.

More serious efforts are made to remedy the conditions by making the Sunday school more attractive; enlarging, beautifying, or equipping more adequately the room; improving the teaching both by care as to the courses of study and in the selection of teachers; and brightening the general exercises; while stirring up the interest of the families and the church to the importance of the work.

It must be gratefully recognized that here and there public school boards are co-operating with the churches in providing opportunity for outside religious instruction one day in the week after the school session. The community is waking up to see what it means to have even a single generation of children grow up without definite religious instruction, and so little influenced by the church as to enter adult life without the habit of worship and practically without personal religion.

Meanwhile there has grown up alongside the church an organization already rendering great service and capable of doing much more, namely, the Boy Scout Army. Organized in a small way a few years ago in England it has spread to other countries. Here it numbers four hundred thousand lads as members, with a large number of scout masters and officers.

It reports that only lack of funds prevents it from securing the force it needs to reach out for the ten million boys and youths in America not yet enrolled. It has gained a strength and wide acceptance which justify its ambition and give promise of its permanency.

Many feared in its early days that it would foster an undue military spirit in the boys. This fear has however been entirely dissipated. A uniform is worn because it is the least expensive thoroughly serviceable costume obtainable. It also has a definite value in promoting esprit-de-corps and for identification, which is important. What soldierly suggestion there is in a uniform and discipline is in holding up the ideal of the citizen "prepared" for daily service, which is the real purpose of the organization.

The oath which every boy takes is "to do his best; to do his duty to God, to his country, and to the Scout law; to help other people at all times; and to keep himself physically strong, mentally awake, and morally straight." The "Scout law" is simply a series of injunctions as to his personal conduct.

The lad is advanced from grade to grade, always in the hands of the scout master, being taught the things that will be useful and necessary in his daily life in whatever circumstances he may be. He is constantly tested and examined to make sure his progress. The ideal made possible for all is in fact a new type of boy, red blooded, inured to hardship, landing on his feet whatever happens, not daunted by difficulty, strong, helpful, enthusiastic, entirely trustworthy, "mentally awake, and morally strong."

He is expected to find at least once every day an opportunity to render to some one a needed helpful service for which no reward is expected. The report of this is a necessary part of his daily record.

No argument is necessary to prove the effect of such training to straighten up a lad mentally and morally as well as physically; to open to him new sources of happiness in himself, as he gets the habit of service, and a growing sense of his value in the world. He is more than a future citizen. Continually new ways open for him to show his value to the community, and so to the state. He is also more than potentially a Christian: he is making daily progress in a life that, followed, may be made clear to him as fitting him to know and serve Jesus Christ. Such a Captain of his salvation he is ready for.

The church may well give larger heed than it has to the Scout Army. Our young people are under great pressure to see what life may have in it for them. It offers much of gain, of pleasure, of success, on all sides. The Scouts are taught to think more of what they make of life itself. They have learned to think less about their rights and more about their duties and responsibilities. They know the meaning of sacrifice and the strength that lies in discipline. They are ready for service. The church can make great use of them. Gathering them closely into its affection and care, securing for all its boys immediate membership in the Scout Army it may find a new spirit entering the entire congregation.

The church which works in such fellowship and has within its walls young people of that type, self-forgetful, eager to serve, pleasant to live with and to know will need no special advertising. It has all the elements of a family and a home, and will be sure to win both influence and support.

In this day of multiplied machinery and constant effort to lay hold upon the community and to render social service here is a well tested agency which has no drawbacks and is sure of results that are abundant and permanent.

On a Summer Sunday

A Bit of English Preaching

Four Newton, Mass., churches—Baptist, Methodist, Unitarian and Congregational—combining for the summer services, turned out but a meager congregation on Aug. 1 to hear Rev. B. L. Woolf of Liverpool, England, preach in Eliot Church. That small congregation, however, was rewarded for its faithfulness by a sermon vivid with telling illustrations, and striking with the sure directness of aim typical of English preaching on a theme of great spiritual power.

The American preacher uses his text as the corner-stone upon which he builds his argument; the English preacher has a different method. His text is his sermon; he aims simply, by illustration, explanation, repetition, and every other means in his power, to elucidate the meaning of the passage chosen and drive home its message into the hearts of his audience. Mr. Woolf's sermon was no exception to this rule. "Prove me now herewith, saith Jehovah of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room to receive it." (Mal. 3: 10): that was his text and the whole message of his sermon.

He likened the "pressure of the almighty God behind his universe" to the power of steam in a ship's boiler, ready to send the great mass cutting through the ocean. A pinhole opening in the boiler will allow only enough steam to escape to hiss and eddy in a thin curl, giving no indication of the power behind. It is only as adequate valves are provided that the force of the steam can make itself felt and accomplish its work. It is only as men open their lives to the infinite power of God that his strength is able to exert its driving, transforming might in individual life and in the life of the world.

Mr. Woolf is one of a number of the Council delegates from England who are supplying various pulpits in America during the summer months. It is to be hoped that many Congregationalists will avail themselves of the unusual opportunity of hearing the message of these men who, with such earnestness and singleness of purpose, proclaim the "unsearchable riches of Christ." H. F. M.

Christianity is at present embarrassed by a kind of universal egotism. Under the guise of democracy men have been betrayed into the idea that we do not need leadership or that any man who can create a party is fitted to be a leader. Both ideas are false. A very little individual can work up a following but it takes a big, strong, true person to be a leader. James, the Lord's brother had this in view when he wrote: "Be not many of you teachers, my brethren." Confusion in leadership spells defeat.—Christian Evangelist.

The Pro and Con of the Campaign

Two Ministers Go on Record

EDITORS' NOTE.—To show that even in these summer days members of our constituency are thinking pretty seriously on politics we give herewith two differing views, one from Dr. Henry A. Stimson of New York, who has been prominent in denominational affairs for many years and one from Rev. Elwell O. Mead of Connecticut, who is also well known in Ohio.

Dr. Stimson's Letter

To the Editor of the New York Times:

Americans, who lived through the last six years with something of the spirit with which, when the time came, we gave ourselves with our sons and our daughters in response to the call for a supreme sacrifice in France, cannot but read with heavy heart Senator Harding's formal and carefully weighed utterances.

When he closed his first home-coming speech with "America first" six times reiterated, one felt that surely he would have something less like "Deutschland über Alles" to say.

Now comes his speech of acceptance, with his juggling of high-sounding words shaken as pieces of high-colored glass in a kaleidoscope. Does he really believe that the supreme desire of America is for "tranquillity;" or that the supreme sacrifice of the sons of America can be asked "only for America," and when connected with its "call of honor," or that we shall be ready to "serve ourselves, humanity and God?"

Are we not sick with having "ourselves" kept at the front of the discussions of the irreconcilables in the Senate for a year? Must ourselves now be officially and definitely set before "humanity," and even "God?"

When the treaty has been accepted even by Turkey, and the League which is its enacting clause has been a going concern signed by every nation big and little, except the United States, Mexico and possibly one small South American country, and all America is waiting for one clear word at home on this the vital question of the world, what do we have but the declaration that the Senatorial bill for Peace by Resolution, if reintroduced, will be promptly signed by the President-to-be, if elected? A proposition that was the laughing stock of the country, received by the public as the last attempt at camouflage, now trotted out in a Dolly Varden dress of fine words and possible approval by "my advisers."

The country has not been treated with "simple things said in such a solemn way," in Presidential utterances, since the days of President Buchanan!

The world's sympathy has long been asked for him who leans upon a reed that breaks and pierces his hand. We have not even the reed. Here is a staff all pith; it will not wound, it simply deceives and betrays. As a life-long Republican I can at this stage but grieve and speak.

HENRY A. STIMSON,
Pastor Emeritus Manhattan Congregational Church.
New York, July 23, 1920.

Mr. Mead's Letter

EDITORS' NOTE.—This was addressed to the Editor of the New York "Tribune." In view of its length we are obliged to omit the earlier paragraphs, but the substance of his views are contained in what follows.

I believe in open diplomacy instead of Wilsonian secrecy in home affairs.

I believe that in the World War Germany was wrong from the start, and I believe that every intelligent and informed leader who cared more for right than for political success spoke out squarely against Germany's policy and behavior. Cox didn't. Was he ignorant or working for the political support of German sympathizers? Whichever is the answer I can't vote for him.

I believe in internationalism for the welfare of humanity, but President Wilson's assumption that he alone has the heart and the mind to bring that to pass is not verified by his treatment of the negro citizens of the United States, nor does the Democratic party's treatment of them indicate that there is any hope of their getting their rights while that party is in power. If the Democrats won't give self-determination to one-tenth of their own fellow-citizens, isn't it presumptuous for them to assume the welfare of all the peoples of the world?

I was a delegate to the International Congregational Council at Boston a month ago. Most of the British and American speakers wanted a League of Nations, and the American delegates put themselves on record in favor of it, but not one of them mentioned a single condition or requirement of such a league. So far as what they said was concerned they were idealists with a vengeance—up in the air with nothing under them that anybody could see except daylight. Moreover, has there yet been one reason given or one thing accomplished which indicates that Wilson's method is the only wise one by which to establish a League of Nations?

As an idealist believing in woman suffrage, prohibition, the home, government by the people, open diplomacy, the frank and continued recognition of Germany's awful wickedness, and internationalism for the welfare of humanity, I cannot vote for Cox, who represents no moral principle politically; and I can vote for Harding, who frankly believes in the government of the United States by the people and writes his acceptance with transparent honesty.

How can an idealist vote for Cox?

Summer Reading

By Elizabeth M. Rowland

We all accept the statement that the Bible is not read as it was one hundred or even fifty years ago—we accept it, even if we offer no explanation, apology or regret, and possibly for ourselves may deplore that we do not read it as father or grandmother used to pore over it.

Now it happens that we are studying the life of David in our Sunday schools this summer, we mean "to read the chapters in between the lessons," of course, only "last week we were so busy," and "we motored very late Saturday evening." Now here is a suggestion to bring wish and action together.

Why not start today with the story of David —or, better still (1 Samuel IX) with Saul, who was set aside to make room for David. Read the whole story (1 and 2 Samuel and two chapters of 1 Kings) at two or three sittings. Read carefully, as you would read the life of Washington or Lincoln, or even of Harding or Cox if you had a "paper to prepare." Read with pencil and paper in hand to note striking or familiar phrases, and perhaps to keep tally also how many times you exclaim, "I didn't know that was in the Bible!"

Incidentally, what a fine stunt for college boys and girls "majoring in English," to read this biography as "literature" and not as a Sunday school lesson. They know of course (!) where to find "ninety and nine," "figs from thistles," "feeding on husks," "the greatest of these is charity"—but how about these? Must we look in Familiar Quotations under Shakespeare or the Bible for "I have played the fool;" "There is but a step between me and death;" "I have put my life in my hand;" "The bitterness of death is passed;" "He smote him under the fifth rib"?

Test your friends, ask them, At what coronation did the people first cry, God Save the King? When and where was it decided that the boys who enlisted to fight the Huns but never "got across" should be honored by their country as truly as those who reached Verdun or the Argonne forest? What is meant by the Cave of Adullam? the well of Bethlehem? the angel over the threshing floor? the chamber over the gate? Not to understand such allusions is not to understand or enjoy English literature.

And when we have finished this wonderful story does any one need to tell us again that the way of the transgressor is hard? or that repentance and even forgiveness by a merciful God cannot take away the consequences of sin?

It was the singer, poet, shepherd, warrior, king, David who wrote, "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered."

Motion Picture Education

Ford Motion Picture Laboratory is engaged in the production of an educational film library, to be known as the "Ford Educational Library," that will provide for the public and private schools and colleges of every nation in the civilized world films for classroom use. On Sept. 1, the first issue of this Library will be available to every school in the United States. The subjects will be specially prepared for use in any classroom by members of the scholastic profession who are experts in their particular line and the units as arranged will be distributed under a plan that will fully meet all conditions in each school, large or small. The Library will further offer to every university and college in the United States facilities for the production by their own professors of films for world-wide school use in any quantities that may be necessary to meet the constantly increasing demand.

Dr. S. S. Marquis, former dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, who has represented Henry Ford for a number of years, will have general charge of the Ford Educational Library. Dr. W. H. Dudley, Chief of the Bureau of Visual Instruction, University of Wisconsin; Profs. Charles Roach, Visual Instruction Service, Iowa State College of Agriculture and Mechanical Arts; J. V. Ankeney, Visual Presentation Department, University of Minnesota and W. M. Gregory, Director of Visual Instruction, Cleveland, Normal Training School, are associated and actively engaged in the editing and final approval of the films. Distribution and general subscription arrangements will be supervised by Messrs. Fitzpatrick & McElroy, 202 South State St., Chicago. Mr. John P. Brand, former manager and editor of Moving Picture Age, will assume the duties of general manager of distribution and subscription.

The making of this film library will not conflict with the separate production and distribution of the Ford Educational Weekly as a popular means of general entertainment and instruction. Special buildings containing all necessary equipment have been prepared for the new Ford Laboratory. Every mechanical device that can be used to promote the production of the Library and Ford Educational Weekly has been installed and the Laboratory itself stands as a finished example of scientific and economical motion picture production on a large scale. The founding of the Library marks another forward step in the motion picture industry and the realization of the desire of the prominent teachers and students of the world.

It Will Pay You to Read

REFLECTIONS OF A GRUNDY COUSIN, by KATHARINE FULLERTON GEROULD (Atlantic Monthly, August). A stirring discussion of the present degenerate condition of social morality and its causes. The author thinks that "the abandonment of religion is probably most responsible." She declares that "when, as a social group we threw over religion, we threw over most of our every-day moral sanctions." One of the dangerous symptoms is that "Ministers preach now about topics of the times, about schemes of social betterment, about political issues. They call this vitalizing the Church's message, whereas it is more like side-stepping it."

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

A Prayer for Pardon

International Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 22. Ps. 51: 1-17.

Psalm 51 is perhaps the most famous poem of penitence in all literature. It is commonly known as David's confession of sin and prayer for pardon after Nathan had faced him with his transgression and declared God's judgment against him. It fits all cases of sin and is one of the most profound analyses of human weakness. The best way to study it is by running comment, remembering that it is not meant to be logical but is the outpouring of a sin-burdened soul.

1. Vs. 1, 2 contain the prayer for pardon. Note the nouns. Transgressions, iniquity and sin are three words used to describe the evil acts and states of the soul. David prays that this sin, finding many forms of expression, may receive as varied and adequate treatment as it is blotted out, washed away and cleansed. The sins of the soul may be many; but God has many ways of dealing with them. The warrant for the hope of a three-fold pardon to match a three-fold sin is the three-fold character of God, mercy, lovingkindness and the multitude of tender mercies that mark the heart of the forgiving Father.

2. Sin becomes a burning item of consciousness. It is known; it is ever before us. Like Lady Macbeth, we cannot be rid of it, as we cry, "Out, damned spot."

3. Sin is ultimately something against God. It may involve our own souls in ruin; it may tangle our comrades in its mesh; but finally it is against God only and the evil that is done is in his sight. His judgment is valid against sin, because it is an offense against the divine will and character.

4. How radical it is! It seems to have been born in us and we born to it. It began as evil intention in babyhood; it runs through all our years into the last limits of old age.

5. Since sin is so radical rightness must be equally deep-seated. It must be in the inward parts, no matter of habit or external custom, but rooted in the springs of our habitual thought and action. The sins of the soul can finally be displaced by nothing less than a righteous intention that bites equally deep.

6. Therefore forgiveness must also run to the limits. It must not only change blackness into whiteness, but the whiteness must even surpass that of the virgin snow. So deep is the need for cleansing on the part of the sinner.

7. With v. 8 we come to an aspect of forgiveness which is often overlooked but which David stresses with the finest insight. He sings about the joy of experiencing God's pardon for sin. The very bones which had been broken by evil rejoice in the enjoyment of forgiving love. The same thought is taken up again and emphasized in v. 12. This does not mean that we must sin and be forgiven in order to be happy; the profoundest joy comes to the pure in heart, for they see God; but when the stain on the spirit has been washed away deep and abiding joy issues from the experience.

8. V. 13 expresses the important principle that the end of forgiveness—perhaps we might truly say its very purpose—is a service to be rendered to others, who will see from the forgiven sinner's experience how good God is and will be turned (converted) to God as a result. Anyone whom God has forgiven must, in the very nature of the case, go forward to do something for others as a result of his experience and in the strength of it.

9. Praise and gladness are close kindred. The jubilant soul must express itself. Therefore in vs. 14, 15 David sings his gratitude. A forgiven spirit may become a singing soul.

10. The song concludes with an expression of that difference which men often confuse but which God always keeps clear between external actions and inner purposes. True prophets and forgiven sinners always make clear the fact that a contrite heart is more important than a smoking victim on an altar. God wants us to keep our hearts open to him; then the sacrifices and the ceremonies will be genuine.

Department of Religious Drama

Conducted by Mary Alice Emerson, Ph. D.

A recent letter from Pilgrim Church, Pomona, Cal., calls attention to interesting work that has been done there during the last four years. The pastor, Rev. W. O. Wark, is the author of four of the religious dramas that have been presented. Three of these have a Biblical setting, "The Ten Virgins," "The Prodigal Son" and "The Greatest Story of All," the last an Easter play. The fourth, "How the Christ-Child Came to America," is calculated to impress the Christmas story through a modern setting drawn from American history.

The latest of this sort undertaken by Pilgrim Church was a pageant entitled "A Nation's Destiny," presented on July 4. It was written for the occasion by Mr. Hubert Whitehead, of Pilgrim Church and the leading rôles were taken by Mr. and Mrs. Whitehead. The following outline suggests the message:

Scene: A room in the home of Rev. John Selwyn, New York.

Time: April, 1861.

Furnishings: Study table, chairs, melodeon, antlers on the wall holding sword, pictures.

Selwyn is at table trying to write sermon. His wife, Mary, is across the room darning stockings. Their two little boys play noisily about the room, the younger in Indian dress. Selwyn drops his work and joins boys in their sport. Later sends them out for evening paper.

While they are gone Selwyn acknowledges that he cannot settle down to his sermon for thinking of the possible disruption of the Union and the consequent drift into civil war. While making known his fears, which his wife does not yet share because realizing less clearly the national conditions, the paper is brought in, containing news of the firing on Fort Sumter. Father, Mother and two little boys engage in an animated conversation concerning the breaking out of war. Selwyn, at the request of the boys, sings "The Sword of Bunker Hill," his wife accompanying him on the melodeon. After that the boys go off to bed reluctantly, and John and Mary discuss the Sumter incident and its probable meaning to the country.

It is at this time that Selwyn utters the pivotal words of the drama, "Perhaps America's destiny is after all to teach the world Brotherhood." "If the Union fails," he declares, "then the world's great experiment in democracy falls to the ground, and all the suffering and sacrifice of the Revolutionary War is lost; all the carefully-wrought fabric upon which the Republic stands is shattered, and monarchy and selfish imperialism will rule the world for centuries."

"But why should we fight for the ideals of the past, John?"

"Because those ideals are the germ, the seed from which must grow the future Brotherhood, the Kingdom of God that Christ proclaimed and gave his life for. We do not fight for the past, but for the promise of the future which the past holds and passes on to us."

John gives Mary a clearer vision by a series of pictures (symbolic and realistic). These are shown in tableaux at the back of the stage, while John explains the place of each in the working out of future Brotherhood:

1. Liberty Enlightening the World. 2. Indians. 3. Pilgrims. 4. Colonials. 5. George Washington. 6. Pioneers. 7. Miners. Between this and 8 the hidden choir sings "Massa's in the Cold, Cold Ground." 8. Slave and Trader. 9. Blue and Gray. 10. Blue, Gray, East and West. 11. The Call: Germany, Belgium, France. 12. The Answer: U. S. Soldier. 13. Fruition: Liberty, Love, Brotherhood menaced by Hate and Ignorance. 14. Hate and Ignorance prone before the nobler qualities, Liberty, Love and Brotherhood. In the closing hymn, "America," choir, actors and congregation join.

The responsibility for brotherhood as shown in the Interchurch was illustrated in a religious drama given at the sunset vespers on the beach at Ocean Park, Me., during the recent missionary Education Conference. "The Eye of Faith" showed the necessity of the Church's listening all the time to Faith and not part of the time to Doubt. The Church acknowledges that he has received a great commission and prays that he may be equal to the challenge. Doubt says that he will fail as he has always failed, as he did in the World War. Faith says Christianity did not fail, for it was never fairly tried. As Africa enters, bound in chains of Ignorance and Superstition, Doubt sneeringly inquires what the Church is going to do with his mistakes. Faith advises help, for Africa has some ideals as was proved by the recent Pan-African Conference, and says that his wrong-doing is due not so much to his willfulness as to the temptations offered him by his civilized brethren, the white races.

Turkey enters, trying to kill Armenia, and Doubt advises letting him finish the job. Faith interposes, and insists that he restrain Turkey until he can be educated not to want to repeat his atrocities. Doubt inquires what kind of family the Church thinks he can make out of this motley throng, and is told, "By God's help the family He intended."

China, "the sleepy country," appeals for doctors, teachers, and ministers, in order that she may take her place in the world's life. Faith assures her of their belief in her unsuspected

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

What We Owe Children of the Foreign Born

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Aug. 15-21

BY OLIVE G. GIBSON

Scripture Passage. Matt. 18: 1-6. Deut. 31: 10-13.

The first problem in Christian Americanization for each one is himself; for however good he may be he can be better. After this come:

(1) A realzation that all child life is sacred. Matt. 18: 5.

(2) The ability to say "foreigner" without a curl of the lip.

(3) The cultivation of a genuine interest in the foreigners and their children, not as "problems" but as fellow beings.

(4) The transformation of our pruning-hooks, our monkey-wrenches and our tongs into "bands of love" that can bind us together in a common brotherhood.

(5) A recognition of our inter-dependence, for however hard it may be to live with the foreigner it would be harder to live without him. He digs our coal, refines our sugar, prepares our food, builds our houses, our public highways, our bridges, digs our subways, bores our tunnels, paves our streets—elects our school directors, our mayors, our governors and he swings the ballot in our Presidential elections.

(6) A recognition of the facts

a. That we can learn from them as well as teach them.

b. That they are "Pilgrim Fathers" of tomorrow.

c. That God is still leading "Pilgrims."

d. That what their children become today our nation will be tomorrow.

e. That they are part of the material out of which God is building his Kingdom on earth.

f. That we cannot justly expect as much from them as from our own children unless we give them equal opportunities to develop physically, morally, mentally and spiritually.

g. That God has made of one blood all nations of the earth and that he is drawing us together.

> "One God, one law, one element,
> And one far-off divine event,
> To which the whole creation moves."

And finally, take time to realize what a short while it will be till the blood that flows through the veins of the foreigners today will flow through the veins of your children's children.

You had two parents, four grand-parents, eight great-grand parents, and so on. If you trace your ancestors back ten generations (to the Landing of the Mayflower) they number 2,046. Trace them back thirty generations and they outnumber the population of Europe, Asia, Africa and North and South America, including Mexico—verily in thirty generations your children's children will have "foreign" blood in their veins. The only thing we can do is to make a better "self" and a better "foreigner" today.

From this viewpoint we see that we are as closely related to each other as the leaves of a single tree. God made us to live in harmony. Shall we do it? This is the problem on which the Christian world is at work.

GOD IN HIS EARTH

The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. Psalm 24: 1.

Is it not plain that he was interested not only in what we narrowly call religion but in all that concerns the welfare and the satisfaction of man? What he wanted was that every man should live here as a son of God ought to live, rejoicing in his Father's world. To make unhappy people happy, to bring unprivileged people within reach of privilege, to make the blind see, and the deaf hear, and the lame walk, to loose men out of the prisons of narrowness, and ignorance, and monotony, and poverty—all this is Christ's work. And the doing of it is a manifestation of Christ.—George Hodges.

This is my Father's world.
O let me ne'er forget
That though the wrong seems oft so strong,
God is the Ruler yet.

This is my Father's world.
The battle is not done:
Jesus who died shall be satisfied,
And earth and heaven be one.

This is my Father's world.
Should my heart be ever sad?
The Lord is King!—let the heavens ring,
God reigns!—let the earth be glad.
Author Unknown.

The greatest poetry of God is man. The greatest poem in this world is human life, and so we must practise the presence of God, not only when we are alone in the study, or in the midst of the hills, but in the heart of the city, amid its toil and turmoil and bustle. God is there; God is in man; God's finest poetry is being completed in the story of man; and this is the practice of the presence of God in Christ.—H. Elvet Lewis.

We thank thee, Father, that thou and not another hast made the world, and that thou art concerned in all that shapes its use and destiny; and most of all in man. May we not be caught in the lure of it, as if it were our fixed abiding place; but teach us to use it as our place of learning and our suitable occasion to grow like thee. We bless thee for the beauty of it. We remember thee in all that speaks to eye and ear and thought with innocent delight. Help us to take its troubles and its cares as opportunity and its sins and sorrows as a call to faith and work. Let us not add to its toll of evil, nor withhold our diligence for its improvement and our fellow feeling for those who suffer. Grant us the unfaltering confidence which becomes thy children and the part thou hast designed for us in thy work. And let thy kingdom come. In the name of Christ. Amen.

Appreciation by the Golden Rule

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Aug. 22-28

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Receiving Praise and Giving It. Rom. 1: 8; 1 Thess. 1: 2-10.

Light from the Bible Passages

Paul believed that virtue should not simply be its own reward. That the members of the Roman Church had developed a strong type of faith was most gratifying to him. But he did not simply take it for granted. He wished them to know his gratitude and the fact that he was thanking God for their achievement. Think what encouragement that statement must have brought to those Romans who had come out from such a faithless, un-Christlike life as that of the people about them, indicated in the remainder of this chapter. Having been given such praise, what would they do with it?

The Thessalonian passage emphasizes the same ideas and especially the thought, "For you I am praying." Verse 9 indicates that occasionally good words came back to Paul. No whole-souled man waits for them before doing his work. Any man does his task more wholeheartedly because he receives them.

Leads for the Leader

This is to be a meeting when our minds should turn much to "the other fellow," his feelings and the forces that stimulate his life. We shall understand this better if we think of others in terms of our own lives. In other words, use the Golden Rule.

What about the old phrase, "Taffy is better than epitaphy?"

The comparative effects of half-hearted criticism on the work of the members of the Society, with whole-hearted praise?

How much can we train our ears so that praise from us is as pleasant as praise of us?

How far might we eliminate the bad from another's life by continually and forcibly praising the good?

Thoughts for Members

There is a "give and take" of praise even as there is of love.

Appreciation is one of the easiest things to give and the most priceless to receive.

Our kindest words too often fall on dead ears.

"Bouquets" before death are better than funeral flowers, however choice.

It takes two to speak the truth—one to speak and another to hear.—Thoreau.

Fraternity is the reciprocal affection, the sentiment which inclines man to do unto others as he would that others would do unto him.—Mazzini.

Good men will yield thee praise; then slight the rest;
'Tis best, praise-worthy, to have pleased the best.—Capt. John Smith.

A Moment of Prayer

O Father, knowing the pleasure of a word fitly spoken by others of the humble things we attempt, implant within us a sense of the yearning of others' hearts that they may share this same delight through us. Teach us that still it is more happy to give than to receive. Amen.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

For the Home Maker

Mrs. Wilson's Cook Book, by M. A. Wilson (Lippincott). A varied career is indicated by the fact that Mrs. Wilson was Queen Victoria's "Cuisinière" and is "Instructor of Cooking for the U. S. Navy." Accordingly her volume contains a prodigious number of recipes which she intersperses with general directions given in conversational style. It is really an amusing as well as an educational experience to go through these pages, since it is impossible to guess what will come next. An efficient index prevents confusion in the practical use of the volume.

Quite different in purpose is The Junior Cook Book, by Clara Ingram Judson (Barse and Hopkins). The author is the "Mary Jane" whose words of domestic wisdom are so well known. "Every recipe has been made by a child of twelve or under, without any other help than is given here." Simple rules, simply set down, cover all the kinds of food a family will really need. Even a little girl can be a tower of strength in an emergency, and may, at all times, feel competent.

The Household Dictionary, by Winnifred S. Fales (Small, Maynard). A great variety of suggestions for all departments of housekeeping are here arranged alphabetically. The system of cross references saves much time in finding what is wanted, and the book is of convenient size. It seems as if the home maker must find an answer to every problem, but blank pages are inserted for the recording of possible omissions.

National Needs

Democracy and Ideals, by John Erskine (Doran). In peace time Professor Erskine's work is on the faculty of Columbia University. These chapters were written while he was serving as chairman of the Army Educational Commission with the American Forces in France, and as educational director of the American Expeditionary Forces of the University at Beaune, in 1919. They are admirable in their sketches of national characteristics both in France and America. The chapter on French ideals is particularly qualifying and suggestive in a time when we are brought into close cooperative relations with the French people. We particularly like the broad outlook of these utterances, which have completely escaped from confinement with the walls of a university, in their appreciation of the facts that society itself is a university and that the future of democracy depends upon universal training under competent leadership. The questions suggested by the papers mainly concern the future fusing of the American people into one nation. The setting up and enforcing of a high standard of citizenship and the problem of relating our people, so commonly detached from the past, to the historical culture of the past and to high ideals, and the method of securing such educational ideals for days to come—subjects so important to our future—are treated with thoughtful insight and in an evident readable fashion.

Patriotism and Popular Education, by Henry Arthur Jones (Dutton). A well-known English dramatist and critic writes in this book a keen criticism of popular education. He calls it unsuitable and unpractical and pleads for education which will fit one for the labor of life, inculcate sound moral standards, prepare him to defend his country if it is attacked, and develop in him the spirit of true patriotism. In the course of his long discussion he expresses his mind concerning the League of Nations, the perils of Internationalism, child labor, profiteering, bad taste and low morals on the stage, and many other matters. Few readers will agree with him completely, but he writes entertainingly and will arouse keen discussion.

Outspoken Essays, by William R. Inge (Longmans). Dean Inge has stirred public discussion by his recent Romanes Lectures on Progress. He is in these earlier papers, published in different magazines or given as addresses, by no means disposed to allow the catchwords of present day idealism to pass without challenge. The papers cover a wide range of subjects and show both research, a careful weighing of evidence and a power of incisive expression. They are significant and important in relating the problems of the modern man to the historical experiences of our modern European and American peoples. Perhaps the most deep-going and significant is the careful study of the birthrate, which deals with historic tendencies of the increase and decrease of population. Dean Inge is not a pessimist in spite of his popular title of "the Gloomy Dean," but he has the masterly and helpful habit of looking facts in the face and seeing all around an important subject. Almost every paper in this collection is a challenge to consideration and discussion.

Who's Who

Who's Who in America (Marquis & Co.). The eleventh volume of this indispensable book of reference is more timely than ever since the two years which it covers have introduced new actors and changed the proportion of personal value in a vast number of cases. It need not be said that there are many new names presented. The fact that Governor Coolidge of Massachusetts was not in the previous volume is a suggestion of the changing value of reputations. Here is a characteristically brief and modest notice of his career, which does not, however, include his nomination for the Vice-Presidency. The busy editor, householder and business man will welcome this new volume.

Short Stories

Affinities, by Mary Roberts Rinehart (Doran). A group of five stories about the adventures of the "idle rich" who are engaged in the arduous task of avoiding boredom. The topics are not worthy of Mrs. Rinehart's gifts so that she does not appear at her best. Yet the tales are well written and vivacious, each one containing certain unexpected little turns.

On a Passing Frontier, by Frank B. Linderman (Scribners). Seventeen short stories of old frontier life; stories of heroism, adventure and sentiment; of Indians, hunters, ranchmen and border policemen. There is a vein of quiet humor through most of them. They are well written and exceptionally entertaining.

Holy Fire, by Ida A. R. Wylie (Lane). Nine short stories, all but one concerned with the war. Two are Russian, the others English, and all are remarkable as literary productions.

Further Chronicles of Avonlea, by L. M. Montgomery (Page). A sequel to such a successful novel as "Anne of Green Gables," is approached with some feeling of dread. But it changes to delight in following this succession of short stories about the folk of Avonlea. They are homelike tales full of old-fashioned sentiment and therefore restful to read. But they are by no means "light," for the revelations of human nature are keen and the themes are varied. Those who love the sea will find passages of unusual charm.

The Elder's People, by Harriet Prescott Spofford (Houghton Mifflin). A fine achievement to mark the completion of Mrs. Spofford's eighty-fifth year. This New England flock are "people" indeed, for their individualities stand out starkly. So no two stories are alike. Perplexing anl difficult as the Elder's problems often are, even in his own family, there is a substratum of courage anl loyalty which make his labors good to endure. Moving to many a New England native will be the description of the salt hay marshes and the expedition to "make the hay."

Tatterdemalion, by John Galsworthy (Scribners). These odds and ends of literary production range from the shreds which the title seems to indicate to stories of the author's finest workmanship. There are tales with a queer British streak like "Manna," describing the trial of a hungry rector for stealing bread. And some possess great beauty, like "The Grey Angel," the subject of which is a very old lady, working to her last breath to help the "poilu."

Tales of My Native Town, by Gabriele D' Annunzio (Doubleday, Page). The author's prominent part in modern Italian affairs will lend added interest to these short stories. The title suggests that they are realistic tales from the author's own home town and semi-autobiographic. Some of these are decidedly gruesome and all are strange to the American reader. The introduction by Joseph Hergesheimer is a notable interpretation of the author's work.

The Chorus Girl, by Anton Chekhov (Macmillan). Twelve stories by one of the best short story writers of Russia. Tales of the common people of the cities, less depressing than most Russian stories and with little or none of the gross and repulsive element.

Gotton Connixloo and Forgotten, by Camille Mayran (Dutton). Two remarkable short stories in a volume of the Library of French Fiction. Both deal with dramatic and tragic experiences in the lives of women, and in each there is a deeply religious note. Both are wartime stories. Beautifully written, they present a new and very attractive aspect of the spirit of the common people of the France of today.

The Eve of Pascua, by Richard Dehan (Doran). Sixteen short stories of varying moods, grave or humorous, of many lands and different periods of history. Perhaps the best is the last, "A Maker of Comedies," in which Cardinal Richelieu plays a part.

The Works of Henry van Dyke, Avalon Edition. Vol. 7, The Unknown Quantity; Vol. 8, The Valley of Vision. Two more volumes in this subscription edition. The one contains ten short stories, including "The Mansion" and nine briefer sketches which are called "Half-Tales." The other volume also contains ten short stories and seven "Half-Tales." Nearly all of these were inspired by the war.

WITH THE CHILDREN

The Worth-While Vacation

By Patten Beard

Betty swung lazily back and forth in the hammock on the porch. In her lap there lay a bright ball of crochet silk with her long steel hook. "Hump!" she said, "I just wish it wasn't vacation—it's too stupid for anything! I want to do something worth while, Bob, for this seems just a waste of good worth-while time! Don't you think so?"

Bob, her brother, sat kicking an idle pair of heels against the veranda rail. "Sure!" he answered. "Crochet work's all right—but to do it all the whole time, Betty—I should think you would get sick of it!"

"Oh, I don't mean that altogether," answered Betty, rolling her fancy-work up and putting it back into the dainty bag that lay on the couch-hammock. "I mean that where the two of us have so much idle time, we ought to make it count for something. We ought to be working, Bob! I mean real work—earning something! Don't you think that it would be a help to Dad and Mother if we two could look out for ourselves a bit? I know—it's always hard for Mother to get me fixed up for school when things cost as much as they do now-a-days and, Mr. Brother Bob, I'll tell you right here that it's no more crochet work for me! I'm going to find some work to do this summer!"

"I've been thinking about that, too," declared Bob. "I've been wondering what under the sun I was good for anyway—just to be loafing about idle! What're going to try?"

"I don't know," admitted Betty with a sigh. "I might get part-time housework—lots of the girls are doing that now. I could get it from the school, you know. Mrs. Prentis, the principal's wife spoke to us girls about it. She said there were ever so many women in town who needed help for a few hours daily. Some pay five dollars a week—and, if it were not for the hours, I'd try a factory or a store, maybe—"

"Did you ask Mother about it?"

"Sure!"

"What did she say?"

"Oh, she said she thought she needed me here part of the time, but that it would be a good thing to fill in the rest with some worth-while work."

"Mr. Stevan offered to take me in his store—I was going to tell you—afternoons," said Bob. "Mornings, I wouldn't be needed. It'd be sort of jolly, I think! Guess I'll run over on my wheel and ask him if he's in need of any help now—" and Bob jumped over the side of the veranda railing to the walk. "So long!" he chirped as he mounted his wheel. "See you later!"

Betty watched him out of sight around the corner of the street. Then she went indoors and took down the telephone book. But after she had called up Mrs. Prentis to see about that part-time housework, she knew that two weeks of vacation time had gone by already and that the other girls had got the work ahead of her. All the demands for part-time work were filled, though Mrs. Prentis offered to let her know if any new one came in.

"Oh dear!" thought Betty, "that's what happens to the folks who let a good opportunity slip through—and only three hours a day! Well, I'll have to try something else!" So she took up the little town paper to look for advertisements of Help Wanted. This was what she saw:

WANTED: bright capable girl to make herself generally useful. Apply by letter: Courier, 1233.

and again:

WANTED: well-educated young woman for office work. Hubbell, Main Street.

These were the only two that promised much. Betty considered them. "I'll write to the one and go to the other," she decided. So up in her room, she repaired to write the letter. Then, with a good deal of care, she fixed herself up to go to call on Hubbell, Main Street.

"I'll take the first thing that comes," she considered. "If this one—all right! I won't let anything that's good get away from me!" But alas! The paper was yesterday's and at Hubbell's, they had already filled the vacancy. There was but the one, they said.

Betty turned, somewhat dampened in spirits, and then she decided to go into the public library to see if the new edition of the paper might tell of something else. But it had not, and she went homeward. No answer to her letter came.

Bob said he wasn't sure of his job—yet. He said he was going to be taken in on Saturday on trial to see what he could do. It was regular work as clerk, you know—but he guessed, if he kept cool, he'd get on all right. He hoped so. It was rather a worried sort of Bob who departed on Saturday for the ordeal, however, even though he said he was sure he could get plenty of garden work to do if this failed. He listened with sympathetic ear to the recital of Betty's tale of woe. "It's rougher on a girl," he admitted, "but you've got to learn how some way, Betty, and take the same chances that a boy has. Don't expect people to help you just because you are a girl!"

"The idea!" retorted Betty, "as if I did! And I'm not the least discouraged either! I'll get something better than just being clerk at Stevan's!" But a little lump rose in her throat and choked her. She knew quite well that it was no easier to get a good job than to keep it and prove her worth to her employer afterwards. "I'll run into the library," she thought, "maybe I'll find another paper—"

But the worst of it was that everybody wanted trained workers and there was Betty, just an able-bodied, intelligent schoolgirl who didn't know how to take notes in shorthand or how to use a typewriter. And, even if she had, there was home to be considered and her work at home was needed. Office hours would have made the home work harder for Mother. And there Betty was when, a big round wet tear trickled down the side of her face and dropped—plump! It went right upon a book of vocation training that Betty had taken from the shelf. In it, it told how to become a seamstress, an office worker, or milliner, a reporter, a household decorator, a stenographer—almost anything—and each and every one seemed to demand just what Betty did not have: training! Yes, that was it! Betty was a schoolgirl without training! "But," she decided, "I'll get it—somehow! That's the thing I must have—" As she put the book back upon the shelf, she happened to see the open door of the library work-room. Miss Grace, the librarian, was in there working. She glanced up, seeing Betty pass, and came out. "Is there anything I can do for you?" she inquired pleasantly. "Library work is rather busy—I've been having to make myself into two people instead of just one: my little apprentice left me in the lurch. I haven't anybody here to help me when my assistant is out too! Did you want something that I can find for you?"

Betty smiled into the genial face of Miss Grace. "If you have any work that needs to be done—anything I can do—I'd like the chance!" she beamed. "I've been wanting to find some work and everything that seemed worth while seemed to demand training."

"Well, it does," admitted Miss Grace, as she showed Betty into the work-room. "I want a good, intelligent, well-read girl and I'll give her the best sort of training in general library work, if she'll give me four hours a day of her vacation time."

"Without any pay?" questioned Betty.

"The library will pay something," Miss Grace assured her. "It may not be much, but that will be put before the directors. You will be having what is almost more than money—the chance to learn and work and be taught methods. A small town library offers far greater opportunity in general work than a city library does. A city library could not pay for apprentice work either, but I will arrange to let you have charge of certain work that may be paid, and so you will be both earning and learning, too."

"It's just what I wanted," smiled Betty. "I wanted to make my vacation worth while and I'll be so glad to learn!"

"And we start Monday," beamed Miss Grace. And thus it was that Betty rushed home to burst into the dining-room and announce the surprising news: "I've got a job, everybody! Listen! I'm going to begin training at the library next Monday! It's going to be a vacation that's worth while for when I'm older, I can be a real librarian! Meanwhile, I'll get all the training I can—and earn all my clothes for school in the fall! Say, Mother, isn't it just great!"

"Perfectly splendid," Mother answered, taking Betty into her arms. "Perfectly splendid, my little worth-while daughter!"

"Oh, it doesn't matter about me any more," sighed Bob, with mock sadness—"I'm only a clerk at Seman Stevan's Furnishing Store, but I mean to keep my job and get business training, too!"

"Good for you, Bob!" grinned Betty.

Wrong Side Out

She didn't like the morning,
And she knew that it would rain.
She didn't like her breakfast,
And pushed it back again.

At noon 'twas worse than ever,
And she cried for cakes and pie.
She wouldn't eat her dinner,
And she would sit still and cry.

She pouted till the evening
Of this very horrid day,
And all because, so early,
She got up the wrong way!

How They Do It

Methods of Church Work

The World and the Worker

The bulletin board in front of FIRST, MANSFIELD, O., Rev. O. L. Kiplinger, pastor, carries a daily message or sermon on some topic likely to arrest the attention of the passers-by. Recently the message was under the topic, "The World and the Worker." On Monday the board said: "Just now work is the salvation of the world—but a lot of people want to get their salvation vicariously." Tuesday the message was a quotation from one of Vice-President Marshall's speeches: "We will never have an industrial democracy until we have an industrious democracy." Wednesday morning the bulletin board said: "The loafer never has any loaf to cast upon the waters. He lives only for the day. The future, for him, is empty." On Thursday morning came the encouraging note: "The great body of the people are workers and it is they who put their stamp on civilization." On Friday morning the word was: "The normal person likes work for its own sake. No normal, honest person wants to live off the fruits of the toil of others. The laws should be very severe against those who try it. We have no love for these social cooties." And Saturday's sensible saying was: "The world is not producing enough to support it. Proper conditions cannot be restored until production is pushed ahead of consumption. Sensible people everywhere must return to the age-old principle of producing more than they consume."

Sunday Morning Motor Corps in Brooklyn

OCEAN AVE., BROOKLYN, N. Y., Rev. E. M. Halliday, pastor, has found a new "social service" for the automobile, which has not always been regarded as the special ally of the minister and the Sunday morning service. The Men's Club of Ocean Ave. has organized a Motor Corps, whose particular duty it is to line up the cars belonging to its members on Sunday mornings and see that the shut-in members of the parish have an opportunity to reach the church in time for the morning service. It is serving the double purpose of bringing the church service within the reach of those who could not otherwise enjoy it and putting the automobile in its proper place as a real servant of the best in the community. Reaching Out for the Children

An interesting vacation Bible school experiment was made by BETHANY, WORCESTER, MASS., Rev. R. E. Butterfield, pastor, in a part of the city where the idea has never been tried before, and where this church has a clear field. A visit to the school furnishes convincing evidence of the value of the plan for churches with children in their neighborhood during the summer.

The school is in session four mornings each week from July 6 to Aug. 6, with the pastor in charge, assisted by 11 volunteers from his church, some of whom are experts in their departments. Seventy boys and girls under 14 years of age were registered and the daily attendance reached more than 50. In addition to the regular courses of the Vacation Bible School there were classes in kindergarten work, graded sewing, wood working, raffia, hammered brass, and hammock weaving. Bible stories, memory texts, principles of home life and patriotic exercises were included in the course, with talks and demonstrations by the pastor, and trips to industrial plants and a tour of City Hall. A weekly picnic was also conducted. The boys and girls vied with each other to see which would bring the largest offering to be divided in thirds for benevolences of their choice. The school was financed by the sale of articles made, at an exhibition night.

The pastor has gained a close touch with the church children. Important by-products are looked for in the next church year. Bethany is spending $800 on repairs which will include an electric organ blower, new floor covering, wall decorations, a remodeled kitchen and added radiation. Best of all 35 new members have been received since Mr. Butterfield's coming in October, 1919. F. D. T.

Mrs. Sarah J. Hayward

Newton Highlands has lost one of its most loyal and liberal women in the death of Mrs. Sarah J. Hayward, July 29, after a long illness. She was the widow of the late Albert F. Hayward, president of the New England Confectionary Company, who died in 1899. He was a leading member of the Newton Highlands church for many years. Mrs. Hayward was active in the church, especially in the work of the women and in other good work in that city. She was a liberal giver to Congregational causes, and one of her last acts of benevolence was to make a large contribution to the Congregational World Movement last spring, following a substantial gift to the Pilgrim Memorial Fund.

First, Lowell, Helps Boys Through College

FIRST, LOWELL, a union of Trinitarian and First Churches, is in the foreground in the church life of the city. The pastor is Dr. C. J. Hawkins.

The finest work of the church is along missionary lines and this fact is perhaps the keynote of the church's success—its appropriation this year to missions being nearly $6,000. Dr. Hawkins has strengthened the appeal of the evening service until a congregation that numbered about 75 when he came to Lowell three years ago now averages 700 to 1,500. The service is opened with a popular praise service of song lasting about 15 minutes and Dr. Hawkins is generally far-reaching in his sermons, which are of a type to make one pause and ponder.

Another noteworthy feature of the work Dr. Hawkins and his church are doing is the aiding in the education of deserving youth, regardless of creed, through the co-operation of the High School authorities. This year two boys are being helped in their college careers by First and it is hoped more can be so assisted next year. Dr. Hawkins is assisted in his work by Rev. C. G. Zirke, whose activities among young people has met with phenomenal results, by a parish visitor, whose work confines her exclusively to the visiting of the sick and shut-ins and the importance of which is measured most by those who receive its blessing, and by a secretary.

Manomet Ministering to Summer Colony

Summer residents in and around Plymouth are taking advantage of the hospitality of MANOMET, PLYMOUTH, Rev. Haig Adadourian, pastor, and attending the services during the hot weather months. Manomet is continuing its good work, its recent Children's Day exercises being especially memorable. Five children were baptized at that time and at the communion service following 10 persons were admitted to the church, nine of them on confession. The church recently bought two sets of hymn books, one for the preaching services and the other for the midweek meetings. Mr. Adadourian, the pastor, was born of Armenian parents in Cilicia and the clerk and treasurer are of German parentage, but all are 100 per

New Braintree Going Forward

NEW BRAINTREE, Rev. G. A. Sheradan, pastor, reports a general awakening to Christian work and stewardship. The Pilgrim Fund quota was $100 and the subscription at one meeting amounted to $199. The church's apportionment for benevolences, which was $30, was oversubscribed. Four new members were recently received on confession and two adults were baptized.

CONNECTICUT

The Spirit of the Old White Meeting House

In the latter part of the 17th century, the town of Kenilworth was a notable one in the State of Connecticut because Rev. Abraham Pierson had founded there the school which was the beginning of Yale College. A few years later the town was divided into two parts, of which one on the shore was called Clinton, and the other on the hill was called Killingworth, the name changing from its original form for some reason now unknown.

On July 2, 1817, the corner-stone of the third church building in Killingworth was laid, and on May 31, 1820, the completed building was dedicated. The celebration of the 100th anniversary of this dedication occurred this year, and one of our correspondents who was present sends the following description, which may stir kindred thoughts among our readers, and bring a picture of the meaning of these white meeting-houses in the communities which we call New England, but which are nowadays in reality New America.

"A brilliant day in spring! A New England hill-top church filled with its sons and daughters for the hundredth anniversary of its dedication! A whole community gathered for Memorial day! No one of the four hundred who were privileged to share the welcome to the old Killingworth Church will ever forget the beauty, the thrill, and the promise that the spirit of the fathers shall abide with the new Americans who have come to make a new pilgrimage, and to renew the life of the Spirit for the new generation among the New England hills. The fine old building, sound and strong, seems more than ever consecrated as it ministers to the social and spiritual needs of the parish, rich in memories for many who have left its bounds, but richer still in opportunities for leadership of the future. A typical country parish, awake to the difficulty of its task, but bravely and successfully undertaking it. No wonder that Killingworth rejoiced! And no wonder that 'the stranger within the gates' was moved to admiration! May the next hundred years bring to the church 'set upon the hill' as much of rightful joy and pride as the last!"

NEW YORK

Good Year for South Hartford

Last year was a splendid one for South Hartford, Rev. W. P. A. Humphris, pastor. A second-hand piano was purchased, a Lyceum Course was inaugurated, and the quota of the Pilgrim Fund was raised. In the Sunday school a Cradle Roll was started; the missionary offering, with its instructions, was adopted, and the young people organized a class which they called "The Loyal Workers."

OHIO

First, Toledo, Increases Its Equipment

A real stage, with drop curtain, interior and exterior scenes, footlights and the necessary accessories that go to make a delightful setting for varied programs, religious, civic and secular, has been erected in the auditorium in the Parish House of First, Toledo, Rev. A. A. Stockdale, pastor. Mr. C. A. Langdon, architect, and chairman of the house committee, has had complete charge of the work.

NEW STAGE IN PARISH HOUSE OF FIRST, TOLEDO, O.

The Christian Endeavor Society had the honor of dedicating the new stage with their fifth annual dramatics. "The Elopement of Ellen," a comedy in three acts, was the play chosen for the occasion. It was presented under the direction of the parish visitor, Miss Gertrude M. Lawson, a graduate of the Emerson College of Oratory.

Community Hall has a seating capacity for more than 1,000 persons by raising the partition-curtain opening into the large chapel. In the new program for the church school which will begin in October the new stage will prove invaluable. Fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth grade pupils will have classes with Miss Lawson in which the children themselves will seek to find the dramatic values in Biblical incidents and church history, write and present their own dramatizations of such stories as "Ruth," "Daniel in the Lion's Den," "Queen Esther," "The Good Samaritan," etc.

Community Hall promises to be the scene of many an interesting, inspiring and edifying program in the coming years.

Red Letter Days at Fairport Harbor

The great Interchurch World Movement found a ready response at First, Fairport Harbor, Rev. J. M. Brown, pastor. Mr. Brown was sent by the church to the state conference for pastors to find out what the Movement was and what would be expected of the church; he returned filled with an enthusiasm which spread until the whole church caught the spirit and was ready for the forward move. Two days early in April were given over to the cause of the World Movement. On the first—County Interchurch Day—a banner was offered to the church which had the largest registered delegation. Fairport was the winner, receiving

ILLINOIS

Home-coming Service at New First, Chicago

An interesting Home Coming service was recently held at New First, Chicago, under the auspices of the Alumni Association of the church. Invitations were sent far and near and about 150 responded, some coming over 50 miles to attend the service. The pastor, Rev. Gilbert Wilson, preached a strong sermon setting forth in contrast the conditions now surrounding the church with those which obtained in former years. He pointed out the number of churches which had been compelled to desert this needy and congested down town area and saw the strategic importance and steady progress of New First.

After the service, which was shared in by Dr. J. C. Armstrong and Mr. Frank Kimball, president of the Alumni Association, the old timers met and decided an immediate effort should be made to raise $100,000, which should take the form of a memorial endowment in memory of former pastors and particularly to be associated with the names of Drs. Noble and Goodwin. Generous subscriptions were offered at once.

Generous Salary Increase for Dr. Bradley

The trustees of First, Saginaw, at a recent meeting voted to increase the salary of their pastor, Dr. N. S. Bradley, $1,200 per year. This action, taken just as the pastor is rounding out 20 years of service, bears evidence of the cordial relations which have always existed between leader and people. During these two decades, Saginaw has passed through a moral and social as well as an economic transition. Sordid saloons, houses of commercialized vice, gambling dens and other intrenched social evils have, on the one hand, been sloughed off, while on the other hand there is going on a promising co-ordination of socially constructive agencies, as well as the development of new enterprises in the interest of community welfare. It is agreed that the pulpit of First has been a potent factor in this transformation, and has exercised a powerful influence in the life of the city. Dr. Bradley's pertinent, progressive, positive messages have gathered about him a group of forward-looking men and women who have caught the vision of the Kingdom and are striving to actualize it in the community life.

Hartington Has "Junior Members"

Hartington, Rev. S. A. Willard, pastor, has received 51 into church membership during the last six months, 22 of them on confession. In addition to these, 19 children have been enrolled as junior members. These are the baptized children for whom the church assumes special care. When they reach suitable age, it is expected they will receive a course of instruction in the Christian life and duties of church members and if they so desire be received as regular members of the church.

Isaacs, from Orwell, Vt., to be associate pastor, in charge of extension work. Twelve outstations will be linked up to the central organization where a community house costing $17,000 is to be built. The Home Missionary Society has furnished this field with an automobile which will carry a movie outfit, Sunday school supplies and a circulating library for use in the outstations. Nine young people from the Sunday school united with the church Easter Sunday on confession, one being a Sunday school teacher who brought four members of her class with her.

CALIFORNIA

Japanese Ministers Attend Council

The Japanese Congregational churches in California are fully abreast of any of the American churches and far in advance of many of them in their interest in the International Council. Some of these churches expressed their interest in a practical way. Rev. Kanosuke Nukaga, the pastor of Japanese, Oakland, was enabled by the generosity of his people to make the trip to Boston and to attend this notable gathering, $350 having been provided by the congregation for this purpose.

Rev. J. K. Fukushima, the pastor of Japanese, Fresno, also attended the Council. The Northern California Conference rejoices that it was represented by these Japanese brethren, both of whom are doing effective work among their countrymen in the state.

Nearly a Decade of Service

A nine years' pastorate is just being completed by Rev. E. H. Willisford, Ph.D., at Glendale. Dr. Willisford's resignation does not take effect until Oct. 1, but the church has generously given him a two months' leave of absence, so that his active service ends July 31.

The organization, with a present membership of 214, may genuinely be said to be the child of Dr. Willisford's faithful effort. He organized the church in 1911 and has built it into a splendid place in the community. A bungalow house of worship was erected in 1912, but the church has now outgrown its present quarters. Plans are in prospect for the immediate provision of a more adequate church building, the actual accomplishment of this having been delayed only because of wartime conditions. Save for his 18 months' service in France, Dr. Willisford has been constantly active in this parish. He has proven himself an able leader, and Glendale offers a splendid opportunity to his successor.

Logan Heights, San Diego, Rejoices

The recent quarterly meeting of this year of Logan Heights, San Diego, became the occasion for a happy celebration. The gift of $500 by Rev. J. L. Pearson, a devoted member of the organization, lifted the burden of debt, which the church has borne for the past decade.

Personals

Bailey, J. W., formerly of First, Lockport, N. Y., and Director of Religious Work at Camp Merritt during the war, has closed his year's work with the Interchurch Movement. He has accepted appointment under the Presbyterian General Assembly's Evangelistic Committee, and on Sept. 21 will begin his new work in the Butler Presbytery of Pennsylvania. Dr. Bailey was twice pastor of Lockport, having been recalled to his former parish there. He closed his second pastorate to take up war work. Having his Sundays free, he has been acting as chaplain on the Hudson River Boat Line, holding services every Sunday on the day boats and at Bear Mountain.

Carter, H. W., Madison, Wis., with Mrs. Carter, attended his fiftieth reunion at Oberlin in June. Nineteen of the 31 living members were present out of a class of 66 graduates in 1870. The class had present the largest per cent. of the living members of any class represented, in view of which fact '70 received the beautiful "Commencement Cup," which was awarded this year for the first time.

Cross, R. S., was mentioned as residing in Milwaukee, in the issue of July 8. His residence should have been given as Minneapolis, Minn.

Curtis, J. S., First, Somers, Ct., has been granted a four months' leave of absence on account of ill health.

Edwards, Jonathan and Mrs. Edwards, Spokane, Wash., attended the International Council and are making an extended trip throughout the East, after an absence of 34 years. During these years Dr. Edwards has labored incessantly in the great Northwest and as a result some 25 churches have been organized and 12 church buildings erected under his leadership. Even now at Vera, a suburb of Spokane, a church is being built under his direction.

Gale, T. E., formerly pastor of South Braintree, Mass., is in a critical condition, following a series of operations. The sad news of his loss of sight has aroused the sympathy of a large circle of friends.

Malzard, F. J., First, Jericho, Vt., observed the first anniversary of his pastorate on July 18 with a communion service at which 13 persons were received into the fellowship. This gives a total of 40 accessions since Jan. 1, 35 by confession, which makes an increase of 50 per cent. in the active membership of the church.

Mathews, H. S., by the request of the Burlington, Wis., Church, where he has served the past year as director of religious education, was examined for ordination at the last meeting of the Milwaukee Association, and by vote of the association and with its co-operation was ordained in the Burlington Church Sunday evening, May 30. During the summer, he is supplying the Mukwonago church in the absence of its pastor, Rev. H. L. Sawyer. He expects to take up missionary work in China this fall.

Miner, Rev. H. A., Madison, Wis., on his 91st birthday, July 1, presided at the leading banquet celebration at Plymouth Rock. Mr. Miner also attended the International Council at Boston and spent July visiting friends in the East.

White, C. E., formerly Circulation Manager of The Congregationalist, now associated with the American Board in its Boston office, has been stated supply at Westboro, Mass., the past six months.

MRS. ARDELIA HARRIS DICKINSON

Mrs. Ardelia Harris Dickinson died at her home in North Amherst, Mass., July 4, 1920, after a long life of faithful Christian service. Mrs. Dickinson had been connected with the Congregational Church for sixty-three years, passing to the "Church Triumphant" on the anniversary of the day when, as a girl of fourteen, she joined the Congregational Church of Hatfield, Mass., and also on the anniversary of the day when, nine years later, she joined, as a bride, the church of her husband, the late Charles Read Dickinson, in North Amherst, Mass.

She is survived by a sister, two sons, two daughters, and five grandchildren.

She has left behind her a memory which is an inspiration and a joy to very many.

DEACON JOHN E. PARKER

An Appreciation by Rev. A. Z. Conrad, D.D.

A good man, a noble Christian, a loyal husband and father, a loyal friend, a courteous gentleman, a conscientious churchman was Deacon John E. Parker, who entered into the Blessed Rest Tuesday, July 20.

He was born at New Ipswich, but spent his boyhood at Peterboro, New Hampshire. He came to Boston in 1852. The larger part of his business life was spent in connection with the wholesale dry-goods business.

As a business man Deacon Parker was conspicuously conscientious and honest. His absolute fidelity to every trust caused him to be held in the very highest esteem by all of his business associates. His vitality and virility enabled him to continue in active business until 1911, when at the age of 81 he retired from active work.

He was deeply interested in various philanthropies and a generous supporter of manifold causes of a humanitarian character. His religious life was identified with Park Street Church, Boston, which he had attended continuously since 1853. During the evangelistic services conducted by Rev. Charles G. Finney in 1857 Mr. Parker confessed Christ and Nov. 2 of that year united with Park Street Church. Immediately he engaged in definite Christian work and held various offices in church and Sunday School.

In January, 1871, he was elected deacon and served continuously in that capacity to the end of his life. At one time or another he filled every important office in connection with church and parish. Naturally conservative, he was yet progressive in all that pertained to the advancement of the Kingdom of Christ. With positive convictions and deeply evangelical in faith, he was considerate of the opinions of those with whom he differed. He was devoutly Christian and lived the Gospel he professed. No member of Park Street Church was more signally honored or more devoutly loved. His character was absolutely above reproach. Courtesy and kindness characterized his relations with his fellow men. He was absolutely loyal to the Bible as God's Word and to Jesus Christ as a redeeming Saviour and unhesitatingly witnessed to these facts.

Politically he was a Republican and the advocate of every great social reform of his time. Deacon Parker was a Charter Member of The Boston Congregational Club and recently enjoyed the distinction of being elected an Honorary Member for life. He attributed much of his happiness and success to the loving companionship of his wife, whom he married Jan. 28, 1856. In a recent heart-to-heart interview he stated that to his wife of blessed memory and to Park Street Church he owed the greatest blessings and privileges of his life. Since the decease of his wife in 1896 he has made his home with his only daughter, the wife of Dr. F. E. Park of Stoneham, though continuing regularly to attend Park Street Church. He entered into rest peacefully and triumphantly, leaving an unblemished record of a faithful life. Funeral services were conducted by Dr. Conrad in Stoneham, Thursday, July 22, and the interment was at Peterboro, N. H.

EDWARD ESTUS SCOTT

Edward Estus Scott, who died June 11 at Talladega, Ala., was born near Hazlehurst, Miss., May 23, 1866. He spent nine years in the preparatory and normal departments of Tougaloo College, and was graduated from Howard University in 1892. He was ordained to the Congregational ministry in 1892.

Mr. Scott spent his first summer with three small churches in Alabama and Mississippi. Other pastorates served by him were Alco, Ala., 1892–93; Nashville, 1894–96; Shelby, Ala., 1897–1904; Montgomery, Ala., 1904–19; Talladega, 1919 until he died. Following his pastorate at Nashville, he spent a season with the Fisk Jubilee singers in the North and East. He had a fine, mellow voice, and loved to sing the old-time melodies of his race. He has served as Moderator of the Alabama State Association of Congregational Churches, and for 14 years was its recording secretary. He was married to Rachel Pepper, October 31, at Vaughan, Miss., who, with two sons and four daughters, is living.

OUR READERS' FORUM

December or May

My dear Mr. Editor:

May we not have from our denominational leaders a clear-cut statement of the reasons for the proposed change in the time of making our Every Member Canvass? In the absence of such a statement it would seem that Dr. Byington in his criticism in The Congregationalist of the change has much the better of the argument.

The contemplated change seems to be a legacy of the Interchurch Movement. The Movement has not been right about everything. Is is not quite possible that it is wrong here? Ought we not frankly to face the fact that the Movement's appeal for the change, or its endorsement of the change, whichever it happens to be, will not carry much weight in the local church? In spite of its successes the Movement is from now on likely to be more of a liability than an asset in the financial canvass of our churches.

Our denominational leaders are right in their emphasis upon the importance of the Every Member Canvass. But is it wise to decide for the local church when or how that canvass shall be taken? Are we not in danger of sacrificing efficiency for the sake of attaining uniformity?

Whatever action is taken in the matter the local churches should be assigned and notified of their quota of next year's emergency fund not later than Oct. 1, so that they may be included, if desirable, in the December canvass.

Richard H. Bennett.

Melrose, Mass.

Editors' Note.—It should be remembered that our churches are free to have their Every Member Canvass whenever they please, and the Congregational World Movement does not oppose the December canvass in churches that prefer that time rather than spring. It is expected that many churches will stick to December for the coming season. On the other hand, a larger number of churches are reported as preferring a spring canvass. Considering that fact, and the facts that the last spring's pledges to the Congregational World Movement run to next May, that there is hardly time to prepare for and put through another nationwide campaign before December, and the fact that there is likely to be some form of interdenominational co-operation in movements similar to our own heading up in the spring, it has seemed best to the executive officers and the Commission of One Hundred of our Movement to advise the spring canvass and extend the period to the first of May, rather than try to induce all of our churches to unite on December, which, as a matter of fact, has never been done before. Nevertheless, Mr. Bennett's suggestions deserve consideration. Early announcement of quotas is certainly desirable, and other information should be issued as early as possible.

Not All Republicans

Dear Mr. Editor:

I am wondering by what authority our paper presumes to commit the entire denomination to the support of the Republican party.

By strong resolutions, passed in National and International Councils and in state and local conferences and associations, we have declared ourselves in favor of the League of Nations. The Republican party, as positively and authoritatively as it is possible for it to do, has committed itself in opposition to the League; yet the editorial attitude of our paper seems to be that we will vote the Republican ticket unanimously next November.

Did we mean it when we resolved for the League? I did, and I will not vote with a party nor for a candidate that denounces and rejects it.

I do not ask that our paper declare for the Democratic party. Let it be free from partisanship and give us fair statements of the good and bad in all parties. But I do emphatically protest against the present assumption that we are Republicans. Some of us are not.

San Diego, Cal. W. H. Hannaford.

Editors' Note.—This is news to us. When did we do it?

Thinks We Are Fairly Progressive

Dear Mr. Editor:

Permit me to express appreciation of the editorial position of The Congregationalist. I have always liked your stand on the League of Nations, and now you are expressing your protests against the reactionary stand of both old parties. Progressive and liberal men will be looking for a way to register their own protest at the polls in November, I am thinking.

Mobridge, N. D. Wm. F. Ireland.

The Council Communion Service

Dear Mr. Editor:

In addition to the mention which you have kindly made of the persons assisting in the communion service at the International Council, thanks are due Rev. Manley F. Allbright of Allston, Rev. Marvin R. Brandt of Sheboygan, Wis., Rev. Oliver D. Sewall of Dedham, Mass., and Rev. Frederick Von der Sump of New Bedford, who officiated at the auxiliary tables in the balconies. It should also be known that over seventy busy laymen from the churches of Greater Boston assembled at Tremont Temple on Wednesday afternoon before the service, to rehearse the details and insure reverence and expedition in the distribution of the sacrament. In securing the supplies the staff of the Pilgrim Press Book Store were most heplful, and in the preparation of the elements the assistants in the Tremont Temple Church Office gave almost the entire day with fine enthusiasm and appreciation of the international significance of the occasion, which Principal Griffith-Jones was kind enough to call "an unforgettable service."

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age....... $50.61
At 50 years of age....... 71.77
At 55 years of age....... 114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Object for Intercession

For a Way of Peace in the East:

Lord God, who art merciful, make a way, we entreat thee, for an end of the wars which follow on the war we hoped was ended. Remember the folk who suffer and the sin of the leaders who for their ambition or their hatred go on shedding blood. Let the thought of the brotherhood of men be made real in the minds of the people. Overturn all that stands in the way of peace. And let a new age of quietness and forbearance, of faithful work and prosperous years, if it please thee, dawn on the disturbed and distracted peoples. In the name of Christ. Amen.

Speeding the Parting Guests

Dear Mr. Editor:

In view of the fact that thousands of former immigrants have already left our shores to return to their native countries, after having been unable to do so for the last four years, and that quite as many, if not more, will leave before the close of the year, the question advances as to whether it is not a matter of duty, as incident to this "Bible year," to see to it that those who are to go are equipped with the Scripture in their own language, inasmuch as the larger percentage return to homelands where there is a famine of the Word? Those to whom they return will be interested in whatever they take from America. Can they take anything better than earth's most valuable treasure? W. H. Morse, M. D.

strength of numbers, wealth, achievements and power of a hard and thorough work.

When Russia appears, Doubt warns against "the Soviet tribe that can't be far behind." Russia pleads that though she has often been wicked and foolish, she has been betrayed by her leaders in church and state. Faith induces the Church to hold out a helping hand.

Interchurch says, "I am strong. The Interchurch will unite in one purpose and one service all who will work for God and humanity." Doubt sneers at her mistakes and her uselessness, but Faith wins with her closing plea:

> "For right is right since God is God,
> And right the day must win.
> To doubt would be disloyalty,
> To falter would be sin."

Church prays for the eye of Faith, "by which we may see Thy will and have the courage of our convictions;" and Interchurch prays for the eye of Faith "that we may see the unity that Thou didst will for Thy followers on earth." At this crisis all sing, "faith is the victory that overcomes the world."

RISIBLES

Minister—Would you like to join our new missionary movement?

Young Lady—I'd be delighted! Is it anything like the fox trot?

"Father," said the youthful seeker after knowledge, "why do words have roots?" "I suppose, my son," replied the weary parent, "so that the language can grow."—The Independent.

The Chairman: "Don't you think, gentlemen, in view of the high cost of living, we ought to increase our pastor's salary?" Vestryman: "That's all right. But don't pay him for overtime on his sermons."—Life.

Good, absent-minded Doctor Wilder was greatly dependent upon his practical wife. One morning Mrs. Wilder sent up an announcement after he had entered the pulpit, with a footnote intended to be private. "The Women's Missionary Society," he read aloud, "will meet Wednesday afternoon at three o'clock sharp. Your necktie is crooked; please straighten toward the right."—Christian Register.

CONGREGATIONAL WORLD MOVEMENT

287 Fourth Avenue, New York City

The churches of North and South Dakota are endeavoring to raise special funds for a group of educational and missionary interests—in connection with their Congregational World Movement campaigns, their subscriptions extending over a five-year period. North Dakota's goal is $400,000, of which $200,000 is pledged, and South Dakota's is $500,000, of which $358,000 is pledged.

The splendid and heroic spirit which these Dakota churches are manifesting is worthy of imitation by our churches in other states and regions of the country.

The following is a list of the churches that have equaled or exceeded their quotas, resident membership as well as amount pledged being indicated in each instance:

The Talk of the Sanctum

A Herring Memorial Number

It is fitting that this issue of The Congregationalist should be devoted largely to matter relating to Dr. Hubert C. Herring, whose tragic death has so shocked and saddened all who knew him. It is impossible to appraise adequately his noble character or his notable life service to the Congregational denomination and the kingdom of righteousness. We may gain much of fact and inspiration from the tributes to his memory which have come to us from leaders of our fellowship who have worked with him in recent years and have intimate personal knowledge of the man and that which he achieved. This sheaf of tributes is an important feature of this issue. The sad story of the sudden death of Dr. Herring, an outline of his career and a report of the funeral service will be found on the pages that follow.

To these articles we have added some significant extracts from Dr. Herring's biennial report to the National Council at Grand Rapids last October. Although but fragments, they throw a flood of light upon mind and faith and spirit of this great leader and deserve wider attention than they received in the midst of the many reports and addresses of the Council.

Dr. Herring's last and the best of his recent portraits appears upon the cover.

In the Circulation Department—

We mourn the loss of Dr. Herring as one of our very best friends. Indeed, he seemed to us one of our own happy Congregationalist family, for he shared with us our personal interest in all The Congregationalist's departments, worked with us in the service we try to render and assumed a generous measure of responsibility for the paper's welfare and support, all of which gave us real encouragement and substantial help.

He never meddled or found fault or tried to dictate to any of our staff; but he did respond in a wise, broadminded, big-hearted, brotherly way in counsel, and repeatedly volunteered his services in promoting circulation and support for the paper. Dr. Herring was also a frequent and valued contributor to our columns.

He often expressed his grateful appreciation of the services rendered by The Congregationalist for denominational causes, the local church, the higher life of home and individual and the far-reaching cause of righteousness.

He looked upon The Congregationalist as one of the most important of our denominational agencies whose benefits should be shared by all good Congregationalists and for whose promotion and support the denomination is responsible. He often expressed his desire that Congregational leaders, national, state and pastoral, should push the paper. He felt the obligation to the paper to do this, and he realized that by so doing the best interests of the cause we represent are served effectively.

In these days when publishing is attended by so many difficulties, especially financial ones, and when Congregationalists need as never before light, leadership and inspiration in our common tasks and opportunities, The Congregationalist must have strong and hearty co-operation and support. Dr. Herring has left a shining example for the leaders who remain and for those who follow him.

From Our Mail Bag

"The paper has been an inspiration and help not only to me but to my whole family, and is one which we have unanimously voted to keep on our reading table."

In order to acquaint the public with the general telephone situation, and some of the reasons for delay in completing new installations—chief among which is the difficulty of getting the numerous kinds of necessary material—we have prepared a series of announcements of which this is the second.

Reserve Telephone Equipment Exhausted

We used to engineer our plant—switchboards, cables, circuits, and all necessary parts thereof—to anticipate by several years the growth of population or manufacturing in any particular place or region. Consequently, we were always able to meet promptly demands for service, no matter how large or unexpected.

Hence, during the war period we were able to give service to a rapidly increasing list of subscribers, although we had little priority consideration as a necessary industry and were compelled by government restriction to abandon our normal programme of advance construction.

When the war ended, however, these reserve facilities had been almost wholly preempted by the growing demand. Our usual reserve of central offices, switchboards, power plants, conduits, cables, manholes, pole lines no longer existed. We required rubber, paper, copper wire, lumber, silk, clay, glass, porcelain, paraffin, and many other things not ordinarily associated in the public mind with telephone service, in order to restore our reserves.

Every business man will realize the difficulty experienced in getting some, if not all, of these things. We had to get all, or devise some efficient substitute for those which could not be had.

We have installed more new telephones thus far this year than in any previous similar period of telephone history; and we could have done still more but for the exhaustion of our reserve equipment caused by general conditions of production and transportation. These are showing signs of improvement, however.

Our morale is good. Our people are earnestly desirous of giving good service and of extending it as fast as possible. Although there are many persons to whom we cannot at once give telephone service because of conditions wholly outside our organization, we are determined to meet their desires as soon as it is humanly possible to do so.

Hubert C. Herring—A Kingdom Builder

THE sudden and tragic earthly ending of a life more vitally related to the six thousand Congregational churches of the United States than that of any other man has caused a wave of sorrow that is literally nation-wide. It would have been hard to lose him under any circumstances. It is doubly hard when he is taken on the very first day of a well-earned and greatly needed vacation. But yesterday he was the animating and commanding figure in a great international assemblage. Today he is held by the silence and majesty of a mysterious death. We can only bow meekly before God's ordering of our human years and rest quietly upon the Eternal Justice and the Eternal Goodness.

"He gave some to be" administrators. That was Hubert Herring's divine commission. Not that he was not admirably qualified for the pastorate and notably successful in it in Sioux City, Chicago and Omaha. Not that he could not preach with unction and power. Not that he did not love the quiet hours and the studious pursuits available to even the busiest local minister. Not that he was not skillful in the cure of souls or one to whom others instinctively open their hearts.

But when, thirteen years ago, at the call of the Congregational Home Missionary Society, Dr. Herring put aside the privileges and joys of the pastorate it was in response to the inner prompting that from that time on his work was to lie in the field of administration. And when, six years later, he was promoted to the secretaryship of the reorganized National Council it was to utilize on a larger scale his peculiar gifts.

Dr. Herring never had any illusions regarding his place and mission as the titular head of the Congregational denomination. He never expected anybody to call him "Rabbi." The chief seats in the synagogue had as little attraction for him as for any man in our fellowship. When the council migrated from city to city for the biennial sessions he was always scrupulous not to have any official hotel or headquarters where he might set up his little court. When the meetings were on he was seldom in the limelight. The last thing anyone could say of Hubert Herring was that he took himself too seriously.

Nor in all these seven years of arduous service has he for a single moment exaggerated the power of the instrument which he wielded. Though Presbyterian born, he had many years ago become so enamored of the freedom and democracy of our historic Congregational polity and so indoctrinated with them that he could build the new Congregationalism on no other foundations. On this point he spoke explicitly in his noble address at the last meeting of the council, saying:

> We do not propose that Association, Conference or Council shall become an external conscience for us. Let this Council attempt to say what any of us must think or do and it will make quick discovery of its limitations. But we are of one mind that we desire to stabilize—solidify—the structural life of our denomination. There is no virtue in formlessness. There is no sin in order.

On the other hand, Dr. Herring was in profound sympathy with that influential group of forward-looking men among us, represented notably in the now famous Commission of Nineteen, who reported at Kansas City in 1913. He believed, and they believed, as all of us who take a large and not a provincial view of organized religion have come to believe, that with no real detriment to the principle of liberty, the principle of fellowship can and should be given larger scope.

The denomination needed in 1913, as it needs today and will need in the difficult years just before us, a committee and an executive officer who represents not one missionary society but all our agencies; not one section, but all parts of the country; not one interest, but all our common affairs.

To this task of co-ordination Dr. Herring gave the full strength of his ripest years. He had no precedent to guide him. He entered, it is true, into the valuable labors of faithful predecessors, but his new and extra-office duties soon claimed the major part of his time and thought. To articulate more closely our missionary societies; to obviate friction, waste, and overlapping; to inaugurate measures looking toward the stability and larger usefulness of our educational institutions; to suggest to local churches programs, standards, and methods; to put the wisdom and resources of the whole fellowship at the disposal of the weakest and most remote member—these were some of Dr. Herring's working ideals for twentieth-century Congregationalism. No one would claim that in seven short years and working with and for churches not accustomed to any kind of supervision from without, he has brought to pass all that was in his fertile brain. But we are confident that no other man could have done his work better and that the number of those who would have done it as well is exceedingly small.

Not less deeply did Dr. Herring long to see Protestantism similarly integrated. He was our spokesman in the councils of war and on the strategy boards. He had come to be an outstanding figure in the interdenominational world. He will be mourned and missed far beyond the bounds of Congregationalism. We may well be thankful that such a man has been our representative in the larger circles.

Elsewhere in this issue men who have known Dr. Herring intimately point out the qualities that made him the leader he was. We would at this time emphasize only one of many and that his deep, simple, genuine piety. It pulses in almost every sentence of the Grand Rapids address to which we have alluded, an address to which Congregationalists will frequently return in the years to come as lovers of George Washington hark back to the Farewell.

Not one of the manifest gains for Congregationalism which Hubert Herring helped to secure must be lost. It would be dishonoring him to retreat into the old isolation. We must have, and have soon, a new secretary. God grant to him the same measure of fidelity, the poise of mind, the serenity of spirit, the large outlook, the patience, good temper, and, above all, the overmastering love for Christ which made Hubert Herring the Christian and the Christian leader whom we loved.

Summer Negligence

We have no intention of writing a continued story with weekly installments relating to churches that are losing the opportunities and shirking the responsibilities of Christian service during the summer. One would not have to travel far to obtain material for such a discouraging tale. Yet, without overstating the situation, we wish we could, by citing one or two more cases, prick the complacency of those who consult their own preferences or convenience rather than the needs of the community and the demands of the gospel with relation to the maintenance of public worship.

Our recent travels have taken us to a town of perhaps 2,500 inhabitants with several Protestant churches. During these August Sundays the only religious bodies that are keeping their doors open are the Roman Catholics and the Christian Scientists. That leaves a small range of choice for the average church-goer of Protestant antecedents. Presumably a number of people are out of town, but only a small proportion of the permanent population.

The sad fact is that a good many church people welcome the relief afforded by a decision to suspend services during August. It gives them more freedom in the use of the day itself and it chimes in with that "hot weather feeling" in which we all participate to a greater or less extent. We are not unduly stringent in our requirements, nor do we undertake to lay down the law for the individual. We believe in vacations and even in vacations from church going. Our point is that the Christian church is in business for its Master, and that it has no right to give the community the impression that for five consecutive Sundays and during the intervening weeks it has no message to give and no work to do. Or to change the figure, it is a military outpost where some sentinels should always be on duty.

We believe in union services when the congregations are likely to be slender. What we object to is total neglect of the field. No church or community is without the faithful few who could keep the fires on the altar burning, so that the passer-by might know whither to turn his steps, should he want the fellowship of God's house and of God's people. It may take a little planning and self-denial in order thus to provide the steady nucleus throughout summer days, but our churches need just this challenge to the arduous task. We fear that so many closed church doors in August mean a decline of interest in what the church stands for on the part of church members themselves. If that be true, the routine work of the year beginning in the autumn will not be made easier but all the harder because of the slight valuation put on summer opportunities.

Dr. Pentecost

Dr. George F. Pentecost, who has just died, had outlived most of those whom a generation ago his eloquence thrilled and influenced on both sides of the Atlantic. An intimate friend of the late Dwight L. Moody, he did a work similar in nature to that of the Northfield evangelist, and like him was effectively supplemented by a gospel singer, George C. Stebbins, hardly less appealing to the average church audience than the famous Ira D. Sankey.

Dr. Pentecost's oratory was of the sledge-hammer type, and the wooing note so conspicuous in Gypsy Smith was not particularly evident. Yet his appeals to the unconverted brought a large harvest of converts, whose average of fidelity to their newly confessed faith was high. He was a delightful companion. He liked the good things of this world and his summer home at Northfield was a center of hospitality and good cheer. He had the saving grace of humor and yet no one could doubt the ardor of his devotion to Christ and of his personal confidence in the fundamental gospel truths which were the staple of his message.

Dr. Pentecost was born in Illinois and educated in Kentucky, at Georgetown College. All his ministerial life a Presbyterian, he served that communion as pastor on both sides of the Atlantic, in Marylebone Church, London, in Yonkers, N. Y., and in Bethany Church, Philadelphia, as well as in missionary delegations and visitation pretty much around the world. But he was most widely known as an evangelist, first in association with Mr. Moody, with whom he spent three years, including the British tour of 1888, and then as leader in preaching tours in India and America. He was on his way to preach when stricken on the train and died in the emergency hospital at the Grand Central Station in New York. He began to fend for himself as a printer's apprentice at twelve and worked at his trade for seven years. He went from college to join the Union Army in 1861 and rose to the rank of captain. He has left a number of published works.

The Russian Problem

The Allies are agreed, and official statements from our own government are in consonance with them in principle, that Poland must be rescued from invasion and restored as a peaceful member of the family of nations within the boundaries fixed by the Allied Council. The Russians in their conditions of peace insist that Poland shall disarm, which is well enough, but seems to put Poland completely at the mercy of its armed neighbors, Russia and Germany, unless they also are disarmed. The real difficulty of the situation is the distrust of all the other parties to a possible agreement in regard to the honor and fidelity of the present Russian authorities. Secretary of State Colby in his note in answer to the letter of inquiry of the Italian Ambassador, which he says has President Wilson's express approval, says, after reasserting American sympathy with the efforts of the Russian people "to reconstruct their national life upon the broad basis of popular self-government":

"It is not possible for the Government of the United States to recognize the present rulers of Russia as a government with which the relations common to friendly governments can be maintained. This conviction has nothing to do with any particular political or social structure which the Russian people themselves may see fit to embrace. It rests upon a wholly different set of facts. These facts, which none disputes, have convinced the Government of the United States, against its will, that the existing régime in Russia is based upon the negation of every principle of honor and good faith, and every usage and convention, underlying the whole structure of international law, the negation, in short, of every principle upon which it is possible to base harmonious and trustful relations, whether of nations or of individuals."

The English Dilemma in Palestine

The recent convention of Zionists which conferred upon Justice Brandeis of our Supreme Court the honor of election to a directorship which he insisted should be honorary and not active, was greatly hampered by the fact that the Jews who composed it could not understand one another in their public discussions. There is no present common tongue of Jewry. That is one of the difficulties which will be encountered in the attempt to settle Jews from many countries in Palestine—a difficulty which it is proposed to meet by choosing Hebrew as the common tongue.

England has done its part in clearing the way for a Zionist settlement, even going so far as to appoint a well-known English Jew as a commissioner in charge of the country under its mandate. He may be trusted, however, we think, to remember the traditional English impartiality in administration of territory, and especially in regard to religion. But difficulties have arisen, as they were sure to do, and partly from the grasping policy of certain short-sighted Zionist leaders. It was seriously proposed, for example, that all the land in Palestine should be in public ownership and merely rented out to holders.

As a matter of fact, Palestine is not unoccupied and its land could not be obtained for public ownership except by buying out or driving out its present owners. Most of it probably is not for sale. The threat of Jewish political control following a wholesale immigration of Jews from Eastern Europe, most of whom have for generations been town-dwellers, has aroused first the suspicion and then the protest of the present inhabitants of Palestine, not even excluding some among the 10 or 15 per cent. of them who are Jews. There were serious riots in Jerusalem about Easter time. The Moslems and Christians have even been driven into co-opera-

The Death of Dr. Herring

The Tragic Ending of a Great Leader's Career

By Rev. Charles C. Merrill

The International Council, as the crowning event of the Tercentenary celebration, had been for several years an object of keen concern to Dr. Herring, and of course during the busy months which preceded it and during its sessions he had the chief responsibility for its success. Moreover, the winter and spring had entailed especially arduous work of other sorts, including service as a Regional Director of the Congregational World Movement, and also central committee service in at least two interdenominational movements of first importance. After the Council, he went back to New York, thinking to get a measure of rest by keeping in what seemed to be necessary touch with his office, but spending a good deal of time at home or on short trips away for the day. But he found that on account of the frequency of office and other calls the change and the quiet which he needed were not being obtained, and so the last week in July he arranged to go with Mrs. Herring to a farmhouse in the town of Chilmark, toward the eastern end of Martha's Vineyard, not far from the Gay Head lighthouse.

Martha's Vineyard is an island off the Massachusetts coast, containing the well-known resort of Oak Bluffs. Dr. Herring's location, however, was some thirteen miles from the Bluffs, and with its combination of country and sea and its comparative isolation, it was almost ideal for what he wanted.

I saw him on the afternoon of his arrival, as my summer home happens to be in the same part of the island. He seemed unusually happy and was evidently looking forward with great zest to the days just ahead. He had brought down a shelf full of books and was going to do some reading. But a special interest seemed to lie in the chance he would have to make quiet preparation for the Hartford Pastors' Conference in September, which he was to conduct alone. He had never done just this before and seemed to feel that it was an unusual opportunity at which he was glad to try his hand. When I left him, I found myself looking forward to his stay on the island almost as much as he, for I expected that we should be able to foregather not a little, and it would be a rare delight to act as his guide in exploring the points of interest thereabout.

DEATH IN THE SEA

The morning after their arrival was rainy, and he and Mrs. Herring spent the most of it reading and writing. Toward noon he arranged with a fellow boarder to go in for a bath in the surf. As he had spent his recent vacations beside an inland lake, the chance at the salt water undoubtedly made a special appeal to him. On account of the rain, no one went with them to the shore, which is less than a quarter of a mile from the house and not in sight. That was the last Mrs. Herring saw of her husband alive. About an hour later, his companion reached the house with strength all but exhausted, to say that Dr. Herring had called for help, that he had gone to him, and had not left him until he had said he was all right. He himself was just able to struggle ashore and when he returned Dr. Herring was not to be seen.

Mrs. Herring rushed to the beach and men from near-by houses followed. For nearly an hour there was nothing that could be done as the body was not in sight. At last it appeared floating face downward and caught in an eddy, from which it was with great difficulty brought to shore. Hardly had this been accomplished, when the United States Coast Guards from Gay Head arrived and everything in the way of resuscitation that their training and experience could suggest was done. It is, however, the judgment of their captain that on account of the small amount of water found in the lungs and stomach and on account of the way in which the body floated, death took place either before or very soon after he went under water.

It seems wholly probable that Dr. Herring's strength had been depleted by the exhausting labors of the preceding months, much more than he realized, and when he called upon his physical reserve to meet an unexpected situation in which he found himself that day there was insufficient reserve to respond. The young man who was with him in the water had recovered by evening so as to talk about the event and gave it as his opinion that when Dr. Herring said he was "all right" he realized his desperate chance, but deliberately chose that only one life should be lost.

I cannot help recording here the marvelous calmness and fortitude which characterized Mrs. Herring during that terrible afternoon. She was on the beach nearly if not quite five hours, insisting that she must remain there until the medical examiner should arrive and meanwhile directing efforts at resuscitation, even after the Coast Guard had finished their work. One sees what a tower of strength she must have been to her husband during his crowded years of heavy responsibility. I recall his saying once that "we wouldn't be worth thirty cents without our wives," and I can understand that with him it was no idle remark.

A GREAT CHRISTIAN

Of necessity I have been thinking almost continuously since that fatal Friday of Dr. Herring and his life, and there has constantly recurred to me the phrase in which Lord Salisbury summed up his estimate of Mr. Gladstone: "He was a great Christian."

The value of the administrative and organizing service which Dr. Herring has rendered American Congregationalism is of course incomparable. It was a bold, although a necessary, voyage, upon which the Kansas City Council started the denomination, and he was virtually put in charge of it. That the ship has kept so even a keel and has made so genuine progress is due in a remarkable degree to his skill at the wheel. When the history of this development of a new Congregationalism, which after all is the natural and inevitable development of the old, comes to be written, it will be surely accounted singularly providential that a man of just Hubert C. Herring's qualities of mind and heart was the first secretary of the Council under the new constitution, and that he continued in service for seven eventful years.

The office demanded a man who was no ecclesiastic, no politician, no trimmer, no mere "efficiency expert," but who had a patience, a humility, a sincerity, and a devotion to his task that reminded men of the Master himself. Dr. Herring met this demand and that is why I think he was a "great Christian."

Tributes to Dr. Herring

From Congregational Leaders Who Worked with Him

From the Council Moderator

Dr. Herring's death seems incredible. Our loss as a denomination is beyond estimate. As the first executive secretary of the National Council, when standards were being established, Dr. Herring made the office henceforth indispensable. He had enormous working power, and gave himself to his work without stint and at the same time with rare judgment and tact and unfailing good temper. He combined, indeed, in unusual degree marked executive ability with tolerance and good humor. It fell to his lot to have a leading part in many important readjustments in the denomination, but he kept, nevertheless, the confidence and love of men of all parties. With broad vision and an urgent progressive spirit he united a wholesome sanity and an undergirding faith in God and men. He did not shirk disagreeable responsibility, and yet he had the difficult grace of being ready himself to accept justified criticism promptly and wholeheartedly. Whoever succeeds him in office will enter a succession already made highly honorable. Personally Dr. Herring had great capacity for friendship and a large measure of his Master's spirit. There will be abiding sorrow in the hearts of all of us who have worked closely with him as we take counsel together without his wise and buoyant friendship and leadership.

HENRY CHURCHILL KING.

Oberlin, O.

From His Pastor

(Spoken at the funeral services)

In what I have to say of Dr. Herring this afternoon, may I speak of some personal traits and characteristics of this man that have deeply impressed me? It has been one of my blessings to have known him somewhat intimately. And it only revealed to me that he possessed certain rare and beautiful qualities of character. It is these things after all that count for the most and that speak the loudest at such an hour as this. These are the real victory. A man might be a great executive, a competent engineer, a skilled organizer. And yet he might not reach the heights. The heights are occupied by those who win in a struggle that is not waged in the open, in a conflict that is not visible to men's eyes. The supreme triumph belongs to him who has won the victory over himself, who has emerged as conqueror in the struggle which each man wages for his own soul, who has rid his heart of those foes to security and peace which come out only by prayer; who possesses those virtues which are alone the gift of the Holy Spirit. These I have seen, these I have read, these I have not failed to mark in the man—and it was for these that I honored him most, and revered and loved him.

One was his modesty. There was no forthputting about the man. He, like his Master, did not cry out or make a noise in the streets. He was not easily provoked, thought no evil; surely here was an Israelite in whom there was no guile. Elevated by his fellows to a position of great importance and influence, he did not lord it over them, but humbled himself.

Another was the beautiful trait of openmindedness and teachableness. He had no pride of opinion. He was more singularly devoid of prejudice than any man I knew. I have seen him deliberately face a proposition from which I knew his nature and his predisposition caused him to shrink. Yet he did it bravely and utterly; not as a make-believe, but in the deliberate sacrifice of natural prejudice and in a determination to know whatever of truth may have been concealed from him. This is courage of a rare sort. The very last letter I had from him linked him with an idea, and with a man who embodied an idea, from which and from whom by what we call nature he was far apart. My heart went out to him when I read it. There I said to myself at the time is a real victor.

A third is a trait which I cannot call by anything else than childlikeness. Big of stature, he was as a little child. I recall the remark of Arnold of Rugby that at the heart of any very great man is something very much akin to a little child. By this standard, he was very great. And I think of Jesus' words, "Except ye become as a little child—"

Finally there was the Christian love, the intense Christian devotion of the man. It illumined everything that he said or that he did. Here was no mere ecclesiastic. He used to lament to me the necessity of making ecclesiastical and denominational addresses. When I asked him for a devotional address he would tell me that he was not in the way of it. And then he would start, and before long up would leap the fire that burned in his soul, out would come the fervent words, the deep feeling which showed how truly he lived with his Lord. Who can forget the report, so called, of the General Secretary at Grand Rapids? The word "report" suggests a dry list of denominational detail. But instead there is the spiritual outlook, the yearning, the infinite passion of one who shares the suffering of his Master and knows the travail of the soul of his Lord. He lived very near to Jesus. He is now safe in his arms. Oh, Lord, may grace to us be given to follow in his train.

RAYMOND CALKINS.

Cambridge, Mass.

From the Chairman of the National Council Executive Committee

The loss of Dr. Herring is tragic and overwhelming. My personal grief is very deep. In almost daily communication with him during the months prior to the International Council and in close association for the past years, his life had become a vital factor in mine. He was a rare yokefellow. The varied responsibilities of his high office he bore with conscientious devotion and unremitting zeal. His shoulders were broad and one more burden never seemed to count. He was like a packhorse for work.

Yet with all his mastery of detail, which was conspicuous, he had a comprehensive mind that grasped significant issues and steadily moved toward them. He had the mind of a statesman, far-seeing and comprehensive. This ruled in his administration of affairs and found voice in his notable utterances before the Council and to the churches.

Above all and better than all was the quality we inadequately name spiritual. He was profoundly religious, not only in his personal life but in his conception of the forces on which men and institutions must rely. His faith in the growing Kingdom of God was the conscious and active motive on which he depended for the reconstruction of human affairs.

No one could occupy the position he held and discharge its duties with such eminent success as he attained without strength of conviction. A moral integrity of profound significance underlay his mental grasp. While he sought to be informed on all sides of a question, that he might form an intelligent judgment, his final decision habitually rested on an element of intuitive moral sense. He had an instinct for what was right. His will was the loyal servant of his moral convictions. If he was tenacious of purpose, his steadiness was an expression of an inner integrity which he could not violate. Broad-minded in outlook and tolerant in counsel, he was unswerving in maintaining a policy once adopted. He won his way by intelligent persuasion rather than through personal dictation or arbitrary force.

His own character was reflected in his estimate of others. He loved the man who was dependable. One's reputation or position did not count for much unless it was sustained by worthy qualities. The weak spots in otherwise strong characters were a peculiar offense to him. He was singularly free from any taint of the pride that vaunteth itself, his entire personality being pervaded by an inherent modesty.

Dr. Herring was a man of large caliber, big in body and ample in soul. To associate with him was to grow fond of him. It is difficult to see who can fill his place. The loss is immeasurable. He was strong as a sheet anchor in the storm. His hand was steady at the helm and he steered a true course. In the formative years of the widening Congregational fellowship, he has been our worthy leader, honored and beloved, and his name will be held in lasting remembrance.

CHARLES FRANCIS CARTER.

From a Former Moderator

Our first thought is of Hubert C. Herring, the man we loved, then of the leader we trusted. He was great in friendship, statesmanship and in spiritual leadership. He was great in friendship. Few knew so well how to be the self-forgetting comrade. From Maine to California men he hardly knew will mourn him as a friend. He was great in statesmanship. His was a fearless idealism, stabilized by a most uncommon common sense. He was patient enough to wait while the rest of us caught up. As a prophet of the New Congregationalism he saw/ we must have a more efficient solidarity, but he was never the ecclesiastic, exalting organizational means above spiritual ends. As secretary he never forgot the point of view of the average pastor or church member. After the pattern of the new testament he was an overseer, but never an overlord. He was greater in spiritual leadership. He was determined to have the best of machinery, but never failed to see or to make us see that mechanism was not power. He never was afraid nor suffered others to fear, for he radiated consciousness of Him who standing in the shadow keeps watch above his own.

WILLIAM HORACE DAY.

From an Associate in Leadership

Hubert C. Herring was one of the outstanding Christian statesmen of America. He represented Congregationalism at its best. He seemed devoutly conscious of the constant presence and help of God, and his whole life rested deep on the solid foundations of an earnest Christian experience. But his Christian life was not placed in any intellectual straitjacket. His views on the historic questions of theology were vital but not final; his mind was always open to new ideas and hospitable to the convictions of others.

He was a sincere and earnest believer in a social gospel. He seemed more concerned about the implications of the message of Christ for the industrial and social life of the times, than for its speculative significance to the thinking of individual philosophers or theologians. He believed that the Christian religion furnishes a practical basis for life, and this conviction very largely determined his views concerning the relation of men to each other. He held that these relations, whether in industry or elsewhere, should be established from the point of view on the welfare of the many rather than the few, and he regarded privileges as specified only when accepted as opportunities for service and not as rewards.

He had a big heart. He greatly enjoyed the fellowship of other men and he numbered among his friends a wide variety of types. He had a mild sense of humor for the egoist. He had no admiration for the man who achieved success and lost in the process the quality of being human. He hated the spirit of the man who piles up advantages for himself, and he loved with a warm heart the man who labored with no thought of personal gain.

As Secretary of the National Council during the past seven years, he has shown constructive ability of the first order. He was foremost in all the work of reorganization during these critical years, and the effectiveness of our present well-ordered denominational life is largely the fruit of his labor. He had a genius for working with others; he encouraged them to contribute what they could, and no pride of priority ever interfered with his policies and undertakings having the benefit of the wisdom of others. He could carry enormous burdens of routine responsibilities with patience and when the patience of others failed, it was always his constant good humor that saved the day. He invariably saw the larger aspects of a question and he combined with this a marvelous skill in working out the details necessary to give form and substance to any worthy dream.

He was sane and practical, with abounding common sense, just in judgement, catholic in spirit, with a warm heart and a clear, well-balanced mind. He was just the leader Congregationalism needed to direct it in the paths of closer fellowship and more effective co-operation. The office he came to seven years ago was new, new to him and to the denomination. With sympathetic understanding of the spirit of the churches and with equally keen sight into the essentials of effective organization, he has fashioned the office into an agency of immense service to the denomination and his leadership has been welcomed everywhere. These seven years will undoubtedly stand out as about the most important in the history of organized Congregationalism, and to Dr. Herring, more than to any other, belongs the praise.

From American Board Secretary

Now that Dr. Herring is gone and we have his life before us as a completed whole, I think of him as a demonstration of the living Christ. I mean in his personal character. There is no accounting for the man apart from the indwelling and the outworking spirit of Jesus. He could say with Paul, and did say in a score of ways, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." He had his own superb personality but that was not all, or most. It was the domination of Christ in the man's soul which made him what he was. Knowing him as some of us did, we knew much of Christ. We had a visible, tangible evidence of Christ's power to shape character and use it for his own ends. Such lives are the supreme evidence of Christianity. I could give considerable detail in support of this characterization of our national secretary, but I doubt if it is necessary; he was known and read of so many among us and there was such unanimity of judgment.

The time will come when we must speak of all his qualities and of his noble service for the Congregational fellowship, but just now I have it in my heart to say this one thing. We loved him and honored him primarily because he was a great Christian. He had the mind and heart of Christ.

From the Extension Boards Secretary

I think of Dr. Hubert C. Herring as a big man; big in body, big in mind, big in heart, big in soul.

My most intimate contacts with Dr. Herring were in personal and executive conference. Naturally, therefore, I single out two aspects of his bigness; he was a big brother to his associates, and he was a great executive.

As his successor in the secretaryship of the Home Missionary Society I had many occasions to know how helpful he could be in a relationship which with some men could easily have meant serious embarrassment. This same spirit of unobtrusive helpfulness was evident in his relations with all his associates.

As an executive Dr. Herring excelled because of his well balanced judgment and his unusual facility in written and spoken expression. In conference over difficult matters he would listen long and intently while his brethren talked, then he would ask the floor and sum up the whole subject pro and con, call attention to the exact issues involved, submit a clear case for decision and offer his own opinion without embarrassing any in maintaining a different judgment.

Naturally the large circle of committee men and executives of the denomination cannot but feel bewildered as they face the future with its baffling issues under the sudden realization that it must be without the counsel of this trusted adviser and leader.

From the Pilgrim Memorial Fund Chairman

The overwhelming sense of personal bereavement which fills my heart serves to interpret in a measure the unspeakable loss to our fellowship. Ever since we called him fifteen years ago to be the leader of the reorganized Home Missionary Society I have loved him beyond words as a friend and have rejoiced in the privilege of the revelation of the nobility of his character seen at close hand.

In the mental rough and tumble of intense discussions on vital problems brought to our commissions, where no man reserved anything in voicing his convictions and in the unconscious self-revelation of personal companionship at home and abroad he always commanded the warmest affection for the greatness of his soul and unreserved admiration for his comprehensive Christian statesmanship.

Noble in physical presence, the sweep of his public utterances spoke of wide horizons. He lived on the heights. His prayers took hold on the Eternal. An uncompromising scorn of cant and sham and pride of place was balanced by a deep love of humanity, a wealth of tenderness and a boyish playfulness which welled up from the fountain of perpetual youth ever flowing in his heart.

Apostle of the freedom and democracy of the Pilgrim heritage, challenging us to the larger endeavors which his vision made imperative, counting it all joy to spend himself without stint for us, our beloved Greatheart suddenly passes from our earthly vision in the splendid fullness of his powers. We thank God for him as a fresh incarnation of the spirit of the Master, and we honor his memory by pressing on to the conquests of the Kingdom for which he inspired us.

Power with persons is the outstanding and blessed characteristic of Hubert C. Herring. The men who possess this wonderful ability are of necessity rare. Most of them exercise this power in the manner which we call "dominating," and which easily becomes domineering. But there is another kind.

Jesus has power with persons, based upon a profoundly different principle of life. He took the basin and the towel. The finest of his followers have emulated him. Thus Dr. Herring.

Many men have gladly felt the sway of the power of his personality. They have wondered at it while they have delighted to be influenced by it.

There is no hidden secret in this great ability. We all saw its sources, and he was a rare man, who living and working beside our inspiring leader did not both consciously and unconsciously emulate him in this fundamental of life.

He bore the interest of men in his heart. He prayed for them. A typical instance was when a brilliant but uncertain minister was called to a church of vast importance and equal difficulty. Dr. Herring gathered a dozen of us together to ask us to pray daily for this brother and the distant church.

Men believe in him, men love him, but best of all, we have eagerly followed him as he followed Christ.

A Colored Leader's Tribute

The Congregational fraternity in Greater New York was greatly shocked and saddened by the announcement of the tragic death of Dr. Herring. His office had become a sort of Mecca for Congregationalists from all over the country and the world, and we had seen him in vigor and strength only a few days ago. His work for the denomination was monumental and will be historic. He will be missed by the entire fraternity, but I wish to tell how deeply grieved we colored Congregationalists feel over his departure. He was always so just and fair, so broad-minded and sympathetic, withal so fatherly, that we shall miss him sorely. Truly, a great man has fallen in Israel.

As I have gathered up the memories from years of comradeship with Hubert C. Herring he appears to me first as a man of real, deep and vital Christian faith. He was a great Christian. His Master was a reality and all joyous, satisfying life was found in service to the great Cause. I always felt in his presence that it was normal and good to be a Christian, whether we were on vacation together in New England or sitting in earnest conference concerning a practical program of Christian work. Out of this rich, living religion grew his brotherly sympathy for his comrades in Christian service in every denomination. He was unspoiled by the honors that came to him; official position never separated him from the minister in the smallest church or the remotest problem of a congregation. And what a pleasure it was to take refuge in the bigness of his accurate judgments. Before he had thought a problem through he readily admitted that he did not know what to do; but he took counsel widely and kindly and then with precision and breadth of view decided his question. His mature judgments never were delivered ex cathedra; but we rejoiced in following them.

I said good-bye to him so short a time ago, after we had looked at the Rembrandts in the Metropolitan Museum in New York, with the mutual expectation that we should meet again soon at Lake Sunapee. I like to think as I write these words that he looks today upon all beauty in comradeship with the Master he served and that sometime, as we hoped then, we shall walk and work, live and love together.

From a Layman Leader

"Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?" Dr. Hubert C. Herring was a great leader, a skillful organizer, a wise counsellor, an able executive, an inspiring preacher, a man of keen vision and a devoted friend. His passing away at the height of his usefulness is a great loss to the denomination and to the cause of righteousness in the world.

From Home Missionary Secretary

Dr. Herring was like a father to me. He took me from a happy pastorate and gave me a commission to the churches of Colorado, making me feel that it was God's will that I use my knowledge of the West in a larger way than was possible if I remained in one place. How we used to welcome the visits he made as Secretary of the Home Missionary Society. He came several times to my church in Cheyenne and always left new courage and renewed hope in the heart of minister and people. And I have heard him preach in a little church in the mountains where his head almost touched the ceiling and the light of the smoky lamp served but to reveal the dark corners of the room. But to a handful of people his address was given with the same grace and charm and power as those masterful addresses at the National Council.

He was a great friend. Home missionaries knew him and loved him. He did not spare himself when it came to the frontier. I have ridden at top speed with him in an automobile going inland to visit a little church many miles from the railroad, and we have dragged through mud and snow all day long in an old-fashioned stage. He made light of cold and weariness and proved to the people of mountains and plains that he was a good soldier. His good cheer was unfailing. His humor irresistible and his spiritual power permeated all he did or said.

How we shall miss his good fellowship. Those informal lunches when he so freely gave of his best, or those chance meetings on the train! The day was always brighter because we had seen him. The office force all liked him and worked hard and willingly for him. Dr. Herring knew the joys of simple pleasures. A basket of grapes and a few friends made a picnic. He knew how to relax and he knew how to laugh and in his way he knew how to play. A few visits to the Metropolitan Art Museum in Central Park with him as guide opened a new world to me. Just a few weeks ago I saw him in a Saturday noon subway jam. He was swept in at one door and I at another. He towered head and shoulders above the swaying crowd. I shall never forget the queer little smile that played on his face as we were swept out of the car at Grand Central Station. "Oh, the people," he said, "the people! overworked, underfed, herded like cattle in this great city. How can they survive it all!" What visions he had of a new and better day. He believed in and worked for peace on earth and good will among men.

Because he was so human we loved him. Because he was so wise and so true we honored him. When he was around we felt that everything was all right.

From Another Layman Co-Worker

Association with Dr. Herring in committee work the past five years has been one of the most inspiring experiences in my life. Repeatedly, on returning from an all-day conference, in which he was easily the leader, I have told those at home of my admiration of his ability and of my indebtedness for his splendid example. It is a satisfaction to me to recall that more than once I also told him of my pleasure and inspiration in working with him, and I wish now to say deliberately, with no mental reservations and without exaggeration, in loving remembrance of him, that he had patience and persistence, tolerance and decision, an equal grasp of principles and of details, and what is needed now as never before, optimism, all of which made him a power among men, and that with his ruggedness Dr. Herring had a gentleness and serenity of nature that comes only with the indwelling of the spirit of Christ.

Dr. Herring's Career

Hubert Clinton Herring was born on a Wisconsin farm, in Lowville, Oct. 30, 1859. His father, Silas W. Herring, was a pioneer farmer. His mother, Polly M., shared the rigors of sod house and frontier life. Two sons were born, Hubert and Carl. Carl Herring is now a lawyer of Omaha, Neb.

The education of Hubert C. Herring is a record of country school, frontier academy, University of Wisconsin, University of Chicago, McCormick Theological Seminary and Princeton Seminary. In 1887 he was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry. On Oct. 4, 1887, he was married to Mary Woodbridge of Chicago, daughter of a lawyer prominent in the development of the city of Chicago.

There are five children: Hubert C., Jr., is pastor of the United Congregational Church of Wichita, Kan.; John Woodbridge is pastor of the First Congregational Church, Terre Haute, Ind., and Elizabeth Butler holds an executive position with the National Board of the Y. W. C. A. Mary Woodbridge is completing her studies in England; Virginia de Forest is a student in Barnard College. There are four grandchildren.

Dr. Herring started his ministry in the Presbyterian Church, serving in Sioux City, Io., from 1887 to 1890, at Winterset, Io., from 1890 to 1894, and at Chicago, in the Hyde Park Presbyterian Church from 1894 to 1898. In 1898 he accepted the call to the pastorate of the First Congregational Church of Omaha, Neb., where he served until 1907. This pastorate was marked by unique growth and service.

In 1907 at the urgent call of the National Home Missionary Society he accepted the newly created office of General Secretary. He served in this position until 1913. These were years of reorganization both denominationally and interdenominationally. He had a leading share in the organization and development of the Home Missions Council and the Federal Council of Churches.

In 1913 he was called to be the first general secretary of the National Council under the new organization. During these years he represented the denomination in its relations to other denominations, including the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, the Home Missions Council and the Interchurch World Movement and the movement for organic unity started by the Presbyterians, and he found great joy in the service. His death comes at the zenith of his powers. His soul passed on to the Father who gave it, Friday, Aug. 6, 1920.

The Funeral of Dr. Herring

A considerable number of Congregational leaders and personal friends, hurriedly called from widely scattered vacation places, attended the funeral of Dr. Hubert C. Herring at the First Congregational Church in Cambridge, Mass., the afternoon of Aug. 10. During the years that Dr. Herring's office was in Boston he was a member of that church. The service was conducted by the pastor of the church, Dr. Raymond Calkins. The Scripture reading was by Dr. Charles S. Mills of Montclair, N. J. Three hymns were sung by the congregation—"O God, our help in ages past," "O love that wilt not let me go," and "For all the saints who from their labors rest."

Brief addresses in appreciation of Dr. Herring were given by Dr. Calkins, Pres. Henry Churchill King of Oberlin, the moderator of the National Council, Dr. Charles F. Carter of Hartford, chairman of the National Council Executive Committee, and Dr. Mills. Dr. Calkins's words are given among the tributes that appear elsewhere in this issue, and the sentiments of the other speakers also are indicated in the tributes from them which we publish. Dr. King spoke especially of Dr. Herring's great service to the denomination in his constructive leadership during the recent period of reorganization. Dr. Carter spoke of the serious loss in this accidental death and characterized Dr. Herring as a "Kingdom builder—a master builder." Dr. Mills referred feelingly to Dr. Herring as a friend, as did the other speakers and joined them in emphasizing the deep spiritual faith and consecrated Christian life of the man out of which were developed his friendliness, broad sympathies, tact, magnanimity, executive ability and powers of leadership. He said Dr. Herring was "a major prophet of the day he saw on the far horizon."

The pall-bearers were Dr. C. S. Patton and Dr. W. E. Strong of the American Board, Dr. Frank L. Moore of the Home Missionary Society, New York, Rev. C. C. Merrill of Burlington, Vt., Herbert J. Brown of Portland, Me., Albert M. Lyon of Newtonville, Mass., W. E. Lougee of New York and H. W. Darling of Wichita, Kan.

A profusion of flowers symbolized the love and respect of a host of friends and comrades in service.

The body was placed in the receiving tomb at Mt. Auburn Cemetery, and it will be decided later where the final resting place will be.

Candidates on the League

From Senator Harding

My dear Dr. King:

I trust you will understand the conditions of stress here which have prevented an earlier acknowledgment of your letter of July 13th inclosing copy of resolutions adopted at a meeting of the American delegates to the International Congregational Council.

In the meantime I presume you have seen the speech of acceptance made by me in response to the Notification Committee on July 22d, in which I discussed briefly the League of Nations and our international relations with respect to maintenance of world peace.

You have also, I presume, read the platform declaration of the Republican party upon this matter, to which I have subscribed as the standard bearer of the party.

I yield to no one in my earnest desire for peace and concord among all the peoples of the world. I yield to no one in my desire that America shall do her full part, and more than that, in promoting fraternity and good will among the nations.

I cannot, however, believe that the League of Nations, so-called, as autocratically demanded by President Wilson, would accomplish your desires or mine, while I do believe that our entrance into the League would mark a surrender of our national freedom and involve us disastrously in the quarrels of the old world.

I have not time to discuss this at length at present and I refer you to my published utterances upon this subject.

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) W. G. HARDING.

From Mr. Roosevelt

The following letter from Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy and candidate for the Vice-Presidency, came to Pres. Henry Churchill King of Oberlin, Moderator of the National Council, in response to the official inquiry from the Committee appointed by the American Delegates at the International Congregational Council:

My dear Mr. King:

I have found your letter of July 13 on my return to Washington. I note the resolution adopted by the American delegates to the Fourth Decennial International Congregational Council asking whether—

"If elected I will make every effort in conjunction with the Senate to have the United States enter the League of Nations, in order that America may assume its full share of the responsibility of promoting international justice and preserving international peace.

"This resolution is not intended to preclude the adoption of such interpretative reservations as may be deemed essential to safeguard the life and independence of America without nullifying our loyal adherence to the objective of the League."

Please allow me to give you my definite and direct answer. I subscribe to the above statement.

Further elaboration by me is probably not necessary. I am in favor of the United States entering the League of Nations. I do not believe that to do so need in any way endanger our institutions or our constitution. I believe it is for the best interest of civilization that we take our part.

Very sincerely yours,

(Signed) FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Isles of Shoals Conference

By Our Own Correspondent

The Fifth Annual Congregational Summer Conference at the Isles of Shoals opened on Monday, Aug. 2, with a goodly representation of the attendants of former years, and a group of new attendants. The Reception and Reunion and Welcome Back, which, according to the official program, was scheduled to follow the opening address of the first evening, began at the dock in Portsmouth and continued upon the boat that, plying twice daily between island and mainland, links the Conference with the shore.

The Unitarian Conference had occupied the month of July, and had completed its interesting and enjoyable session and departed before the first Congregationalists arrived, leaving the hotel and assembly room and the little old stone church all ready for occupancy. Preliminary arrangements had been made by Rev. E. Victor Bigelow, of Andover, First Vice-President, to whom great credit is due for the success of the Conference, and Rev. John Ried, of Franklin, who as Secretary-Treasurer, bore the special responsibilities of finance and of the program. The loving labors of these two men wrought their fruition in a carefully planned program, and a well-managed hotel where comfort without luxury was furnished at a moderate price during the three weeks of the Conference.

The opening address was by the President, Dr. William E. Barton, of Oak Park, the oldest Star-Islander among the Congregationalists. Dr. Barton later gave an address on "Cotton Mather" and a Biblical interpretation called "The Gospel According to Andrew."

The morning Bible Hour during the first week was under charge of Prof. Ruter W. Springer, of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa. His general theme was "What Is a Christian?" His answer was found in a reverent study of the Lord's Supper, and of the discourse in the Upper Room as recorded in the Fourth Gospel. The studies were thoughtful, earnest, and deeply spiritual.

The eleven o'clock hour was given to a varied series of addresses. A very suggestive paper was presented by Rev. Herbert C. Ide of Redlands, Cal., entitled "Padre and Pilgrim: a California Study." Very thoughtfully he traced the history of the California Missions, with their fascinating development and the spiritual earnestness of their founders, and their sad decline and melancholy ruins, in contrast with the equally earnest and more permanent work of the Pilgrim and the Puritan.

Another delightful and suggestive address was that by Rev. Morris H. Turk, of Kansas City, on "Our Next Thought of Christ." He set forth that as the thought of the last half of the nineteenth century had established in the thought of the Church at once the immanence and Universal Fatherhood of God, so out of the present chaos must emerge a nearer, more intimate and more inclusive faith in Christ as elder brother dominating the social and industrial relations of men.

The most interesting feature of the evenings of the first week was a series of three addresses by Mr. and Mrs. Franklin Warner, of White Plains, N. Y., based upon their tours in Japan and China, India and Ceylon, and our own Southwest. These unique addresses, as direct and simple as they were interesting and valuable, were illustrated with lantern-slides, with autocrome views in natural color, and with moving pictures. They were heard with keen enjoyment and with the heartiest appreciation.

The Morning Watch service, held in the old stone church at 7.30 each day, brought out a goodly number of reverent people. These services in the first week were led by Rev. John Ried, of Franklin, Mass., Mr. C. W. M. Blanchard, of West Medford, Rev. E. Victor Bigelow, of Andover; Mrs. Henry F. Smith, of West Medford; Prof. R. W. Springer, of Carlisle, Pa.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

If you are offended at seeing sinners at church, while you yourself are righteous, reflect that they are the poor devils that the church is for, while you are to be classed as a patron.

The most unique service of Star Island is the Candlelight service, held in the little old church each night at the close of the evening program. This service has been often described, but always bears a new description.

As the congregation emerges from the Assembly Room, about nine o'clock, each person is furnished a lighted candle and starts up the winding path that leads up the rocky hill upon whose summit stands the little old stone church, once the center of life and worship of the now vanished town of Gosport. No other lights are within than the candles carried by the worshipers and hung to cross-shaped brackets along the walls. The worshipers step down two steps to the brick-paved floor, and reverently take their places in the old pews where once sat the fisher-folk of the islands. The service, about fifteen minutes in length, is one of great beauty and fine dignity; at its close the congregation departs; the candles are seen winding their way down the hill to the hotel, and only the stars light the little old church, whose original building, before this stone structure that dates from 1800, was built out of the timbers of a Spanish wreck. It is a tradition of this service that the approach and the recession to the hotel shall be in silence. Not a word is spoken as the procession moves up the hill and back again to the hotel.

Those who led this service in the first week were: Rev. William E. Barton, Rev. E. Victor Bigelow, Rev. Arthur W. Bailey, Rev. Hubert C. Herring, Jr., Rev. Herbert C. Ide.

The social and literary phases of life upon the island are a notable feature. The broad veranda was utilized for shuffle-board and other deck games; a new croquet set found its fitting place upon the hotel lawn; the tennis court was the scene of brave exploits and hard-won contests. But the bathing, fishing and exploring by land and sea, and the evening socials and entertainments afforded fine fellowship and delight. One happy evening was furnished by the hotel help: the waiters giving a concert, and the head waiter, a professional entertainer, displaying rare skill and provoking great mirth.

Celia Thaxter made these islands immortal in literature. She and her parents and her brother Cedric lie buried on Appledore, her grave and now neglected garden affording a shrine for the occasional tourist of literary bent. There are graveyards and pirates' hoards, and a few friendly ghosts upon the islands. The sole survivor of the Laighton family, of which Mrs. Thaxter was the most noted representative who still retains connection with the islands, is her brother, Oscar Laighton, who is also a poet, and who conveys small parties around the islands in his motor boat. "Uncle Oscar," venerable, kindly, poetic, serves in most interesting manner to link the Isles of Shoals of today with the literary charm of past generations.

Sentiment on the League

Dear Mr. Editor:

I wish heartily to commend in every respect the editorial attitude of The Congregationalist in regard to the "League of Nations," especially as set forth in the issue of Aug. 5.

John H. Temple.

Framingham, Mass.

Dear Mr. Editor:

You ask those who indorse the action taken at the International Council to write you, so I do. It is a disappointment to have the Johnsonian tail wag the Republican dog. I speak as a lifelong Republican. I always believed in certain reservations, believe in them now, and should be glad to see the Versailles treaty adopted if need be with all the Lodge reservations. But it is no way to end a war, fought jointly, by a separate peace by act of Congress.

Around me most of the Democrats, being "Sein Feiners" or "New Republicans," are against the League. But let us take warning by Willis John Abbot's story of how Hoover was eliminated, and not so pledge ourselves that our wishes receive no attention. The highest Americanism is to see that America plays the game through loyal to her Allies, and to poor Poland and distracted Turkey.

Alfred C. Lane.

North Cambridge, Mass.

Dear Mr. Editor:

I want to thank you for your first editorial in the issue of Aug. 5, "The Supreme Issue." You express almost precisely my opinion. I think it is to be this league or no league, that our duty and even our safety lies in it, not outside.

I hope you will hammer away all summer on this line, and all winter if necessary.

E. R. Gordon.

Greensboro, Vt.

Dear Mr. Editor:

I am writing to tell you of my appreciation of the attitude of The Congregationalist on the great question of the League of Nations. The issue of the League is, as was said in your article, Aug. 5, the chief one before the country, and unless we join the League we shall have thrown away all the moral value of our entrance into the war, and have lost our position of influence in the counsels of the world. Selfishness instead of altruism will be the acknowledged motive of our national life.

John K. Lord.

Wonalancet, N. H.

Dear Mr. Editor:

Allow me to thank you for your strong editorial on the League of Nations in the issue of Aug. 5. It is indeed "the Supreme Issue," and now that one of the candidates for President has clearly and emphatically given it that place in his speech of acceptance, the country is pretty sure to be cleared from its bewilderment and restored to the sense of national obligation with which we entered the war, and there is ground for hope that in good time we shall be delivered from our anonymous and unconscionable position. You cannot do better than follow up your editorial with frequent quotations from Mr. Taft's recent utterances. It is difficult to deceive even most of the people "all the time."

DR. DAVIS' BIBLE CLASS

Beginnings of Solomon's Reign

International Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 29. 1 Kings 3: 4-15.

1. The Great Sacrifice at Gibeon. Our ideas of the kind of worship that is worthy of God are so different from those which sent Solomon to the great heathen shrine at Gibeon to sacrifice a thousand animals and burn their bodies in honor of Jehovah! Yet the essential purpose is the same whether it be expressed in the bleeding throats of innocent animals or in the true devotion of spirit which Jesus taught as the only worship that God is pleased with. Solomon was laying the foundations of his reign in religious loyalty. Is this the right principle for the development of a state? In what way and to what extent may America be made religious?

2. Solomon's Choice. This is one of the famous decisions of all history. In the first place it is clear that a young ruler faced with the possibility of obtaining his heart's desire might have asked for any number of gifts. Name as many of these as would seem natural under the circumstances. One thinks of wealth and long life and power and fame among the list of gifts desirable in the mind of youth.

Note the fact that Solomon starts his choice with the expression of gratitude to God for all the love and goodness that was shown to David and especially for the succession to the throne. So he starts right. He is thankful to God for the purpose that has been over him in all his life.

Then he asks for what he most desires. It is for the gift of practical wisdom in order that he may be a true and just ruler to his people. This is the second admirable quality that appears in Solomon. He is sensitive to his responsibility for the welfare of the people. There is as much humility in his heart as he faces his work as there was gratitude in his spirit as he faced the full meaning of the past. This is what assures us of his worthiness to receive the gift of God. He is not boastful or proud of his position and power. He thinks of himself as a little child needing wisdom for the great responsibilities that he must discharge. How necessary is this quality in a leader now?

Study the quality of the wisdom that Solomon chose as his supreme gift from God. It is not mere intellectual knowledge. That might have been easily gained in the schools from the master teachers. The wisdom that is described here is that practical discernment between right and wrong, between true and false, that marks the real wise man. For it is quite possible to be furnished with all the learning of the ages and still to lack this kind of insight that Solomon chose. Indeed, to be the master of scientific or literary knowledge is not necessarily to be wise. There is another kind of wisdom which is vital and essential. It is that power which enables one to get quickly and accurately at the truth in any situation or case and then to make wise and right decisions in view of what is seen to be the truth. There is no way in which accurately to estimate the worth of this practical insight and vision. It was the gift of God to Solomon; it is a divine gift to the modern leader.

One thinks instinctively of Jer. 9: 23.

> Thus saith Jehovah, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he hath understanding, and knoweth me, that I am Jehovah who exerciseth lovingkindness, justice, and righteousness in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith Jehovah.

3. God's Gift to the King. The answer of God to the king's choice was an immediate decision in his favor. But that was not all. He had asked for wisdom to rule justly; he received it; but also he was given the riches and honor for which he might naturally have been expected to ask.

Is this true to experience? We remember that Jesus said that those who sought the Kingdom of God first of all should also have added to them the other and lesser goods that the average man is generally so eager to gain. And does it not turn out so practically in our human experience? The best way in which to gain the superficial and material blessings is not to seek them first of all, but rather to seek the will and the goodness of God. The other blessings follow in the train of these highest of all aims.

But notice the condition on which it was all based. Study v. 14 for the basis of the promise. Obedience to the laws of God is the only warrant for expecting the permanence of the blessing of God. This condition never has been changed. It is as valid today as it was when Solomon had his vision at Gibeon. There is no caprice about the favor of the heavenly Father. Obedience is still the test of love and of the blessings that flow in its train. How does this principle indicate safe rules of action for us as individuals and for us as a nation?

From Aleppo to Cairo

This was a thrilling incident of reconstruction experiences. Four Near East relief workers—Miss Mary Holmes, a veteran missionary recently at Urfa, Miss Elaine van Dyke of Princeton, daughter of Dr. Henry van Dyke, Lt. Lucius Thayer, son of Dr. Lucius Thayer of Portsmouth, N. H., and Lt. C. F. Weeden, Jr., son of Dr. Weeden of Newton, made up the quartette off for a bit of rest after exacting duties in Mesopotamia.

They were told at Aleppo that it was a hazardous trip, that the train had been held up and robbed every night save one for two weeks. But with the adventurous spirit of youth and armed with the American consul's authority and Turkish passports they boarded their train. The French and Arab forces were skirmishing around them. Camp fires and trooping men were in ominous evidence. Sure enough, their train was stopped. They were told the track was torn up ahead of them (a lie) and the Arabs invaded the car, throttled the French gendarme and guard, wrestled away his gun and were determined to hurry him out of the car for a throat-cutting. Miss Holmes's knowledge of Arabic and her pluck were invaluable. She talked vigorously to the Arabs and saved the situation for the undisciplined tribesmen who claimed the whole party were French. A more respectable Arab general appeared and allowed the train to go on. But it was only to pass through a hail of bullets as the Arabs "shot up" the train. The young men barricaded the car windows with trunks and finally after various other boardings and challengings and courageous, insistent defense by Miss Holmes the Americans somehow got through. Before they reached their destination they were stranded for eighteen hours in the desert without food or water because of a dinky and balky engine.

Mr. Weeden and another Near East relief worker, Lt. Gardner Means, son of the late Rev. F. H. Means of Boston, who has been at Harpoot, and who has served at Urfa, have just arrived in America on the Imperator. Lieutenant Thayer, who had been stationed at Konia, is also back, having completed a round-the-world trip via India, China, Japan and San Francisco. We heartily welcome home, with many others, these undaunted workers who have "carried on" in the spirit of true American courage and idealism. C. F. W.

Miss Slattery's Long Tour

Miss Margaret Slattery, whose new book, "The Highway to Leadership," is announced for fall publication, sailed from Vancouver, July 24, for a seven months' trip around the world. Her first destination is China, where she will speak at the World's Sunday School Convention in Tokio in October. She plans also to speak at Kuling, China, soon after her arrival, to the mission workers in that vicinity; and it is probable that she will make many similar engagements to talk at post-convention meetings in China and Japan and at various mission stations along her way. After leaving China and Japan she will go to India, Malaysia, Egypt and Palestine, returning by way of Paris and England next spring. From the various countries which she visits she will write a series of letters to young people, and in other ways share with her host of friends in this country the pleasure and profit of her experiences.

Object for Intercession

For Shut-In People:

Give, we beseech thee, O God who takest thought for our infirmities, faith and strength and patience to all those who by reason of illness or disability are kept from the open ways of life. In their retirement and their limitations give them upholding and consoling thoughts and make a way for them to happy life. We thank thee for all serviceable love and compassion. Remember those who care for the infirm and helpless and give them their reward in their companionship of work with thee. And teach us all lessons of sympathy—sympathy wth those who suffer and with those who are in anywise withdrawn from the activities and enjoyments of common life. In the name of Christ. Amen.—R.

A Better Smell in the Streets

Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, says that opposition among organized workers to prohibition has largely disappeared. Most industrial communities show large increases in savings accounts and betterment in the living conditions of workingmen's families. Hospitals and refuges everywhere report the almost total disappearance of the "hospital bum" and the "down and outer." Every business location in El Paso formerly occupied by a saloon is now occupied by a decent and thriving business paying as good rent or better. The streets smell better and are safer for women than they used to be. Who wants the joints back?—El Paso Herald.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

Helping the Man Who is Down

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Aug. 22-28

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Passage. Matt. 9: 9-13; Gal. 6: 1-2.

The Unforgiving Spirit. Popular dislike founded on prejudice is a cruel thing. The fate of the Jews who were driven out of Spain to be limited and persecuted in Poland and Russia is an example of what it may do. Matthew the apostle, who wrote what Renan calls the most valuable book that ever was published, belonged to such a proscribed class. He was a tax gatherer in Roman employ, and therefore in the Jewish view a traitor. Jesus would not fall in with this popular dislike. His patriotism was not built that way. He recognized the qualities of Matthew and called him into his own service. One would like to know his history and how he came to possess these high qualities which Jesus recognized as fitting him to be one of his witnesses. These publicans and outcasts recognized the hospitality of Christ's mind and thronged about him. Paul found in the church of the Galatians a hard and unforgiving spirit toward those who had slipped and failed, and in the spirit of Christ's parable of the Prodigal Son he rebuked it. There was to be a way back and an open door for all who had wandered. To Christ the spirit of the Salvation Army goes back in its saying that "A man may be down, but he is never out."

Christ and the Outcasts. If we live in the spirit of Christ, therefore, one of our responsibilities is toward all those who seem to be down and out. Not condescendingly nor with patronage, for we are all sinners together and pride is the worst of sins, but in following after that insight of Christ which discerned the possibilities of repentance and return in the worst prodigals, we owe the word spoken and the hand held out. It is easy to see the bad in a man, to dismiss the thoughtless as confirmed in folly and the criminals as without hope. But that is not the way Christ thinks of them. We are long past the time, in America at least, when men thought of our prisons as mere places where evil is cooped up to fester and rot. But the church of Christ whom the social outcasts of Palestine called their friend ought to remember its duties and make the prisons reformatories indeed, not in mere sentiment, but by an intelligent endeavor to save and help.

The Upreach and Downreach of Christianity. Just in proportion as the church lives on the high levels of its experience with God is it equipped to reach down for sympathetic understanding and assistance to those who are mired in the marsh of sin. It was the sinless man who made friends successfully with publicans and sinners. It would do us all good if we could read the just-published biography of William and Catharine Booth and see how they came to found the Salvation Army. "Faith without works is dead." The simplest and sincerest and loftiest Christian faith has always been an incentive to kindly helpfulness. If it is not so with us, we are somehow off the track of faith.

HOLY MEMORIES

I will meditate also upon all thy work, and muse on thy doings. Ps. 77: 12.

Heaven be praised for our holy memories. They help us to enjoy God's goodness twice over.—William Pierce.

All the blessings we receive from God, especially such as concern this life, lose their true taste and relish without praise.—William Sherlock.

But when once we feel the love of God in our hearts, then it is sweet to pray and to praise. Then we love the company of God's people, and love the quiet of the approaching night, when we find our refuge in sweet, holy communion with our Heavenly Father. We learn to love Him because He loves us.—Edward Judson.

When all thy mercies, O my God,
My rising soul surveys;
Transported with the view, I'm lost
In wonder, love and praise.

O how shall words with equal warmth
The gratitude declare
That glows within my ravished heart!
But thou canst read it there.

Unnumber'd comforts to my soul
Thy tender care bestow'd,
Before my infant heart conceived
From whom those comforts flow'd.

Ten thousand thousand precious gifts
My daily thanks employ;
Nor is the least a cheerful heart
That tastes those gifts with joy.

—Joseph Addison. Abr.

We sometimes pass into strangely new experiences with an unillumined mind, and then some forgotten word of the Lord leaps into recognition and we know his will. The recovered word may make us sad. "Peter remembered the word of the Lord," and he went out and wept bitterly. Or the remembered word may make us glad and exuberant. There are revived remembrances recorded in the Acts of the Apostles which filled those persecuted heralds with ecstatic joy. And so it is in the lives of all the followers of the Lord. The Holy Spirit ministers to the faulty remembrance, and in the recovery of forgotten words we find our warnings and consolations.—J. H. Jowett.

We thank thee, our Father, for the times when in emotion and experience we have come close to thee and for all the lessons of good we have learned by the teaching of thy Holy Spirit. Enable us to set these holy memories as the high mark of our past days and the incentive to continual gratitude and obedience. And deny not thyself to our desires of more intimate communion, that the treasures of our recollection may be continually increased and our hearts made strong for all that awaits us, both here and in the new experience where we shall find ourselves more intimately and visibly of the flock of Christ. In his name. Amen.

Immigrant Contributions

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Aug. 29 — Sept. 4

BY REV. HENRY M. BOWDEN

Topic: What Contributions Have Our Immigrants Brought to America? I Cor. 12: 12-18, 27-30.

Early Immigrants. When one thinks of American origins one thinks of immigrants. At the time of the adoption of the constitution the one hundred per cent. of Americanism was made up largely of foreign born folk, British, French, German, Dutch, Slavic, African. Specially prominent in revolutionary and post revolutionary days were the Frenchman, Marquis Lafayette; the Pole, Thaddeus Kosciuszko, who planned the defenses of Ticonderoga and West Point; and the West Indian Scotchman, Alexander Hamilton.

Immigrants of the Middle Period. Political pressure and economic disaster in Europe in the first half of the nineteenth century induced a wave of migration, Polish, Hungarian, Irish, and German. Many of the newcomers encountered grave difficulties and severe hardships. The political immigration especially gave us prominent and able men; among others, General Meagher, commander of the "Irish Brigade" in the Civil War, and Karl Schurz, one of many who left Germany because of the political reaction.

Later Immigration. The development of manufacturing interests during and following the Civil War overtaxed the supply of native labor. This demand called many people from the poorer countries of Europe, and the great modern movement came to surpass anything hitherto known.

This modern movement has brought us most of the common labor for our largest industries. Chinese labor built our first transcontinental railroad; Italian and Mexican labor guards these roads today. Slovaks and Hungarians keep the steel mills running. Italians and Slavs constructed the New York acqueduct.

The Great Contribution. Immigration has given us a very large part of our population; and the largest asset of any community is its people. If any one is interested to forecast the future of New York or Chicago, let him ascertain where the children are who are to be the leaders in the coming days. They are in the foreign districts. Here we find the hope and the fear of the future.

Prayer

From pride of place, from narrow sympathies, from false ideals, save us, O Lord, to a vision of Thy Kingdom which shall fill the earth. Amen.

Searching Words from a Fallen Leader

Dr. Herring's Recent Message to Congregationalists

EDITORS' NOTE.—If anyone would get the range of Dr. Herring's thought and sympathies let him read in the National Council Minutes his address at the meeting of the Council in Grand Rapids last autumn. We give herewith typical passages.

I do not need to tell you that I believe in organization. Otherwise I should not have accepted the tasks which have fallen to my lot the past thirteen years. Dry and irksome as the duties of an ecclesiastical official often are, they form an essential part of the foundation upon which must be built the City of God. No man need feel that in discharging these duties he is forbidden to make full use of his powers. Though he be a hewer of wood and a drawer of water, he is yet working in fundamental ways for the conserving and perpetuating of the spiritual assets of humanity.

On the other hand I do not need to tell you that I hold some things to be more important than organization. Offices and officials, commissions and committees, budgets and audits, conferences and councils, programs and campaigns, are as the dry leaves which litter the roadside these October days unless in them there dwell the forces of life. The Church of Christ has often had occasion and now has occasion to mourn the disproportion between structure and spirit. Her plant is greater than her power. Her program tarries for want of dynamic.

I begin with certain convictions which I suppose I hold in common with substantially all our Congregational fellowship.

First of all is the conviction that the last five years have freshly demonstrated that the Gospel of Christ and nothing but the Gospel of Christ can meet and master the problems of man and of men. I use the word "Gospel" in no vague and poetic sense. I mean the Good News that humanity bears the stamp of divinity, that the Infinite God loves the world he has made and the he has revealed his love by one supreme and central manifestation of himself in Christ Jesus, our Lord, Son of God and Son of Man. The fierce war years behind us have revealed the inadequacy of all faiths, philosophies, civilizations, cultures—save one. The universal Republic of God, whose capital is a cross-crowned hill, whose law is the spirit of the child, whose industry is the service of the race, whose prizes are joy and peace, and whose hopes stretch past the black shadows of age and the grave—that Republic stands untouched by the flames. The Gospel of Christ by which that Republic was created and by which it is to be brought to its destined goal is our one answer to the questions with which the hour is filled.

* * * * * * *

I pass to a second certainty. It is that so far as we Congregationalists are concerned we must proclaim a Gospel of breadth. I use the phrase with no controversial bias toward any who cannot accept it. I simply seek to state what I suppose to be the unquestioned fact that Congregationalists are as a rule Broad Churchmen. Speaking then for those who accept the term, let me catalogue the compulsions it lays upon us. First of all the compulsion to give recognition to the whole range of truth. We have no option in the matter. The tyranny of conviction is upon us. We are under bonds to relate our thinking to the whole wide field.

* * * * * * *

In the next place we are under compulsion to proclaim a broad Gospel of unity. We have long known that the spirit of schism, of sectarianism, is of the devil. We have long known, or at least now know, that there is a bigotry of breadth even as there is a bigotry of narrowness. We know that those who share great fundamental convictions can work together even though sharply divided on every lesser issue. We also know—I hope—that the unity for which we pray can only come through a hard won ability to understand the value of positions other than one's own.

To such inclusive comprehension our principles commit us. If we cause divisions or fail to promote unity, it is our shame. Not thus have we learned Christ from John Robinson and Horace Bushnell, from William Hayes Ward and Washington Gladden, from Harriet Beecher Stowe and Mary Lyon.

* * * * * * *

The social Gospel saturates the Congregational air. Willing or unwilling, we are dwellers in its domain. For most of us it is a theme for rejoicing. We have come to see that there never was a more meaningless distinction than that which once was made between the individual and the social Gospel. There is only one. The sole question is whether that one Gospel shall be given its legitimate expansion until it covers, as it was meant to do, all life and life's relations. Haltingly and imperfectly, but with honest purpose, we Congregationalists are trying to do just that. No shadow of hesitation haunts our minds. We are sure of our duty. Our only anxiety is lest we fail in comprehension or sin against the law of proportion.

The Heart of Dr. Herring's Faith

The last five years have freshly demonstrated that the Gospel of Christ and nothing but the Gospel of Christ can meet and master the problems of man and of men. I use the word "Gospel" in no vague and poetic sense. I mean the Good News that humanity bears the stamp of divinity, that the Infinite God loves the world he has made and that he has revealed his love by one supreme and central manifestation of himself in Christ Jesus, our Lord, Son of God and Son of Man. The fierce war years behind us have revealed the inadequacy of all faiths, philosophies, civilizations, cultures—save one. The universal Republic of God, whose capital is a cross-crowned hill, whose law is the spirit of the child, whose industry is the service of the race, whose prizes are joy and peace, and whose hopes stretch past the black shadows of age and the grave—that Republic stands untouched by the flames. The Gospel of Christ by which that Republic was created and by which it is to be brought to its destined goal is our one answer to the questions with which the hour is filled.

A third certainty, quite as inexorable and far more searching, confronts us. It is the certainty that if we mean to bear our worthy share in Kingdom building we must find a way to make our Gospel of breadth also a Gospel of power. As to the necessity of such power, argument is superfluous. The world will not be redeemed by mild advice, acute analysis, conventional deeds. It will be redeemed by the lift of great truths greatly proclaimed, by the propulsion of potent forces generated in the depths of Spirit filled lives, by the moulding of beneficent laws and institutions at the cost of passionate advocacy, of sustained struggle, of frequent martyrdom.

We have been trying to give form and order to our common activities. We have been trying to join our minds in thinking out common practical problems. We have submitted for the consideration of our churches statements of belief and tested forms of worship. We have sought to bring it to pass that the young man entering the ministry shall find ministerial capital at hand which he may use as he will.

The process needs to go on. It cannot go on to the invasion of personal or church liberty. We do not propose that Association, Conference or Council shall become an external conscience for us. Let this Council attempt to say what any of us must think or do and it will make quick discovery of its limitations. But we are of one mind that we desire to stabilize—solidify—the structural life of our denomination. There is no virtue in formlessness. There is no sin in order. We should move ahead until we have in our firm possession the spiritual realities for which outward organization stands, with so much of accepted external form as will give genuine help in doing the work of the Kingdom.

Exploring still in search for the roadway to power, I find it in a new emphasis upon prayer. I have no manner of question that we stand here at the very center of our theme. But let me say with all clearness that I am not thinking of an appeal for prayer merely upon the ground that thus we shall acquire spiritual vitality. I am thinking of it upon the ground that, being honest believers in God revealed through Christ, there are things we ought to say to him that we are not saying; things we want to ask of him that we are not asking, offers to make to him which we are not making. I propose for our whole fellowship a new lift of the eyes toward God. There is no model on which we should all mould our prayer life. Some may use a prayer calendar, and I wish such custom might widely prevail. Some will fashion their own ritual, fitted to the twisted growth of their personal experience. Some may revive the household altar in forms adapted to our breathless age. Some may gather groups at special times for special petitions. It does not matter. The law of life is the law of variety. But it does greatly matter that we believe, from our heart of hearts, steadily, surely, unbrokenly, that God is and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him. Thus believing, we shall find the way to bring God into our lives.

A Church Leader

(Editorial in the Springfield Republican)

A great religious leader was lost to America when Dr. Hubert C. Herring was drowned at Chilmark Friday.

He has administered the duties of his position with a statesman's vision and grasp. At the same time he was a leader in interdenominational interests.

Despite his position and personal influence, Dr. Herring was never a boss. Mighty in stature and in counsel, he was of humble spirit and prophesied strongly, but dictated never. Another temptation of the position is to officialism in reports. But when Dr. Herring made a "secretary's report" there were no statistics, no office details, but a prophet's call to higher thinking and living, to a deeper spirituality and broader outlook for Christian service. He was anything but an ecclesiastical functionary, and in his untimely removal at three score years the church forces of America have lost a big-hearted human leader whom they could ill afford to lose at this time.

WITH THE CHILDREN

The Twins' Birthday Surprise

By Bertha Gerneaux Woods

"Well, if I can't have that big coach for my doll, I don't want any, so there! It'll just spoil my birthday if I can't have it. And it's only $8, too!" Claire finished stormily.

"'Only' $8! Oh, Claire," mother remonstrated, "you know we can't afford that. That other little carriage we saw at the Boston House is very pretty, and not so expensive, and I'm sure Arabella will enjoy her rides in that just as much."

"Well, I'd be ashamed to take her out in it, all the other girls have those big coaches for their dolls, and I'll just have to keep Arabella at home if she can't have one—and all the nice weather coming, too!"

"Dear me! Dear me!" murmured Great Grandmother, bending over her knitting. Had she dropped a stitch, or was she "dear-me"-ing over Claire's sulky complaints?

"Speaking of birthdays," Great Grandmother remarked, as Mother left the room to answer the telephone, "I wonder if you'd like to hear how we celebrated our birthday, my twin sister Gertrude and I—when we were about your age—away out in Minnesota?"

"Oh, yes, Grandma, I'd love it!" Claire slipped into a place beside Grandmother's in the big rocker, and gave a happy sigh.

"We were eight years old, when we went with father and mother to make a home in that new wild country. Our house was a log cabin, built by father himself, and was divided into four rooms by blankets and sheets hung up as partitions! We were very poor in those days, but my, how happy we were!"

"And your birthday?" Claire reminded her.

"Oh yes, our birthday! Back in our old Eastern home we had always had some present from the stores—perhaps a set of dishes, or dolls, but out in that new country, with no money to speak of, and few places to spend it if we'd had it, we were wondering how father and mother could celebrate the day for us.

"Well, father used to come in at night to his supper very tired, but he was always bright and jolly with us children, and for a few days before our birthday he was very mysterious. We knew from sounds behind one of those curtain partitions, that something interesting was going on—there was some pounding—and scraping—and finally an odor of fresh paint. My, how we wondered what it could be!"

"What was it?" Claire asked with interest.

"Well, Gertrude and I woke very early that birthday morning, and there, at the foot of our bed, what do you suppose we found? The dearest little doll-cart, painted red, made by father's own hands, and two rag dollies mother had sat up late at night to make for us! Oh, what happy children we were, and how rich we felt!"

"And now for the queer part of my story, we had finished our noon dinner that day and had helped mother with the dishes, and were sitting down to play with our new treasures again. Father had gone back to his work in the field and mother on an errand to a neighbor's, when —who do you suppose came to make us a call?"

Claire shook her head. "I can't guess—do tell me!"

"We were putting our rag dolls into the cart, when suddenly we noticed that it seemed to be getting dark. We looked up—and there were three great painted Indians peering through the window, and shutting out all the light. My, how I jumped, but Gertrude who was braver than I, smiled at them as they came in uninvited. Mother had left some fresh-made doughnuts on the table, and the three men walked up to them, sniffing at them as if they liked what they saw. Then they proceeded to help themselves—it was a way many of the Indians had in those pioneer days. Then one of them—the biggest and most painted one of the lot—came up to Gertrude and ran his hand over her pretty yellow curls. I think he expected her to be frightened—but she didn't seem to be. So he patted her head, saying, 'Heap brave papoose!' I was trying to keep my teeth from chattering, but not succeeding very well. Well, what do you suppose that Indian did next? My dear, he picked up our beautiful little doll-cart, first emptying out the rag-dolls (we were thankful he did that, anyway!) and then they all walked out of the house with the cart!

"Oh, how mean," Claire exclaimed.

"It did seem so," smiled Grandmother, "and besides our grief at our loss, we were thinking how sorry father would be, for he had spent so much time making that little cart for us. We had a good big cry, I can tell you, and then we decided we'd try to brace up and act brave about it, for father's sake and mother's. She was back in a half hour, and terribly frightened when she heard who had visited us! And of course she felt bad over our loss. We were dreading to break the sad news to father. Just outside the door that evening we heard him laugh and say: 'What have we here? Two Indian papooses left on our doorstep?' We flung the door open, and there, just outside, stood our little red cart and in it two of the cunningest Indian dolls—dressed in bright painted skins, and covered with strings of gay beads! Gertrude and I were the two happiest little girls in Minnesota when we went to bed that night, hugging our queer little Indian babies and our rag dolls in our arms.

"I just love your story, Grandma, and to think it's all true!" Claire said, as Grandmother finished, and sat smiling over her memories. Then, half shyly, "You and Aunt Gertrude weren't very much like me, were you?"

And just then mother came back to the room. Claire's arms went around her. "Mother," she whispered, "I don't mean what I said about the present for my birthday. Of course the big coach costs too much. And that little one we saw at the Boston House is lovely—Arabella will like it just as much."

Mother held her close in her arms, her eyes shining—and Grandmother smiled upon them both, well pleased!

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

You remember that some weeks ago we proposed to raise a little fund called our Comrades' Corner Lunch Fund. By it we were going to help pay the cost of hot luncheons for the boys and girls of Dorchester Academy, McIntosh, Ga. Perhaps you recall that I said that some of those boys and girls walked as many as twenty miles a day to come to that school. They of course come from poor homes and can only pay about two cents for their luncheons.

Now you know very well that two cents would hardly pay for the salt they use, certainly not for the sugar if sugar is as high in your town as it is in mine. The balance of the cost is what our fund is going to help meet. They say that it takes about a dollar a day to make up the difference between what the boys and girls pay and what the food costs. So for eleven days next fall we of the Comrades' Corner are going to meet the cost of the luncheon, as $11.20 is the total amount which has already been turned over to the American Missionary Association as our gift.

I am sure there are a number more of you who intended to send in to this fund but forgot it. If there are more of you please forward your money to me and I will see that it is sent to the A. M. A.

You know they must be fine boys and girls down there. I learned about one, Grover, thirteen years old, who was born with no right arm and had a very bad hump back. Even if the Good Father didn't give him a right arm he gave him some things which were worth far more. They are a happy face and a Christian heart. This boy helps to earn his schooling and a part of his task during those hours of work is to keep the papers and trash picked up on the campus. He does this by a stick with a sharp nail in the end of it. This shows that he not only has the fine qualities I have just mentioned but is appreciative and ready to do his part. I am sure we shall be glad to send our little contribution along to help boys and girls of this sort.

I am sure many of you are having delightful times at your summer homes or on your vacations, but unfortunately for me and for the rest of the Comrades you don't tell us what you are doing. Lucy Sanborn of Andover, Mass., who is now at the Cockermouth Camp in Groton, N. H., where her father has the Camp, says the land up there got its name from Lord Cockermouth of England and was a grant from the King. The river still keeps the name of this Lord. She tells of her delight in finding a bird's nest with little ones in it and shows a genuine naturalist's spirit in being very careful about frightening them. She says, "Today I saw a tiny redstart. It was as unlike its parent as it could be." (Can you identify a redstart when you see one, fellow Comrades? Mr. A.). "The mother was near by. Love for her baby made her come close to me to feed it with a moth. I saw a nest with three eggs in it which a few days after was on the ground. I didn't do it, Mr. A."

This Comrade's love for New Hampshire, its mountains, and its hills, is so great that she thinks she loves it better than Massachusetts, though that state is "all right." She suggests that if I ever need a vacation that this is the place. I am sure I should agree with her, but of course if I am to keep this Corner up week after week it looks as though I shouldn't be able to have any very long vacation.

I think without fail that next week I can let you have the story about the most perfect light in the world.

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

CALIFORNIA

Rev. W. D. Williams, D. D.

Many old friends of Dr. W. D. Williams will learn with deep regret of his recent death. In his pastorate at Tulare, Cal., and San Francisco he endeared himself to circles far wider than his immediate parish. He was pre-eminently a pastor and exalted the pastoral office.

Under Dr. Williams's genial leadership our Tulare church grew strong and valiant; a center of influence; a mother church to other churches up and down the valley. Encouraged and nurtured by Dr. Williams, scores of mission Sunday schools came into being in country schoolhouses, scattered all the way from the tules by the lake up into the high Sierras.

Porterville Church owes its beginning to his zest for outpost duty. Second Church, San Francisco, never enjoyed a period of greater prosperity and usefulness than during his able and devoted ministry.

After seven years in San Francisco Dr. Williams entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church. First as Arch-Deacon of Arkansas for four years, then rector of Trinity Church, Iowa City, for ten years.

On May 10 his useful life and fruitful labors closed at Southington, Ct., where for the last eight years he has been rector of St. Paul's Church.

Born in Wales, trained at Oberlin, served with distinction in Congregational and Episcopalian fields, this warm-hearted friend and faithful shepherd has left a dear memory in many of our hearts.

Another Serious Fire in Los Angeles

Fires seem to have become the fashion in Los Angeles churches! Bethany Memorial was the third Congregational church in the city within a year to suffer a serious loss this way. It proved the most serious of the three fires, the building being entirely destroyed. An incendiary origin is suspected.

With undaunted faith, however, the church membership proposes to build more strongly than before. A $20,000 plant, adequate for their growing needs, is contemplated. The people are of small means but large courage, and through their own efforts have already pledged nearly $7,000. Assistance from outside friends is expected.

Under the leadership of Rev. J. H. Cooper this church has made fine progress within the last four years, its membership in that period having increased from 43 to 144. It came to self-support over a year ago and within the last 12 months has made a generous increase in the pastor's salary. More and more it is becoming the community church of its district.

Sunday Night Services at Longmont

Rev. Monroe Markley has solved the Sunday night problem for Longmont. For seven years he has drawn a house full to hear his sermon-lectures, interpreting affairs of the hour in their relation to the Kingdom of God. On a recent Sunday night when he was announced to speak on Fishing for Fish and Fishing for Men, a dozen of the town's most enthusiastic fishermen surprised the preacher by marching down the aisle, rods in hand, to sit in the front seats. The church was active in personal work for the Easter ingathering and received 39 new members, 29 of whom came on confession.

An Addition to Church at Craig

Craig is making steady gains under the leadership of Rev. Archie Toothaker. The number of young people being reached makes necessary a large addition to the church building. Both church and parsonage have been improved by electric lights and plumbing, and the church has been re-decorated. Seventeen new members have recently been received, 10 of them on confession. Three hundred dollars has been added to the pastor's salary.

Newton Church Gives Evidence of Progress

Newton, Rev. C. C. McCoy, pastor, has increased its membership in 14 months by 31 on confession and 17 by letter; of these 27 have come directly out of the church school. No special meetings have been held but the individual contact method has been put into practical effect. Twice each year the school is thoroughly canvassed for those who are ready to join the church. Newton has two teacher training classes which have done splendid work. One of these classes is now well into the second year of the Pilgrim Course. The pastor has just closed an interesting course with his parents' class in the church school in "Religious Education in the Family," using Henry F. Cope's work for this purpose. The missionary department has sent out two foreign missionary boxes, one to India and one to China. The finances of the church are in encouraging condition. Within three years the church has improved its property to the extent of $12,000, built a parsonage at the cost of $4,000, and increased the pastor's salary $600. This is a working church and pastor and people are looking for greater things to do for the Kingdom of Christ.

Waterloo Churches Pressing Ahead

The three churches in Waterloo have made splendid progress during the past year. First, of which Rev. F. J. Clark is the efficient leader, is launching out upon an enlarged program of activity. In the two years of Mr. Clark's pastorate, the church has cleared off its indebtedness and has largely increased its local budget and benevolences. Rev. R. C. Hufstader of Flint, Mich., has just been added to the working staff as associate minister with Mr. Clark. Mr. Hufstader is known to the Iowa fellowship, having been associated with Dr. Kirbye of Plymouth, Des Moines, prior to his going to Michigan. In Waterloo he will direct the church music and will have the chief responsibility for developing the religious education work in the church.

Plymouth, Waterloo, is moving out into new strength. The pastor, Rev. R. W. Cross, is just closing his first year, a victorious one for the church. Mr. Cross has met a difficult situation with heroic courage. The church has grown in spiritual influence and more than 50 persons have been added to the membership, a large number of these on confession.

Union, Waterloo, has asked its former beloved pastor, Rev. W. A. Peterson, to return to the pastorate of this church. He began his work May 1, and both pastor and people are happy in the renewed relationship.

New Organ for Geneva

Geneva has recently installed a splendid new pipe organ at a cost of $3,000. The organ was built by the Reuter-Schwartz Co., of St. Louis, and the whole community is proud of its splendid tone quality. The organ is to be dedicated the first Sunday in September.

Reorganization at Sheffield

Since the first of the year, 19 have been received into the membership of Sheffield, Rev. R. W. Merrifield, pastor. Fourteen came as the fruit of the pastor's class conducted previous to Easter. Subsequent to the pastor's coming to this field last autumn, both the church and church school have been considerably reorganized. The number of deacons and trustees has been increased and a monthly cabinet meeting and quarterly business meeting have been instituted. The Every Member Canvass last December proved successful and the duplicate envelope system used this year for the first time is now considered by the church the only method to be used. The church school was recently graded and new classes have been added, the enrollment having increased while the average attendance has almost doubled. A cradle roll has recently been organized.

In an effort to bind the church and church school more closely together, the plan of commencing the two at the same time has been worked out. All worship together until just preceding the offering when the Juniors march out to their classes. After the sermon, the older classes go to the study of their lessons. The Juniors have their own closing exercises. The Primary department meets in its own room from the beginning.

OHIO

First, Marietta, Unveils Tablet

A bronze Memorial tablet, dedicated to the 76 boys who served in the late war from Marietta and in memory of three—Gerald Kelly, Delmar Bloomingdale and Filmore Simpson—who gave their lives in France, was unveiled recently as the gift of the ladies of the church. In this connection the pastor, Rev. W. L. Goldsmith, also read the Honor Roll of 1861—1865, containing 38 names, eight of whom were killed in battle and only one of whom was present at this service.

This church and the college co-operated in an elaborate Tercentenary Pageant, which was given June 15 as a feature of commencement week in Muskingum Park, directly in front of the church, under the skillful direction of William Chauncy Langdon of New York. The pageant not only commemorated the landing at Plymouth but fittingly linked the beginnings at Marietta to New England by a series of strikingly similar episodes.

Nottingham, Cleveland, Lifts Debt

Nottingham, Cleveland, Rev. L. D. Williams, pastor, has just completed a summer drive for $15,000 to clear up a debt and provide better facilities. With the aid of Evangelist Patterson the amount attained was more than $19,000. This young church in a growing community thus faces its tasks with courage and hope.

New Pastorate for Dr. F. R. Marsh

After four years of service as pastor of Union, Jacksonville, Dr. F. R. Marsh has resigned because of ill health, the resignation to take effect at the close of his vacation, Oct. 1. During the war Dr. Marsh was camp pastor at Camp Joseph E. Johnston, and during the influenza epidemic the church was headquarters for all relief work in the city, furnishing food, medicine, doctors and nurses to over 17,000 persons. The debt on the church building erected a few years ago has been materially decreased during his pastorate and at a reception recently the members of the church presented beautiful gifts to the pastor and his wife who are leaving to take charge of the church in Tavares, Fla. In granting them letters of dismission to their new field, the church voted as a token of its affection, to elect Dr. and Mrs. Marsh honorary members of Union, Jacksonville, for life.

PENNSYLVANIA

New Parsonage for Kensington, Philadelphia

During the year ending July 1, Kensington, Philadelphia, has raised $2,500, besides the regular expenses, $1,000 of this amount being paid to the C. C. B. S. to apply on indebtedness to that society. Three hundred dollars was spent for repairs on the building; $1,200 was raised to apply toward the purchasing of a parsonage; and by a special arrangement with the pastor and a B. & L. Association, the entire cost of the house will be taken care of within a certain term of years without further effort on the part of the church. The church treasury has been running ahead of the regular expenses, notwithstanding the fact that the pastor's salary has been increased $300.

Since last November, when a Senior Christian Endeavor was organized, the young people have been active and have been taking prominent parts in the affairs of the church. A great many young people attend the regular services. An Athletic Association for young men rents a vacant lot and plays football in winter and baseball in summer, usually on Saturday afternoons. The church now is in the midst of a summer Bible school; 81 are enrolled in this school which meets every morning for five days in the week.

Since the first Sunday in February 17 new members have been received into Kensington.

CONNECTICUT

Dr. Denison Leaves United, New Haven

On Sept. 1, Dr. R. C. Denison relinquishes the pastorate of United, New Haven, to become head of the department of philosophy in Pomona College. In his letter of resignation he expresses his keen regret that after 27 years of constant work in the ministry he feels his physical and nervous energy unequal to the varied tasks of a large city church and the demands for civic and social service made upon the minister of a central parish. The regret is tempered, however, he states, by the opportunity to prepare those whose fresher and fuller resources may later make them soldiers in this most difficult and glorious calling.

At the close of Dr. Denison's 11 years' ministry, United Church is stronger in membership, larger in material resources, and richer in its philanthropy, than in any previous period. Free from all ostentatiousness, and avoiding feverish programs of special expedients, Dr. Denison's ministry has been pre-eminently a ministry of the things of the spirit. His devotion to the truth, his well-balanced judgment, his temperateness of statement, and above all, his own simple, transparent goodness won for him the love and confidence of the serious and thoughtful, and made him in many respects a leader among New Haven Congregationalists.

His council was sought in social and civic affairs, and his assistance in directing various community activities was freely given. During the war some of the keenest analysis of existing conditions and some of the clearest notes of warning and challenge came from the pulpit of United Church. He not only preached but he offered himself, giving eight months of strenuous service in Serbia as an official of the Red Cross.

How generally Dr. Denison won the respect and love of men of different circumstances and beliefs is illustrated in a letter sent by Rabbi Mann of the Congregation Mishkan Israel to a New Haven paper. In it he says: "While almost every one realized that Dr. Denison was dean of the ministers in the city, those of us who were closely associated with him also realized that he fully merited this distinction by virtue of a personality so truly sincere, so deeply spiritual, a manly man, energetically devoted to affairs communal and civic, a teacher who taught by example even more eloquently than by precept, a religionist so broad that he not only 'loved his fellow men,' but was at all times ready and willing to serve them.

"Congregation Mishkan Israel looked forward to his preaching and listened attentively

The Annuity Fund

Makes it possible for Congregational ministers to enjoy a reasonable annuity at the age of sixty-five and thereafter. The Original Plan now in operation is particularly advantageous for men from forty-five to sixty years of age. The following premiums indicate the rates:

At 45 years of age.......	$50.61
At 50 years of age.......	71.77
At 55 years of age.......	114.22

These premiums from the ages named until sixty-five years, it is expected, will yield annuities of $500 when the Pilgrim Memorial Fund is completed, to those who have served thirty years in the Congregational ministry.

Lower rates are granted to those who enter the sixty-eight year and seventy-year class.

Lump sum payments offer the lowest rates of all.

Total number of certificates already issued, 792; total number of annuitants, 22; present active memberships, 752.

Churches can help their Ministers to join by paying annually one-half the premium.

MASSACHUSETTS

New Treasurer for Home Missionary Society

Rev. O. D. Sewall, pastor of First, Dedham, has been elected treasurer of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Rev. J. L. Kilbon, now the financial secretary of the Congregational World Movement.

Mr. Sewall is a graduate of Bowdoin College and Andover Seminary, and was a member of the Andover Band of 1892, who went from the Seminary pledged to give the first years of their ministry to home missionary service in rural Maine, Mr. Sewall's post being Strong, where he served two years. A pastorate in Durham, N. H., followed, then 10 years of service as assistant pastor of Harvard, Brookline, Mass., and nine years as pastor of First, Great Barrington, Mass. In his ministry in Great Barrington he gave generous service for the aid of the smaller and more remote fields, bringing to them the sympathetic understanding which his own missionary experience in Maine had given him. He has been a member of the Board of Pastoral Supply and for more than a year a member of the Executive Committee of the Massachusetts Home Misisonary Society. He, therefore, brings to the new work in the office of the Society a large and varied experience which will make him an effective co-worker with Dr. Emrich and Mr. Walker in the service of the Society among the churches of Massachusetts.

Mr. Sewall has accepted the call of the Society, and it is hoped that he will be released by his church in Dedham so that he may enter into his new work in the early autumn. He will be released with reluctance, for his ministry there has been brief, and the church has been rejoicing in his fidelity and power as a preacher and pastor.

Vacation Bible School at Shawmut, Boston

Shawmut, Boston, is again holding a Daily Vacation Bible School for six weeks in July and August. The work is somewhat hampered by the increased cost of material for handcraft and the girls are mose easily provided for than are the boys. But religious training is receiving increased emphasis and the work of the church school is reinforced by this daily instruction in the stories and teachings of the Bible. The composition of the school includes Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews, members of the Greek and Armenian Churches, Chinese and Negroes. The Vacation Bible School is probably the only organization which is able to gather together so wide a diversity of pupils in its classes for religious training.

Supplies at Newton Highlands

The pulpit supplies at Newton Highlands for the first three Sundays of August were Rev. C. E. White of the American Board, Rev. H. J. Hinman of Lyndonville, Vt., and Dr. I. W. Sneath of Wollaston. Rev. C. A. Adams of Danville, Vt., and Rev. F. W. Hodgdon of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund will be the preachers on Aug. 22 and 29, respectively.

A. M. MacDonald, Dr. Mary F. Cushman, the daughter of a former pastor; Rev. S. N. Adams, a son of the church; and Rev. J .S. Ives, a son of a former pastor. The Book and Thimble Club gave a fair and a history was given of the Sunday school, the Rainbow Club and the music.

Deaths

REV. JAMES DEANE

James Deane died at Herkimer, N. Y., on June 4, 1920, aged 84 ears. He was of Pilgrim ancestry, tracing his descent from Walter Deane, one of the first seven freemen of Taunton, Mass. His grandfather, James Deane, was trained for missionary work among the Indians, and rendered notable service as an interpreter during the Revolution.

The subject of the present sketch was the third James Deane, son of James Deane, Jr., and Esther Cornelia (Norton). He was born in Utica, N. Y., April 21, 1836. Having lost his parents in early childhood, he removed with his guardian to Salisbury, Ct. He was prepared for college in private schools in Sharon and Middletown, Ct., and graduated from Williams College in 1857. After reading law for a year at Hartford, where he attended Horace Bushnell's church, he decided to enter the ministry, and studied for two years at Auburn Theological Seminary.

He spent a few months in home missionary work at Hamilton, Ill., and then became pastor of the Congregational Church at East Canaan, Ct. Here the outbreak of the Civil War found him, intensely interested in the Union cause. When President Lincoln, in June, 1862, called for 300,000 volunteers, James Deane first became a recruiting officer, and then entered the army with the men enlisting from his own town, being enrolled in the Nineteenth Connecticut Infantry, which later became the Second Connecticut Heavy Artillery. At the battle of Cold Harbor he was seriously wounded. During convalescence he was engaged for a time as a transport officer. Later he was returned to the line, and took part in the campaign about Petersburg. He had entered the service a lieutenant, was mustered out at the close of the war a captain, and was breveted major "for gallant conduct at Sailor's Creek."

Returning to his calling, he preached for two years at Sandisfield, Mass. In 1867 he was called to Westmoreland, N. Y., the town where his grandfather had been the first white settler. He was pastor at Westmoreland for eleven years, at Phoenix for two years, at Howell's Depot for two years, at Crown Point for sixteen years, and at Northfield for seven years. He retired from the active pastorate in 1906, continuing for a short time his work as registrar of the State Association, an office which he held for thirty-six years. Since his retirement he has lived at Herkimer, preaching occasionally, until after his eightieth year, entering sympathetically into the life and worship of the Reformed Church of the town, and enjoying a semi-pastoral relation to families not attached to any church.

James Deane was a pastor by nature. At school, in college and seminary, in the army, in his parishes, in his business acquaintance, from the beginning to the end of his life he was rich in friends. As a minister he combined the dignity of a gentleman with a genuine interest in men of all classes and all creeds. He cherished high ideals in religion and conduct, but had a large charity for men of other ideas or other training. His sympathy with the suffering and the sorrowful made him a welcome visitor in the sick-room and in the house of mourning.

Through his long term of service as registrar he was closely identified with the progress of the denomination in the state. His large experience in the formal meetings of the churches led to his recognition as an authority on Congregational order and precedent. His long pastorate at Crown Point made him a natural adviser for the home missionary churches of the region. But his devotion to the church was more than official. One who heard his prayers at family worship could but remark the dominant interest of his life, as he prayed for the extension of the Kingdom at home and abroad, and for the welfare of those who had been his fellow-laborers in former days. Doubtless it was this profound earnestness in his chosen service that made his public prayers so impressive and so helpful.

At the same time he had a broad conception of his rights and responsibilities as a citizen. He took a keen interest in politics, and, while he never discussed political themes in the pulpit, he did not hesitate to take active part in political campaigns where his convictions and conscience were involved. At one place and another he cooperated in movements for community betterment in social and educational lines. His body lies today in a village cemetery that was planned by him fifty years ago for the Cemetery Association of Westmoreland.

He was married in 1858 to Annie M. Bosworth of Salisbury, Ct., who was his helpful and inspiring companion in all his service for fifty-nine years. Mrs. Deane died in December, 1917. Of the six children born to them, four survive: Mary C. N., of Middlebury, Vt.; Allen G., of Long Branch, N. J.; John P., of Beloit, Wis.; and Sidney N., of Northampton, Mass.

Full Days at Northfield

The Christian Workers' Conference came to a successful close last Sunday. The problem of the hundreds of persons from all over the country who attended the meetings has been one of selection. Dr. John McNeill of Birmingham, Ala., long associated with D. L. Moody in evangelistic campaigns, spoke with all his old-time power. Dr. Harris E. Kirk of Baltimore, who wields plummet and scalpel with consummate skill in his searching addresses, gave impressive messages. A strong course of lectures on the Apostolic Church was delivered by Dr. John Gardner of Chicago. From overseas came Dr. J. Stuart Holden of London, whose preaching always reminds one of still waters and quiet vales. Another welcome visitor from abroad, after a regretted absence of five years, was Dr. John A. Hutton of Glasgow. The war has ripened his heart and mind and his every address is a challenge to more consecrated service. Addresses by missionaries and workers in this country like "Mel" Trotter of Grand Rapids were interspersed throughout the rich program.

The Conference will be followed by the gathering of Christian Endeavorers and other young Christian workers at the Massachusetts Christian Endeavor Institute, Aug. 16-23. The Daily

Vol. CV. No. 35 LABOR NUMBER August 26, 1920

Profits or Service?

HERE is a world of people, human beings with eternal destinies. They have great needs, material and spiritual; they have to feed, clothe, house, transport, educate and recreate themselves and their families, and to develop the Godlike within them. That is the real meaning of agriculture, railroading, manufacturing, education and religion. Everybody, therefore, who has any part in these processes has a sacred calling, and ought to work with the same motive and spirit as the true minister and missionary, who minister to the religious needs of men.

Working mainly for profits corrupts men. It tends to make them selfish and grasping. The temptation is irresistible, unless one has himself well in hand, to make quick profits and big profits, and, if possible, by manipulation or speculation rather than by production. The virus of profiteering passes naturally into the employees of factories, and they use the weapons of sabotage, the strike and personal intimidation, to get all they can.

What is needed is faith in God, in Christian principles and in the fairness of employers and workers as a whole. Those extremists who turn to violence and those reactionaries who trust in force are the joint enemies of the public welfare, and of religion and of morality. But the men and women of faith and good will, who believe in the Golden Rule, who are determined to use whatever power they have to work out a better industrial organization, based upon the principles of the Sermon on the Mount—they are the hope of the nation. Here it is that the Church comes into its own and has its opportunity.

—From Labor Sunday Message of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America.

Olivet College, daughter of Oberlin and mother of Drury, still lives. She lives not only as a hallowed memory in the hearts of hundreds of alumni, but as a material and spiritual entity equipped and staffed and ready for service.

"Pro Christo et Humanitate"

OLIVET COLLEGE

HER HISTORY

She has a long history of educational achievement. For seventy-five years she has rendered heroic service to the cause of Christ and in the interests of humanity. She has held aloft the beacon light of Christian idealism. She has reinforced the ramparts of our Christian civilization. She has sent forth from her fostering care hundreds of leaders—ecclesiastical, civic and educational, to serve and bless the world.

HER MISSION

She has a distinct mission in the field of education. It is not her function to imitate our great state universities, whose principal business it is to give intellectual and vocational training. It is rather her function to direct the purposes of the lives of the young men and women who come to her for guidance. A small Christian college, because of its closer contacts and because of its personally controlled atmosphere, is advantageously situated to give character-education and religious, moral and civic training.

Character-education can be brought about in several ways. First, by the training in certain specific habits; second, by the dissemination of wholesome information; and third, by the inculcation of high ideals. It is by means of the latter that the Christian College can render its greatest service.

A member of the Olivet faculty has made a study of the function of ideals in education, and has demonstrated by means of experiment that it is possible in three months' time to build in the minds of boys an ideal of trustworthiness. This ideal actually dominated the conduct of the boys to the extent of making them 22 per cent. more trustworthy than the boys who were not exposed to its influence. This experiment (which will be published in the "Teachers' College Contributions to Education") has demonstrated that Christian idealism is performing a magnificent service in the control of human conduct, and it will strengthen the faith of every educator in the possibilities of Christian education.

HER STAFF

Olivet College has a faculty of twenty-two well-trained educators, one-third of whom hold Ph. D. degrees, received respectively from Pennsylvania, Clark, Johns Hopkins, Cornell and Columbia. All the members of the faculty are professed Christians.

"New England became great largely through the influence of its great-souled educators. The presidents of its colleges, the teachers . . . were men of faith. Their lives taught . . . reverence. College Chapel was a sacred place; and the words and prayers . . . turned many a life into the right path.

"Today an interesting experiment is being made . . . in many of the colleges of the land. Non-religious personalities are being appointed leaders. . . . Executive mechanicians now take the place of the men of broad culture and great faith.

"The results will not be fully known for some years. But we would like to point out that it is an entire departure from former ideals."

Congregationalist, July 31, 1919.

HER EQUIPMENT

Olivet has ten buildings; a library of 35,000 volumes; a good museum; a well-equipped conservatory; two fairly good laboratories; a girls' dormitory; a boys' dormitory not in use.

HER NEEDS

Olivet is out of debt. But she needs $25,000 to refit the boys' dormitory; $100,000 for a new gymnasium; an additional endowment of $1,500,000; and $30,000 to apply on current expenses and general repairs.

The Talk of the Sanctum

Our Labor Number

In these days when the problems that affect us all are so much involved in what labor does and what the employers of labor do, it seems even more important than in most other years that Labor Sunday be observed in our churches. We hope that some helpful suggestions for consideration that day and on Labor Day itself may be found in the pages of this issue. Upon the cover we present a few significant sentences from the Labor Sunday Message of the Federal Council to the churches. Our Editorial Message on Labor and Life suggests some phases of the labor and the duty of the church with reference to them. We wish to emphasize the fact that the church does have such a duty, and it is made clearer and more definite in Dr. Holt's excellent article. The human interest and fact in the well-told true stories by Rev. Messrs. Gilroy and Kuyper also throw light upon the subject of the industrial workers and their attitudes. Mr. Babson, the eminent statistician, who is also a good Congregational layman, speaks with authority regarding industry and business and emphasizes the importance of the church influence in the life of the world today.

What Women Have Done

We would like to publish early this fall some short stories—true ones—with names and places—telling what has been accomplished by some of our most successful church women's societies, and explaining just how they did it—whatever it was. Answer this question:

What was the best achievement by a church women's society that you know about, and how was it done?

These stories should not be over 500 words long and must reach us before Oct. 1. We offer first, second and third prizes of $5, $3 and $2 for the best ones.

We know of many churches in which the Ladies' Aid Society or the Women's Society or whatever they call it is the livest part of the church. We are sure our readers can tell us some stories regarding their societies that will be an inspiration to others and of practical help. We shall all await the response with interest. We are especially desirous of having the methods explained so that others will be better able to undertake a similar plan if possible.

In the Circulation Department—

We see that there is Bolshevism, Mormonism, Syndicalism and Ponzi-ism. There is the High Cost of Living and the Cost of High Living. The farmers cannot get enough help, the schools cannot get enough teachers and railroad fares have gone up again. We heard today that America is "sitting on a volcano."

The Congregationalist sees the dangers clearly and does not fail to sound a warning voice. BUT you will always find, too, it sees that

"Above the clouds is the sun, still shining."

You will always find in its pages a courageous view of today and a hopeful view of tomorrow. If you keep for a time in the atmosphere of this paper you will come to see that, because God lives there is less Dark than Sun, less Pain than Health, less Hate than Love, less Hell than Heaven, more Right than Wrong, more Peace than War, more Life than Death.

And the Circulation Department thinks that Vision is worth circulating.

In order to acquaint the public with the general telephone situation, and some of the reasons for delay in completing new installations—chief among which is the difficulty of getting the numerous kinds of necessary material—we have prepared a series of announcements of which this is the third.

New Telephone Equipment Scarce

We appreciate, and with deep sympathy, the feelings of a subscriber who has bought or leased a house in some section where, for the time being, we are without facilities, and who says to our commercial representative: "Why, you have poles and wires on the street and the house itself is wired. All you need to do is to connect us up."

We wish the solution were as simple as all that. There may be poles and wires, but every wire already assigned. There may be a cable, but not a spare circuit in the cable. There may be a spare circuit, but not another inch of available switchboard at the central office with which to connect that circuit. We have had new sections of switchboard delayed weeks in their operation because of the absence of such little accessories as ringing keys or relays.

The reason for this scarcity of telephone equipment is very simple. We couldn't maintain our usual ratio of advance construction during the war, because the government needed for war purposes the very things we needed for telephone purposes. Consequently our margin of reserve facilities was gradually absorbed by the demand.

We are short of copper wire, silk, rubber, clay, beeswax, glass, thread, porcelain, paper, paraffin, antimony, tin, shellac and other materials entering into the construction of telephone equipment because the whole world is short of these things or of material fabricated from them. Our engineers are searching the markets of the world for these things while other experts are endeavoring to develop satisfactory substitutes.

We are making progress in both directions, but it is necessarily slow because never has there been such a demand for service as at the present time. Incidentally, there has never, in a similar period, been such a fulfilment of demand.

We want to make clear to those awaiting telephone service that we realize the handicap under which they are laboring and are keenly desirous of removing it as soon as possible. We want them to understand, also, that building a telephone plant is not a matter of some poles and wire, but literally of hundreds of different kinds of material, raw or fabricated. Nevertheless the spirit of our people is not to set up this difficulty as an alibi, but rather as a challenge to their inventive genius and resourcefulness.

Labor and Life

IN War time every one was "doing his bit," at least he was bound to get the credit of doing something worthwhile for his nation and a great cause. Now there is a strangely different cry: "Everybody's getting his and I am going to get mine while the getting is good."

It is bad enough to have to pay all manner of taxes and increased prices in which are included other people's taxes for everything we buy, but we do not get honest goods in return and we do not get honest service. The costly clothes we buy are shoddy and the costly coal we buy is full of dirt and stones. We pay more than ever before for public utilities service and the service is poorer than ever. The more wages the workers receive and the less hours they work, the poorer their workmanship and the more they loaf on their jobs. It is no excuse for the profiteer to charge huge profits because his workmen demand big wages, and it is no excuse for the worker to curtail production, and thus force prices still higher, by loafing because his employer is robbing the public too.

The logic of "taking it out" on the public every time capital or labor has a grouch is as absurd as the logic of the boy who kicks his dog because he has a grouch against another boy too big to kick. The moral motives run on the same level.

A good deal of the time it looks as if America had discharged its conscience from service as it did the Doughboys, after the Armistice was signed, and since then had let its brains go on a joy-riding spree, like reckless youths who don't begin to think until after they run amuck.

Conscience in service would hold the lines true against the stupid and wicked selfishness that has held sway in political business and industrial life. It would advance the cause of justice and righteousness. Brains on the job would see the folly of the way we are going and would choose the safer, better way, the way of good measure and the square deal, of good will and good service.

In the present slump of idealism and the confusion of war's aftermath, the war spirit is rampant and greed has made many blind. We need to re-emphasize the fact that human life and spiritual development are more important than property rights or cash in hand, wherever it comes from or whoever gets it.

The supreme objective of industry is not profit-making or making a living, but making life. It is a sacred duty to help to free the life of all who labor and of all who are dependent on the product of labor from unnecessary burdens and to give the largest opportunity for the greatest good to all.

Fortunately the great prophetic bodies of Christians, including our own, have taken a strong and definite position for justice and righteousness in every department of life, including the realm of industry. Now as never before the world looks to the church for leadership. Labor Sunday this year should be a day when there should thunder forth from our pulpits the voice of the prophet, calling men in the industrial world to repentance and to works meet for repentance. Our ministry should preach the gospel of brotherhood and democracy, the gospel of peace and good will, the gospel of fidelity and service, and preach with the divine passion for righteousness to the world workers and the employers of labor alike. And all of us should practice that kind of preaching.

EDITORIAL

A Proposed Union of Churches

An announcement of unusual importance in the field of the union of the churches is made by a commission of the Protestant Episcopal Church and printed in full in The Living Church. It is a concordat drawn up and presented by that commission to the Old (not Roman) Catholic and the Oriental (Orthodox) churches, Greek, Russian and Armenian. Bishop Herzog, of the Old Catholic Church, signed it for that church in Switzerland over which he presides. It was later signed by the Armenian Patriarch of Constantinople and the Vicar Apostolic of the Armenian Patriarch of Jerusalem. And it was submitted to the Synod at Athens of the Greek and Russian (Orthodox) churches, the synod appointing a commission, which agreed that a confederation of the churches might be made immediately, though further steps would be necessary for a formal union. Such a union would give nearly a world-wide church, the old Catholics being sparsely scattered on the European continent in the strongholds of the Papal Roman Catholic Church.

The concordat traverses the doctrinal, liturgical and governmental points at issue between the churches directly concerned, meeting some debated questions by complete agreement and explaining differences of tradition and usage and of points of view for others, while referring the ancient moot point between East and West of the "procedure" of the Holy Spirit "from the Father," or "from the Father and the Son" to an ecumenical council hoped for later. As to the question whether there are two or seven sacraments, the difference of opinion and usage is avoided by a re-definition of the word "sacrament" which makes a special place for the two (of baptism and the supper) and leaves the five (confirmation, penance, Holy Order, Holy Matrimony and Holy Unction) as "Means of grace bestowed by the Holy Spirit" and in that wider sense sacramental. The question of prostration before relics, pictures and images is also met by definition and allowance. Acceptance of the validity of the sacraments administered by any of the communions and intercommunion are thus led up to and accepted. This concordat is to be at once submitted to the Lambeth Council of Bishops, now in session in London.

What concerns us most directly in these steps toward a union of the Eastern, Old Catholic and Anglican churches is the explanatory statement of the Protestant Episcopal Commission which took the initiative in this approach and tentative agreement. The commission sketches the history of previous attempts to bring together these separated communions and then goes on to the historical statement that while the English Church at the Reformation "Retained its Catholic heritage, it did so under great difficulties, and with the necessity of dealing kindly and tactfully with those who were impatient and wished to go further in the Protestant direction." It further says:

> Accordingly, our discipline has always been tender and sympathetic in that direction, and we are indisposed to drive out these among ourselves who fail to realize the fulness of their Catholic heritage, lest we alienate Protestants altogether and thus end all hope of winning them. This policy has worked as well as could reasonably be expected. Those who fully and loyally adhere to the Prayer Book working system do become more and more consistently Catholic; and every revival of loyalty to this working system results in what is called a "Catholic movement" of which the Tractarian movement beginning in 1833 is an example. And each new movement of this kind is more gratifying in its Catholic results than its predecessors.
> The sum of the matter is that our history establishes the Catholic nature and tendency of our position and system; and the seemingly lax aspects of conditions show merely that we are adhering to the great work of helping Protestants to recover what they have lost.

We do not believe that this is either a true or a fair account of the English Reformation or of recent history. That it is not true of the founders of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, these founders' careful choice of the word Protestant in the legal title of their church goes far to prove. We would not lay a straw in the way of such a reunion of communions as this concordat contemplates. That is entirely for the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, lay and clerical, and of all schools of thought, to decide. But there is much in the concordat itself which would make it more difficult than ever for the Congregational churches to enter into an agreement with the Protestant Episcopal Church which would in any wise commit them to some of the views of worship, church authority and tradition outlined in this proposed union of churches.

The Ballot for Women

The Legislature of Tennessee deserves commendation for ratifying the Woman Suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution, thus making the thirty-six states required to make the amendment effective, in season to let women vote in the general elections this year. In coming years we shall marvel even more than we do today that men—and strangest of all, women, too—opposed giving the ballot to women. The long fight seems to be over now. Its winning brings problems in the suddenly enlarged electorate. With those problems is the promise of fresh interest in the duties and opportunities of citizenship, and we believe on the whole the hope of better results at the ballot box.

The Primary Duty of the Church

The Church is always doing pioneer work because the field of its endeavors is always changing. No sooner is a generation evangelized, warned and persuaded, than it begins to move off the stage and a new and in a sense uneducated generation comes to the front. So the work of the Church, like that of the good housewife, is never done. And this work concerns itself first of necessity with primary things. An individual man may say with aged Simeon, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation;" but the Church never while it remains upon the earth.

What, then, are the primary things with which the Church is always concerned and to which it must devote its first and constant endeavors and without which it is certain to lose its place and influence in the world? Are they not all summed up in the one word—witness? Can Christ be satisfied with any other than a witnessing Church? Can any other fit into the pictures of our Lord's purpose and desire recorded in the Gospels? Can any other make us effective instruments for the work of the Holy Spirit?

For the Church is a body of those who have had a continuing experience of living with Christ and derive their ideals of character, their motives for action and their thoughts of relation with other men from this relation with him. There need be no self-consciousness in all this, but exactly as the man makes progress in his intimacy of relations with Christ is he fitted for use as a means of witness in the hands of the witnessing Spirit of God.

The primary work of the Church is to bring men by their own free choice into this joyous and effective relation to Christ. There never has been an age when the moral progress of the world did not depend upon the quality of the best people who were living in that age. Now the Church has proved over and over again that by its witness to the character and power of Christ it helps effectively to transform sinners and make saints. As a mere question of efficiency, Christian faith is the most hopeful method of raising the standards of quality in a whole community. And that power goes down from one generation to another, so that children of believers have a better average start, whatever they may do with it, than the children of unbelievers.

That is the witness of Christian nurture and discipline which makes a large part of the primary and endlessly recurring work of the Church. In home and school and worship it always has a new generation under training. And if it neglects that work, or yawns over it, as if it were not the most fruitful and necessary work there is to be done in the world of men, it is both false to its high calling and inattentive to unequaled opportunity. The attitude of parents, of teachers, of the whole Christian community, toward children is a good test of the efficiency or inefficiency of the Church in its primary work of witness.

Sainthood is never selfishness. The witness of character is the determining element in the standing of the Church in any community. The one thing needful for the transforming of the life of humanity in our generation is that Christians should be Christlike. For the believer has a known ideal of character and if, with all allowances for human weakness, he shows no signs of ambition to attain it, it is accounted a disgrace to him and a disparagement to Christ. And character is known and only known in human relations, of the home, the shop, the street, the places of amusement.

There is a notion abroad in certain circles that the call and witness of the Church to men to get into close personal relations with Christ is a call to a selfish deliverance from danger and goes along with a callous indifference to others. But where was Christ ever found, except in his hours of sleep or prayer, but in the company of men? The call of the Church is to seek Christ in human companionships, to stand with him in the crowd, to treat with him as one of those with whom we make bargains and carry on work and take our pleasure. The sense of the presence and interest of Christ should be instinctive with the Christian everywhere. And to witness to the possibility and joy and power of this is one of the primary objects of the Church.

The motive to all this witness and co-operation is more than a sense of duty. It is a growing experience of affection. It expresses itself in personal terms, like, "For his sake," and, "The love of Christ constraineth me," and "If God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." In other words—words which perhaps have lost some of their sharp appeal by repetition and our own hindering inattention—the primary, the pioneer work of the Church is to win men for obedience to the Great Commandments of love to God and our brother. And through this obedience, in all the relations of our lives, lies the fulfilment of the mission of the Church to this and to all generations.

A real question that lies behind industrial quarrels is whether we wish to continue the condition of comfort and indulgence which we have reached. If we are all ready to go back to primitive conditions, we can dispense with much of our difficult and disputed industrial life. A Rumanian or Argentine village is little affected by industrial crises because it enjoys only the primitive satisfactions. But to carry on the satisfaction of complicated needs and yet do injustice to no one is the big task before our American civilization.

The Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of Asking and Receiving

I have a friend and he hath an Automobile; and as I climbed in beside him upon the front seat he remarked,

The Automobile hath become a necessity.

And I answered him and said, Yea, verily: it is necessary for me that my friends shall own them.

And we had a fine ride. For I have an half ownership in the Cars of all my friends. And they are mighty good to me.

And we rode afar. And behold there stood upon the Curb a lad who looked as if he would go somewhere. And my friend slowed down, for he said,

Behold, that lad desireth to go in our direction, and we will take him in on the back seat and help him on his journey.

And as we drew nigh and slowed down the lad yelled,

Gimme a ride.

And he prepared to climb in.

But my friend stepped on the gas and the car shot forward, and left the lad upon the curb.

And my friend said,

It maketh me allfired mad the manners of this rising generation. That lad was well dressed, and the folk in this part of town are good families; and he should know how to address a gentleman and how to ask a Favour. But he knoweth nothing save to make an Impudent Demand. Yea, it is so with most of them. Politeness to older folk is unknown to them. The kids of this generation are the limit.

Now I considered this matter and I resolved that I would say to the young folk of this generation that Politeness costeth very little and often helpeth one on his journey, while Impudence getteth a man nowhere. And I resolved that I would suggest to them that they learn to say, If thou dost please, and also, I thank thee.

Then I considered those who ask of God and receive not because they ask amiss. And I wondered if God doth not speed up the Universe and leave some men standing on the curb because they have not yet learned to be Polite unto God.

In Brief

It will be easier to get into good and friendly relations with the people who are engaged in other parts of the whole work if you are doing your own work well.

In the program for the improvement of Palestine, of which we speak elsewhere, the British Commissioner makes one announcement of policy which we commend to the special attention of the American people. "Unsightly advertisements will be prohibited," he says, and goes on to speak of the encouragement of pilgrimages. That state of this Union which first prohibits unsightly advertisements along its highways of rail and road will, we believe, secure the best possible advertisement among travelers by rail and road for its own good taste and good sense and kindly hospitality.

A considerable number of Pilgrim Tercentenary celebrations are being held the latter part of August and early in September in the towns of Cape Cod and near Plymouth. A reason for the early dates chosen is found in the fact that crowds are assured by the summer vacationists, while it would not be so easy to get a crowd in some of those towns at the wintry season when the Pilgrims landed. There must have been diligent study of history to find incidents to connect the towns that are to celebrate with the Pilgrims to the extent which they contemplate. The pageant is the most popular feature of these celebrations, to which we shall refer more definitely later in our news columns.

Dr. Rendel Harris, who is high authority in his own departments of knowledge, has been tracing down the fate of the ship Mayflower that brought the Pilgrims over 300 years ago and announces that he has found its timbers in a barn at Seargreen, in Buckinghamshire, England. There was a local tradition that this barn was built of ship's timber and about 1625. Dr. Harris found marks on the beams, one of which he thinks refers to the Mayflower's home port of Harwich, while others may be rough emblems intended for mayflowers. The discovery is cetrainly timely and will reawaken discussion as to the ultimate fate of the ship, which is supposed to have gone into the whale trade after its return from Plymouth.

That was an interesting scene in London when the statue of Lincoln by St. Gaudens was presented to the British people as a gift from the American people. Viscount Bryce, former Ambassador at Washington, presided, the address of presentation was made by Elihu Root, and Premier Lloyd George accepted the gift. Mr. Root said of the common foundations and traditions which make for amity between the two great peoples:

> "It is the identical fundamental conceptions in both countries which make it impossible that in any great world emergency Great Britain and America can be on opposing sides. Those conceptions of justice and liberty are the breath of life for both. While they prevail, both nations will endure; if they perish, both nations will die. These were Lincoln's inheritance."

Mr. Lloyd George spoke of the deep interest of the English people in Lincoln's character and career, and added:

> "He was one of those giant figures, of whom there are so few in history, who lose their nationality in death; one of those few who belong to mankind. Such men are needed now more than ever in the settlement of the world.
> "May I be permitted to say," added Mr. Lloyd George, "that this torn and bleeding earth is calling today for the help of the America of Abraham Lincoln's days."

Two hundred American Boy Scouts lined the space where the statue was unveiled by the Duke of Connaught and the ceremonies were concluded with the singing first of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" and then of the British national anthem. Lincoln has captured the hearts of intelligent Englishmen. His statue in the London which once disliked and caricatured him will be a continual reminder of the common faith of the two nations in justice and freedom.

The Labor Leader

A Story of the Good of Getting Acquainted

By Rev. W. E. Gilroy

He was somewhat awkward, and ill at ease; manifestly not accustomed to associating with ministers, much less asking them for favors; and he had come to ask a favor. He introduced himself as President of the Trades and Labor Council in B——, where I had recently become pastor of the Congregational Church.

He had heard that I was "interested in labor." The local Council had decided to go beyond their distinctly business functions, in arranging for occasional addresses on social themes; and he had come to ask me if I would give the first of these. The subject could be of my own choosing, and he hoped that I would feel free to speak, even if my convictions should not be in entire agreement with those of my hearers.

I consented readily, and he was about to leave. In manner, rather than in words, I invited him to remain, and in a few well-directed questions I found out much regarding the local labor situation, and likewise regarding the President of the Trades and Labor Council.

He supposed that the ministry had its discouragements. Certainly there were discouragements in the labor movement. It was hard to interest men in their own welfare, and the men who were so interested were often narrow and unenlightened, actuated largely by sordid motives of selfishness or of personal ambition, and ready, on that account, to regard with distrust and suspicion those who saw in the labor movement some deeper and nobler purpose.

What church did he attend? Well, he must confess that he didn't attend any. In fact he hadn't been in a church for twelve years. He had been brought up, and confirmed, in the Church of England (he was an Englishman), but that Church had failed to appeal to him both in its conceptions and in its social attitude. He knew there were exceptions, but somehow churches and ministers did not seem to be seriously interested in social justice. He had been attracted to Socialism by Robert Blatchford. He didn't know that he agreed with Blatchford's atheistic ideas, but the social gospel of the Clarion (for a generation the most widely circulated Socialist newspaper in Great Britain) interested him. Would I care to see a copy? Most assuredly. I would be glad to see it whenever it was convenient. I was interested in what was happening in society, and in what was passing in the minds of men, even when their thoughts were far removed from my own.

Thus it was that I became a reader of the Clarion, from week to week. And thus, also, a tentative friendship began. I happened to be taking certain English papers. By clubbing together and having them come under one cover, we could effect a saving. Let the Clarion come with my bundle. I would share the cost of it, and pass it on to him. He was very independent. He would like to pay his share for the whole bundle, and read my papers as well. So, while I read the Clarion, and The New Age, he began to read the British Weekly and the Christian World.

The Approach to the Church

Calling for papers and returning them we met very often, sometimes for only a few moments, sometimes for half an hour of friendly conversation, or discussion. I cannot remember inviting him to church. It would have seemed too much like proselytizing. But gradually he began to drop into the back seat on a Sunday evening. It wasn't long until I saw him Sunday morning as well, and he began to develop considerable interest in a sort of free forum, that I conducted on Sunday afternoons. Now that he was developing some active interest, and association, I began to suggest that he ought to throw in his lot entirely with the church and become a member. He was noncommittal, or rather cold, toward the suggestion. I think he felt a certain sympathy with my own ministry and a certain satisfaction in the fellowship of that particular church, but his attitude was that of aloofness and dubiousness regarding the church at large.

I invited him to go with me to a meeting of the district Congregational Association. For a couple of days he was thrown entirely in contact with ministers, and it was a new experience for him. He was visibly impressed. They were much more human than he had supposed. They were by no means victims of uniformity, all cast in one mold, or cut according to an orthodox pattern. They were interested in truth, concerned about social questions, mostly men of unselfish, self-sacrificing lives, and manifestly sincere in their ministry. He remarked upon its being all so different from what he had expected, and from what he had thought of ministers as a class.

I left B—— for another field not long afterwards, but when I heard that he had joined the church I knew that it was largely the influence of that gathering. It had broken down his last barriers of prejudice. I recalled his experience during the recent National Council meetings, and I wondered what would be the effect if labor leaders, aloof from the church, had been there day after day, mingling with the ministers and Christian laymen, and listening to the discussions on the floor of the Council.

In the War

When the War called the sons of Britain, my friend, though he had been a strong antimilitarist, rallied to the cause of democracy. He went overseas as an engineer, and he was soon where the fighting raged hottest. Out between the lines much of the time, in places in comparison with which the trenches were relatively safe, his faith and his courage never failed him. A timid man by nature, shrinking from pain and from the sight of blood, he underwent a metamorphosis that was in itself a proof of the nobility of his crusade. He knew that circumstances had kept me at home, but he knew how I longed to be out there with him, and the letters he wrote were marvels of inspiration and good cheer. Out of the fiercest danger he wrote as if my faith might waver, and my vision might be obscured. He wrote of death in terms of glory, when he knew not what minute he might fall beside his comrades. His one concern was for his wife, and for the women at home. He sent me beautiful words of comfort for the mothers of Canada.

He got his "Blighty"—a piece of shrapnel in the forehead—that almost introduced him to the life beyond, but from the effects of which he recovered. He is back in Canada, and in his old place in the church at B——. No, not in his old place; he has found a new one. A letter is before me, a few days old. "Did I tell you," he writes, "that I am Sunday School Superintendent? I stood out on the tobacco question, but they would have me, and there it is. Now Mrs. R—— wants me to quit smoking on account of the boys. Well, after the stand I took, I feel her request is unjustified, so I am smoking now. Besides, the wife bought me a new pouch yesterday, and I must not waste that."

But, in spite of the new pouch, there is no telling what may happen. I remember when he wrote me about going "on the water wagon." I rather think it was the same Mrs. R—— who induced him to try going without his beer, and I remember he wrote me how surprised he was to find that he felt so much better without it. If the pipe helps to keep him human, I am human enough myself to care very little what he does about it. I believe he is linked up with the church and the school for good.

His Progress

"Wholesome" is the word that comes to my mind as I think of him. I know there are "radicals," who would sneer at his "progress," who would speak with contempt of his association with the church, and his new outlook on society. For myself, I am convinced that he has grown, that he is larger minded and nobler. He has lost nothing of his passion for social justice; he has not weakened in his efforts for a new world; but he has learned to see men with a kindlier eye. He has found that material problems are at heart spiritual problems. Let others think what they will, I am sure that he is a stronger, more useful man because of his association with the church. And I am likewise certain that the church is the richer for his presence.

Business and the Church

By Roger W. Babson

(From address at Congregational Summer Conference, Isles of Shoals, Aug. 8, 1920)

The security of everybody and everything worth while—whether a house or a bank book, whether a pig or a kit of tools—depends on the churches. The security of your family depends on the priests rather than on the policemen, and the security of your property depends on the preachers rather than on the bankers.

We look upon stock certificates, mortgages, etc., as if they were of real value. In themselves, they have absolutely no value. Their value depends wholly on the honesty of the lawyers who draw the papers, on the integrity of the clerks who copy the records, on the honor of the officials who sign the documents, on the courage of the courts which must enforce the claim, and finally on the righteousness of the community, which is the basis of all.

I am not so much interested in what we have now as I am in producing more. If production stopped today, there would not be enough already produced to keep us alive twelve months. We should starve for lack of food, freeze for lack of coal, and suffer in numberless other ways. The things that we already have seem important; but they would amount to nothing if divided up among all the people. Hence, all sensible people are interested in providing more things rather than in struggling over redivision of the things already existing. Statistics should show that religious people are the cause of 80 per cent. of the production of today. The qualities of faith, courage, hope, service and enterprise are qualities which religion has developed. The problem of the cost of living is a religious problem rather than an economic problem, and it can be solved only as people cease to be selfish and become imbued with the spirit of service.

Present Business Conditions

Never before in the nation's history has business been so good, have wages been so high, and money so plentiful. Every one is employed, the railroads have more than they can haul, and the demand for goods exceeds the supply. Yet many able men are fearful of a panic or depression within twelve months. What is the reason for this fear? This fear is due to the knowledge that people forget their religion during times of prosperity. We become extravagant, careless, and selfish during good times. We forget God and feel confident in our own strength; we seek profits rather than service and are interested in consuming rather than producing. Only a revival of religion can make our good times continue. A sub-conscious knowledge of this fact is the basis of the fear abroad today.

The solution of our great industrial problems will be brought about only as the influence of the church increases. We have been taught to believe that labor unions hold the key to the situation. The outlaw strikes which we have had the past few weeks show clearly that the industrial problem cannot be solved through the labor union. The same thing applies to financial, social, and other ills. There is no short-cut solution to any of these problems. The solution will come only through the growth of the church in influence and power. The churches of America must rescue the nation from the unscrupulous politician, the selfish promoter, and the short-sighted employer and wage-worker.

The churches are to civilization what a compass is to a ship or a steering wheel is to an automobile. As a business man, I urge my associates to get behind the churches. They alone provide the solution to the great problems facing us. Legislation, labor unions, employers' associations, and all these other things are mere shells of the egg. So I say that the need of the hour is not more houses or freight cars, not more factories or ships, not more legislation, education, or banking facilities, but more religion. The need of the hour is religion.

A Parson Works in a Steel Mill

By Rev. John W. Kuyper

I have lived in Morgan Park, Duluth, since the 12th of July, 1918. Morgan Park is the part of the city built up by the Minnesota Steel Company. It is interesting for three main reasons: first, while part of the city, it is as much by itself as if it were separated from it by miles of country; second, because the people are all of one trade, everybody is interested in steel; third, because every bit of property is owned by the company. I came here to be the pastor and leader of the Protestant constituency of the Park. I have had to learn to clothe my sermons in the language of the steelmaker.

After getting the work partly under way the influenza epidemic closed the churches and made a serious break in the work, as it seemed then. But as I look back now it is becoming more evident that the best piece of church work I ever did I did while the church was closed. I did not feel comfortable without a job and went to work in the Open Hearth of the Minnesota Steel Plant, on Nov. 1. I changed my profession for just one month from that of a dignified parson with a white collar on to that of a third helper in the Open Hearth. I confess that even now I feel quite as much at ease to be called 2,562 as to be called Reverend. I would much prefer to be called third helper than to be called doctor. It was the hottest job I could get. I wanted a real job if I went to work, and I got what I went for. If I had still held to the orthodox theory of hell, I want to assure you that that belief has now entirely left me.

Preachers are more or less of a curiosity to many people, and to step into the work of third helper in the Open Hearth of a steel plant does not lessen the curiosity. One man walked all over the plant, made a two-hour search for me one day because he wanted to shake hands with and see that preacher that would do a real honest day's work. I was treated with perfect respect and consideration. I was not treated as a man of the cloth, but as a real member of the gang of third helpers. About the third or fourth day on the job an excited first helper yelled to me, "Hey, you guy, come here with that shovel!" I understood that term perfectly and other language more expressive than that, which was not infrequently used. It was a place where men with hearts, in the daily grind of hard work, did not hesitate to step up to a man and ask questions and say in reply what they honestly thought. I was often put on the grill about the church and the preachers. I came back at them with the same frankness with which I was glad to have them approach me. I honestly confessed the weaknesses of both the church and the preachers, but did not hesitate to affirm very emphatically that it was the greatest organization on earth and I believed in this age would meet the challenge of the period we were facing.

There was a good deal of speculation as to why the parson went to work in the steel plant and especially in this hottest of all jobs. The man who has worn a white collar for years does not often take such a sudden drop. I assure you we got the Turkish baths, four or six every shift. Of course the parson was not expected to last. But my foreman will bear me out that after the first three days Number 2,562 played second fiddle to no one.

I went to work for two reasons: first, because I could see no objective to the church work while the "Flu Ban," was on; second, because I wanted to know the men I worked among, the conditions under which they were working and the hours they had to work.

I am convinced that it has been of mutual benefit. I am sure that it was a practical part of my theological training that has added to my contact with the people of the Park more than all the eloquence of a Henry Ward Beecher could have gained. I became convinced during this experience that there were some things I had said to the men I could not say in the future. I am convinced that the pulpit would leave many things unsaid if it was in more vital contact with the people we talk at. After you have worked with and talked with men you talk at them differently on Sunday.

Hard Work

We worked one week days and one week nights. The day shift was eleven hours and the night shift thirteen hours. If our work was done and no furnaces to tap we were allowed to go home two hours early. On the average we managed to get about one hour; when we changed from the day shift to the night shift we had twenty-four hours on, but when we changed from the night shift to the day shift we had twenty-four hours off. Now just what would one say to men working like that about going to church? All of the men in the plant do not work those hours, but a decided majority, at present. I am sure they need the uplifting influence of the church. I am sure they need some wholesome recreation, and they also need some home life. They can get so little home life that I don't know where they are going to find time for the other. It seems to me that here is a case where much of the family religion has to be attended to by the wives and mothers. It means that Sunday is almost an impossible day for such men to go to church and that the thing we have to do is to have a men's service of some kind in the middle of the week, which we are now planning. I am sure that I cannot complain for lack of co-operation on the part of the men, especially not since I worked shoulder to shoulder with them.

It was interesting to study the crew one worked with. There was such a variety in the plant. There were over a hundred men on the floor where I worked, but only six on the crew of third helpers. Some worked hard to get the next job in their climb up. They tried to go from third helper to second and then to first and so on up. On the whole we had a good crew to work with. But some days when men laid off because they were sick or because they had to for other reasons, we would get new men to fill in from the work gang. One day we had three new men—this was on pay day. We had Soup House Jim. He had to go to the soup house for nourishment twice before noon. While he was gone we had to lift his part of the load. In the afternoon, after we had backwalled a furnace, I said, "Jim, let's go down and finish our work in the pit." He said he was too wet and had to dry up first. I said, "Jim, your trouble is you are too wet inside, not outside." A Little Russian we had on the crew that day began to scowl and partially refused to work after two P. M. After two hours of indifference, the rest of us made up our minds we wanted to know why he refused to do his share. It developed that the paymaster had missed him and he took it as intentional. We sent him to the office for his little envelope, after which work went well.

On Thanksgiving Day, when we all hoped for an easy day, luck, as we call it, was against us. We had to work every minute and then did not get through. It was the hardest day of the month, and after I got home and had a bite of turkey there was only one place for me—the bed. But the most interesting part of Thanksgiving Day was the test it put on the men. One man asked twenty or thirty times what time it was toward quitting time. He was one of the men who wanted his pay check and had no interest in his work. It was a real opportunity in the study of men. On the whole, the men were loyal to their foremen and to the company. Naturally, I made comparisons with the way men work in the churches as I saw the way they worked in the mill.

Talked Plain Truth

It was an experience worth while. We talked the unvarnished truth to each other. Their opinions about the church and the preachers, and the labor conditions were not held in the background after we became acquainted. Some said very plainly that the preachers had a snap job and on the whole were lazy. The last night on the job I spent an hour and a half answering many pointed questions. They covered a wide range of subjects, about some of which I knew something and about some I knew nothing. They were in general about religion. No frankness was spared on either side. I believe both the church, the men and myself were much better off for the experience and it seems to me it is proving mutually helpful. It has been one way into the heart of this steel plant community.

Of course they wanted to know where I stood on the labor question and the church came in for censure on this point, I believe justly so, but not to the extent to which the men wanted to place the blame. However, I said the church stands for justice and righteousness and that I was sure that it would fearlessly fight any battles that were necessary in order that justice might triumph. I was asked, What about the future in the labor world? I am no prophet nor the son of a prophet. I feel these are times for us to do our duty, speak plainly and without fear. I said: "We can learn from one another. The church is your best friend. You are, many of you, talking from the outside in; now come and talk from the inside out. You do not know the church and the church cannot know you as long as you stay at long distance."

I was told when I went to work that I would hear a great many expressions that might grate on my finer sensibilities. For one who had been in the Army Camp for nine months, I felt that the men were really a fine bunch. They did overwork some trite theological phrases and words at times of special excitement. Some men never did and were much interested in the best reading and interested to know what I considered the latest and best books in the religious field. I am hoping, that as the result of this very pleasant experience I had, that the theology of the steel plant may improve as the result of close contact with the church through the parson. I am convinced that the theology of the church will be decidedly improved and that the language of the pulpit will be more intelligible to men who think in the terms of making steel. It was no one-sided affair. Morgan Park will have a steel plant theology.

CAN FEEL WITH THE WORKERS

The flu ban was lifted the last week in November, but I finished the month. When I left the plant one of the men said to me, "Now when the thermometer begins to register thirty and forty below zero and we have to go to work at five in the morning and you stay in bed until seven or eight, just think of us occasionally." It was a gentle reminder that has not left me. Their hours are not just for human beings. We are hoping that after the war situation adjusts itself that it will be different. It has made a difference in my thinking since I left the plant. As I sit in my study or as I go about the community, I often hear one whistle and sometimes two and I know that a furnace has been tapped, some one is saying blow one or blow two. I can feel the men working, making back-wall, fixing the furnace for another heat to start. I know how the sweat is oozing out on every man. I know how hard it is when the furnaces tap one at a time an hour or so apart, but I also know how played out one becomes when three or four furnaces tap almost at the same time. It makes a difference in my thinking and my preaching.

If all our communities were as much of one trade as this one, I would say to every clergyman in the land: "Try it and learn the conditions under which the men live you have to talk to on Sunday. You will enjoy the pay checks." I enjoyed mine and meant to have them photographed. But they did not keep me in the open hearth. I went back to my job with the white collar, with a new vision, with a new purpose, and found a larger service for the church. I know where the other man lives and try to talk to him in the language of his life.

There never was a greater day for the Church. We must lead labor and big business into the idea of service and justice. The days ahead are full of meaning. After the experience of the last few years let's not fail to be heroic, to stand four-square for justice, and to talk in the language of our fellowmen.

The Church and Industry

A Present Duty of Leadership

By Rev. Arthur E. Holt, Ph.D.

Social Service Secretary

For three hundred years Congregationalism has undergirded a system of political democracy with the foundation of spiritual enthusiasm and moral conviction. It has furnished a good conscience for a political order which we are pleased to call democratic. If some one should lead into our community an invading army which would tear down our churches, our schools, our courthouses and our places of business, he would not thoroughly have injured our social order. But if some one should lead in an invasion of bad ideas, which destroyed our faith in God, destroyed our faith in righteousness according to law, destroyed our faith in homelife and destroyed our faith in the necessity of an intelligent public, though these buildings still stood, they would remain unused, for there would have been destroyed that which makes these buildings necessary. It has been the function of the Church to lead into our American life an invasion of right ideas about God, salvation and human duty, which have laid the firm foundation for this superstructure we call our American civilization.

IN AN ECONOMIC AGE

We are approaching an age whose dominant interest is no longer political, but economic. There is a demand that the Church shall do for the industrial order what during the last generation it has done for the political order. Men are asking it to undergird the economic order with a foundation of spiritual enthusiasm and of moral sentiment. This is no self-appointed intrusion on the part of the Church into a realm where it is not welcome. On a Sunday afternoon last winter two men, high in the counsels of the financial world, one a great statistician and the other a great banker, made approximately the same statement before two Boston audiences. It was their affirmed belief that stability and security would not be restored to our industrial life until the Church should bring to bear upon that life the moral and spiritual control which it once exercised when American industrial conditions were less complex. Now what is it that these men are seeking?

I suppose it is something like this: In the early history of our country, industry was simple. Men produced in households for neighborhood consumption. The situation was simple and the moral values were adequate to guarantee honesty of service and the sanction of religion fell upon the man who led the productive. He felt that in his daily toil he was serving his God, serving his fellowman, making a living, and making a life. But American industry is no longer simple.

Men are seeking for motive power and sources of control in the gigantic system which we have erected. It is not a different question than they asked when we mobilized the fighting forces of the nation in the recent war. It is a question of the morale of the workers. When the fighting power of America was organized for participation in the world struggle, men who knew the deep sources of energy in human nature said that it was impossible for men to fight well unless they had something of a religious passion for their task. They called upon the Church to co-operate through its Christian Associations, its chaplains, and its various organized agencies in building the morale of the soldiers. Men are now saying that men will not work well unless every man feels when he goes to his work that he is not only making a living but that he is making a life, serving his God and serving his fellowman. And they are calling upon the Church to undergird the processes of industry with determining foundations of spiritual enthusiasm and moral sentiment. They are asking the Church, as it once taught in a simpler state of industry that the world was too small to harbor those who lie and loaf and cheat and steal, to teach that the laws of God still operate and the world is too small for those who lie and loaf and steal and cheat.

HOW THE CHURCH CAN MEET THE CHALLENGE

Now if the Church is to meet this challenge, and I am inclined to think that it should, there are certain conditions which must be met to guarantee success.

If the Church is to bring morale back into the industrial order, it must pay the price of being in touch with that order. The last century saw the extension of the Church over wide geographical areas, following the extension of our population into the agricultural regions of the West. The problem in church building was the problem of the multiplication of the family church in village, county seat and residential communities. With the growth of our great factories, where the population lives in tenements, where home life is meager, the Church has faced new problems in its extension. Many interests which were once satisfied by the home must now be satisfied by the Church. We cannot avoid the conclusion that, even as the Church went into the army camp equipped with special workers and a specialized type of building, so a co-operative Protestantism must gird itself for a more serious venture into our great industrial centers.

I lived for five years in a great industrial city. I have seen denominational secretaries come to that city armed with a camera and notebook. They have photographed its buildings and tabulated its statistics. The photographs they have reduced to stereopticon slides and then have returned to their constituencies asking for money and showing the character of the community in which they professed to be doing work. They did not tell their constituency that they were represented in that community by a little piece of denominational effort which was about as effective in meeting the needs of the situation as a man would be who tried to put out the fires of hell with a garden sprinkler. I have never been able to rid myself of the idea that they were getting money under false pretenses. No man meant to be dishonest, but the skill of the denominations in publicity has outrun their ability in performance. If we do not succeed in squaring our performance with our publicity, there will be Texas Oil Promoters who will go into the Kingdom of Heaven before some of our denominational publicity agents.

THE MESSAGE

The second condition of success in putting morale back into industry has to do with the quality of the message which our ministers carry. Very early in the war the religious workers in the army camps were called together, and it was made very clear to them that it was possible to preach a gospel which weakened instead of strengthened the morale of the fighting forces. They were told that not all voices had the power to put fire into the souls of men, that certain men brought messages which made men indifferent to the human values which those who had entered the war sought to conserve. They were not questioning the orthodoxy of any man, but they were questioning the ability of some men to discriminate between what was essential and what was non-essential Christianity. It was a matter of guarding against a misplaced emphasis in religion.

Emphasis is critical wherever men use words. If I were to advertise myself as a lighthouse keeper, you would thrill with something of emotion. If I were to advertise myself as a light housekeeper, your emotional response would be very modern. And yet the difference is only a matter of emphasis. If I were to assemble the hosts of Protestantism, I would find that all would claim to be Bible Christians. Here would come the Holy Roller with his mental and physical gyrations and would justify himself as a seeker after New Testament experience. Here would come the Mormon with his Bible under his arm and his seven wives under his roof, and here would come the man who treats his Bible as a ouija board with which he can so successfully foretell future events that the reading of the daily newspaper is superfluous. All would be Bible Christians and would differ so widely in what they found in the Bible as to indicate after all that the real test of your message is in what you claim in that Book is to be considered as essential.

The Literary Digest some time ago carried a story about a trial in which the evidence on the basis of which a certain prominent man was convicted was all based on what somebody saw through a keyhole. The Digest had a cartoon which illustrated how a man looking through a keyhole might see certain things and report them faithfully, but what he reported would be so partial as to be a lie about the whole situation in that room. Now the truth is never told by partial reports. The keyhole theologian has often stampeded the Church. A certain Methodist bishop once said that Bible verses ought to be marked like railroad tickets: "Not good if detached." No religion will ever light up the dark pathways of modern industry which does not know how to teach men the moral and spiritual significance of the ways in which they earn their daily bread.

THE EDUCATION THAT IS NEEDED

But the method of the Church, if we are to put morale back into industry, must be something more than just a message from the pulpit. The goal we have in mind cannot be reached until we rewrite our whole system of moral and religious education. Vocational training is a big word in our modern schools and every word which has been set forth I would emphasize with a profound AMEN! But many of us have not yet seen that this training of the boy and the girl to enter the modern industrial world equipped in hand and head throws upon the Church an equal obligation to see that this same boy and girl go equipped in those moral and spiritual virtues which alone will guarantee how economic power is to be used. We have already taken steps along this line. We have taught tithing in the Church, seeking to guarantee that the boy's money will be rightly spent. Why is it not logical to teach the ethics of industry in order to guarantee that his money will be rightly earned? We have taught temperance to the boy and the girl in order to guarantee that their substance shall not be wasted in riotous living. Why is it not logical to teach the laws of industry, in order to guarantee that there shall be money to be conserved?

We need to take our boys and girls and allow them to see the grains of wheat which are placed in the ground by human labor. We need to let them see the growth of this wheat into the harvest. To help them follow it after the harvest into the channels of distribution, and from the channels of distribution into the avenues of consumption. And we need to teach them that this whole process of production, distribution and consumption in any field is as sacred as human life itself, and whoever lays unholy hands upon it in selfish action is an enemy of mankind. In some realms we already recognize that selfish action is intolerable. We have yet to teach that it is intolerable everywhere. There is not one law of service for the minister and another law for the farmer. There is not one law of service for the soldier and an opposite law for the merchant. There is but one law of associated living and that is the law of service.

SAFE FOR MAN WITH IDEALS

But if the Church is going to train men for idealistic action in the world of industry, it cannot stop short of making the world of industry safe for those who accept its ideals. As some one has expressed it: "The Church must become a militant organization and make society safe for saved men." It was possible for the Church to have busied itself by urging men to accept the old individualistic temperance pledge. It would have accomplished good, but it would have made life hard for its members, for the world outside would have gone on its riotous, booze-consuming way. Rather, the Church decided to make the Church safe for the temperance man. It went into the field to win a majority vote for temperance. It outlawed the saloon from good society. It stripped the brewer from his reputation for piety and patriotism.

Something like this the Church must do in the realm of industry. If it is to urge upon them the ideal of the productive life, then the world must become safe for the man who leads the productive life. There can be no morale in the army when the cowards are rewarded and the heroes punished. If the Church is to make the world safe for the man who leads the productive life, it must become unsafe for the man who does not lead it.

Two men were discussing the high cost of living. One of them admitted the great increase in price of the products which he manufactured. His explanation was as follows: "The price of raw material has gone up from twenty-five cents to one dollar. The price of labor has advanced from one dollar to two dollars and seventy-five cents," and then he said, "we have checked up to the people the war taxes which the government has imposed upon us." When the ordinary young man found his name in the selective draft and proceeded to check up to some one else his responsibilities as a citizen in the conduct of the war, he lost his reputation for piety and went to the penitentiary. This manufacturer happened to be on his way to California to spend the winter fully equipped with an undisturbed reputation for patriotism and for piety. The Church cannot urge ideals of productive living upon people and allow this to go on. That type of citizenship is destroying the morale of our whole social order. It cannot be tolerated in capitalists or laboring men. The laboring man who holds up a community through combinations of labor should be classed with the other enemies of public welfare.

REGARD FOR PERSONALITY

For a like reason, if the Church is to urge its ideals upon the individual, it will accept as final no social order which does not challenge those expressions of personality which distinctly mark man as a son of God. An eminent agriculturist was once lecturing to a group of boys on "How to make corn-growing interesting." He said, "That is interesting in which you invest will power, purpose and intelligence. Drudgery is always found wherever action has been reduced to habit." No social order can have the loyalty of men which does not tap these well-springs of human enthusiasm. Man desires to invest his whole personality. An order of industry which does not challenge the threefold loyalty of hand and heart and brain, which does not call for the investment of will power, purpose and intelligence, cannot satisfy the deepest aspirations of the human spirit.

Our Church, by the compulsion of a great tradition, is committed to declaring this message to our modern social order. We have maintained in the past against an overbearing ecclesiasticism the right of the human individual to think his own thoughts and invest his own will power, purpose and intelligence in his ecclesiastical affairs. We have thrown the sanction of religious approval over a political order which has given to man the right of self-expression in government. By all these traditions we are committed in the coming days to hold that no industrial order which does not offer an opportunity for every man to invest his whole personality, can hope to have the abiding loyalty of men. Amid all the confusing cries of the present, one detects the deep human cry, not for more pay and shorter hours, but for work with more meaning, work with more spiritual challenge, work in which men shall feel that it gives them an opportunity to make a living, to make a life, to serve their fellowman and to do the will of God.

For the Sick in Hospitals or at Home:

Come with thy help and healing, Lord of life and helper of the weak. Deliver and sustain thy suffering children. Give strength for endurance, where pain must come, and sustaining in that transition from this world to the true home of the soul which we have feared with a dread which only thy promise and thy presence can cure. The Building of the Temple

International Sunday School Lesson for Sept. 5. 1 Kings 8: 1-11.

The lesson text for the day has to do only with a part of the dedication service of Solomon's temple. The real lesson text begins with Ch. 5 and the whole section, barring the details concerning the sacred furniture, ought to be read in preparation.

How much did personal vanity or desire for fame enter into Solomon's action? How much was it the result of a genuinely reverent desire to honor God?

It was a stupendous enterprise. Solomon worked it out in co-operation with King Hiram. The personnel was as follows:

Workmen	30,000
Burden bearers	70,000
Hewers	80,000
Overseers	3,300
	183,300

This enormous number of laborers was employed for seven years in the gigantic task. Surely, this was one of the greatest building enterprises that the world ever has seen. The result must have been sublimely beautiful.

1. The Old and the New. The dedication of the new temple was linked up with the holiest experiences of the past as the ark of the covenant, containing the stone tables on which the Ten Commandments were carved, was brought from Zion (David's sacred location) to be enshrined in the oracle of the new temple of Solomon. How truly this illustrates the principle of development in religion. It is always enlarging and taking on new forms. And the best in the old is constantly being taken over and enshrined in the new. Without the old the new would be without meaning or value. Unless the old ark could find a new shrine it would pass out of the life of the people. How does this principle work out in our own personal religion? Do you suppose that some of the people criticized the change from the old to the new?

2. The Shrine. It bore different names; but it was the sacred place where God was supposed to dwell. Its existence calls up the whole question of the relation of the spiritual to the physical, which is the central truth involved in the lesson today. In one sense it was not necessary for Solomon to build a temple for God. The Infinite does not need either a shrine or a form in order to be real. God did not need the temple; but Solomon and the people did. We are human and finite. We depend upon the material because we are physical beings. Note, therefore, the following principles:

1. Our noblest service and hardest work is due our God.

2. Our religion is an enlarging experience demanding new forms of expression.

3. Our church is a symbol of God's presence, a physical means to a spiritual end.

4. The best temple of God is a pure heart.

A. The Supremacy of the Spiritual. The only reason that finally warranted the building of the temple and the cost of its up-keep was the service that it performed in keeping the sense of God's reality alive among the people. God must be affirmed and the spiritual must be demonstrated. Since a shrine was the necessary symbol to this end the temple was justified. But always the reality of God must be kept paramount and clear. The oracle was made to speak about God.

B. Danger of Substituting Form for Spirit. The ceaseless peril of substituting the symbol for the truth which it represented beset the people. Before they were aware of the danger they might be putting their shrine in the place of their God. Idolatry lurks as a deadly menace in all worship. A stained glass window may be something to look at or something to look through. Here is one; it represents Christ the Good Shepherd. It is a glorious thing when the sunlight falls through it under right conditions. It is the pride of the church. And sometimes the tendency of the people who worship in the beautiful church is to adore their window rather than to see by means of it a new vision of the Christ whose blessed image it bears.

C. The Right Use of the Shrine. The symbol is meant to declare the truth, the spiritual reality; and he uses his shrine best who comes closest to God by means of it. The way to use a church, therefore, is to let it become the instrument leading us to God. It is like an astronomer's telescope. He is a student of the stars; but he needs the help of his physical apparatus to come near enough to study their distant splendor. A wise astronomer makes his telescope a means to an end; he keeps its purpose paramount; he does not worship it, he uses it.

Fine Arts in Religion

Under the above caption a great American University has just announced its profound conviction that "The Church must again become the mother of artists and the generous patron of their works." It has assembled an unusual group of outstanding artists as a permanent faculty for a distinct department of fine arts in religion. This faculty of the School of Religious Education and Social Service of Boston University will undertake to train leadership that will enable the Church to use music, art and pageantry as instruments in spiritualizing individual, community and national life. A large number of courses are offered for which students may receive regular academic credits leading to University degrees. The courses are grouped under the following significant headings:

I. Music in the Services of the Church and Community.

II. Poetry and Ritual in the Services of the Church and Community.

III. Art in the Services of the Church and Community.

IV. Pageantry and Visualization in the Service of the Church and Community.

A survey of the past year in the field of pageantry and drama alone will reveal the following activities:

Methodist Episcopal Church: The Centenary Celebration at Columbus, O., included over 200 demonstrations of life plays and pageants, the most significant of which was the "Wayfarer" which was repeated under the auspices of the Interchurch World Movement at New York City, during the holiday season.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society had its 50th anniversary at Symphony Hall, Boston, and gave "Adana—The Woman of the Nations."

At the General Conference in Des Moines, nearly a score of different plays and pageants were given depicting the work of different Boards.

The 25th anniversary of the Morgan Memorial, recently celebrated at Tremont Temple, Boston, produced a remarkable pageant, "Through Labor to Love, or The Rainbow of Promise."

The conservation work of the Joint Centenary Committee included within its scope a Pageantry Division which has already prepared six pageants and plays which are now being extensively advertised in the Methodist Book Concern.

Episcopal: During the past year the Episcopal Church has conducted a nation-wide campaign in the interest of pageantry and drama. Under its direction the pageant entitled "The Builders of the City of God," was successfully produced in more than a thousand Episcopal churches in the United States. In St. George's Church, New York City, three noteworthy presentations of Nativity and Miracle Plays were given in the Chancel and Sanctuary. At a recent meeting in New York City the presiding Bishop of the Council authorized its Religious Education Secretary of the Religious Education Department to investigate the whole question of dramas and pageants and to submit a report and recommend a program for 1920-1921. Mr. Percy Burrell, a recognized authority in these fields, has been made Chairman of the Pageantry Commission and a substantial budget has been placed at his disposal.

Baptists: Northern Baptist Convention at Buffalo presented several Musical Educational Plays. The First Baptist Church at Seattle, Wash., has recently presented "The Servant in the House," by a company of church players.

Presbyterians: The Woman's Foreign Board of the Presbyterian Church celebrated its fiftieth anniversary at the Metropolitan Opera House in Philadelphia with a pageant entitled "The Lifted Cross."

Congregational: The International Church Centenary Council of the Congregational Church presented several musical plays in connection with historic meetings recently held in Boston. Pilgrim Church, Seattle, Wash., organized the Seattle Pilgrim Community Players. First Church, Evanston, Ill., has its Pilgrim Players and presents such plays as "Ruth the Gleaner," "The Child Moses" and the "Prodigal Son."

Interdenominational and independent agencies are also active in the development of drama and pageantry in the fields of religion. The

THE HOUR OF PRAYER

Adventure with Christ

Comment on the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for Aug. 29-Sept. 4

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN

Scripture Passage. Matt. 4 : 17-25 ; 19 : 16-30.

The Spirit of Adventure in the Church of Today. They left their nets and followed him. One of them, perhaps both, were married; they risked the living of their wives and families. How great must have been the charm which drew them! Is there anything like it in the life of the church today? Is there any similar experience in our own lives? When the church loses that spirit of adventure—that sense of a great task and opportunity to venture in the companionship of a great and beloved leader—it loses its true hold both on its own members and on the community. Church life can never flourish in an unnoticed and overshadowed corner, any more than a tree can flourish in the shade. The church is to call attention to its life and work, not so much by skillful advertising as by the adventurous life of obedience and service. The trouble with advertising—which should be skillful if it is to be used at all—is that there must be something worth while to advertise. If the members of the church are marked out by admirable living and self-denying works, not much other advertising will be necessary. But it must not be logy living or perfunctory work. We must also serve our own generation. A church should not be doing exactly what the fathers did in exactly the same way. It must cut loose from precedent for Christ's sake and when Christ leads.

Perils of Timidity. Very good people, and groups of people, are of very little use in the world because they are too timid to show enterprise in order to carry out their aims. If they have no aims the case is far worse. A good use of this meeting would be to raise the questions: Exactly what do we wish to accomplish in this community? Have we any plans? Are we accomplishing anything? Are we standing in the light of others because we are too shy to take a risk? We must reckon here with differences and individualities of communities. No church can model itself exactly on another. No pastor moving to a new field finds exactly the same problems.

Adventure with Christ Our School of Truth Seeking. The only way to learn in all the realms of our spiritual experience is to put our faith to the test in doing something. Christ taught his disciples in all sorts of places, but never once in a schoolhouse. He introduced them to life by calling them to follow him. He taught them to evangelize by sending them out with a message. And that is his method now. The sorrowful fact with many of us is that we are more afraid of making mistakes than of disappointing Christ by our inert refusals to venture in his service. One might enumerate the mistakes of the disciples: but the important thing is not that they blundered but that they learned by blundering. It is better to make blunders in Christ's companionship than to make the irreparable mistake of the servant in the parable who risked no blunders because he would not assume the responsibility of investing his talent for God.

LIMITATIONS AND DELIVERANCES

He hath hedged me about, that I cannot get forth. Lam. 3 : 7.

Everywhere we look we find our life encompassed by limitations. God has "beset us behind and before, and laid his hand upon us." We see, also, that this limitation of life is not the source of weakness, but of man's highest power and fame. It is not only for little men in little things, but for human life at its best and greatest. The strong man, the great man, whether hero or artist, poet, thinker, or saint, is not one who bursts the bonds of law and casts obedience away, but rather one who walks a narrower, severer path than weaker men are able to keep.—Theodore C. Williams.

I shall yet praise Him—though blossoms have withered,
Empty the fold is and barren the field,
All the fair promise of harvest has vanished,
Fig-tree and olive have failed of their yield.

I shall yet praise Him—though the mist shrouds me,
Though through the darkness there shineth no star,
Though long delayed be the word of His counsel,
And to all seeming He hideth afar.

I shall yet praise Him for victory given;
Though fierce the sifting, His prayer cannot fail.
Till the fourth watch He may leave me in darkness;
Then clouds shall lift and the light shall prevail.

I shall yet praise Him—mute mouth filled with laughter,
Silent lips opened and tongue used to song;
Surely praise waiteth; joy, sown for my reaping,
Cometh to harvest, though lingering long.
—Annie Johnson Flint.

Stars may be seen from the bottom of a deep well, when they cannot be discovered from the top of a mountain. So are many things learned in adversity which the prosperous man dreams not of.—C. H. Spurgeon.

O Thou who hast brought hope into our mortal life by the assurance of our Lord's rising again as the first-fruits of his brethren, help us to be more worthy of our immortality. Give us courage for all experiences, and suffer us not to be so tamely subject to the vexations of these passing days. Spirit of God, by whom we live, keep us ever in a joy above complainings. Let us not murmur when the way is hard, but rather with all gratitude remember that it is the way and thou our Guide. Help us to draw from deeper wells, that we may taste refreshment of the living water. Make all our days thy care and be thou in all our confidence an inward peace. Richly hast thou endowed us; give us grateful and expectant hearts to find thee everywhere. O Thou, our Rest! let no disturbing or unrestful word find outlet through the door of our lips; but make us always bringers of good cheer, to the glory of Christ. Amen.

Christ's Power with Me

Comment on the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for Sept. 5–11

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: What Christ Does for the Christian. John 15 : 1-8, 14-16. (Consecration meeting.)

Light from the Bible Passage

Previously Jesus had had continual personal contact with his disciples. Now he must soon be separated from them. Before he goes he would impress upon them the necessity of their being continually united with him in a spiritual sense. Fruit-bearing is not a privilege Christians can enjoy or not, as they choose. It is an expectation Christ has in us. Fruit grows when the branches are in such contact with the vine that they get its life. The Christian gets this for his work from Christ. The "life" comes through prayer to him, belief in him, clinging to him, catching our soul-motive from him. Such contact enables us to live up to the Father's confidence in us.

Leads for Leaders

Many societies do not hold regular meetings through July and August. If yours is one of these, the subject for this meeting is especially choice. No finer topic could be selected for the first fall meeting than this—What Christ can do for me. The consecration thought should lead to the commitment of ourselves to him as the one who alone can make us Christ-ones.

A suggestive line would be to spend a few minutes thinking what life would be without Christ. Just how much could we do and would we do?

Jesus wanted fishers of men. What did he do to make them successful?

He wanted witnesses for him. What did he do to make them successful?

He wanted earnest workers, patient burden-bearers, prayer-full and faith-full followers. What was his contribution to their success?

Thoughts for Members

"If a friend is one who summons us to our best, then is not Jesus Christ our best friend? He looks not back to our past with a critical eye, but to our future, with a hopeful one. The Master appeals from what we have been to what we may be."

"For me to live is Christ." "In him, as a plant in soil, in rain and sunshine, we are to live, growing up by him and into him. In his name we are to work, to pray, to suffer, and to rejoice, and at last to go home."

In the glad morning of my day,
My life to give, my vows to pay,
With no reserve and no delay,
With all my heart I come.
Just as I am, young, strong and free,
To be the best that I can be
For truth, and righteousness, and thee,
Lord of my life, I come.
—Hearn.

A Moment of Prayer

We thank thee, O Father, for the matchless pattern thou hast given us in Jesus Christ. We would see him and have his likeness in us. Bring us then, we pray, into fresh contact with him that our lives may be of the greatest usefulness to thee. Amen.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

On American Affairs

How We Advertised America, by George Creel (Harpers). A thorough report of the varied work of the Committee on Public Information. Without doubt the effort of this department to educate the mind of America by pamphlets, films, posters, news items, four-minute men, etc. and to carry word of our undertakings to the ends of the earth was one of the great exploits of the war time. Over one hundred and fifty thousand men and women took active part. Mr. Creel throws much light on the difficulties of the situation and the narrative is interesting and stirring reading. He uses severe language with reference to certain members of Congress but not without cause.

Ladies of Grecourt, by Ruth Gaines (Dutton). Another delightful and stirring volume on the reconstruction work carried on by the Smith College Relief Unit within fifteen miles from the Somme front line trenches. It begins with August, 1917, in the country from which the Germans were retreating, leaving devastation in their track. Sixteen villages were allotted to the Unit as their territory. They found all buildings destroyed, trees cut to the ground, and wells poisoned and they began to rebuild. Then came the German advance in 1918 and the consequent retreat of the relief work until the Armistice. There is an interesting chapter on Community Planning which indicates the unconquered spirit with which France takes up the problems of reconstruction, and more accounts of the peace time aid rendered by the Unit. It is a fine record of a worthy undertaking.

Labor and the Employer, by Samuel Gompers (Dutton). A companion volume to "Labor and the Common Welfare." It contains extracts from addresses and papers by Mr. Gompers on such themes as Ethics of High Wages, The Shorter Working Day, The Union Shop and the "Open" Shop, Child Labor and Women in Industry, Industrial Warfare, Profit Sharing, etc. The workman's side of the discussion in these and other labor matters is ably presented. It is very important that all fair-minded men should hear this side. The other side is familiar enough and finds abundant space in the daily press.

The War, the World and Wilson, by George Creel (Harper). An administration book explaining why Roosevelt was not permitted to go to France, the treatment of General Wood, the Shantung situation, the attitude of the Peace Treaty toward Germany—the criticisms of Keynes, etc. Mr. Creel is a vigorous writer and deals lavishly in superlatives, both in criticism and defense. He writes clearly and entertainingly, but does not carry conviction. He is always bitterly anti-British and laudatory of all the war accomplishments of Americans. The judicious reader can glean much valuable information.

A Sea Trip in Clipper Ship Days, by Mary Matthews Bray (Badger). Now that the great Era of the American Merchant Marine has passed into history there is value in such simple annals as this. The author and her sister sailed with their father, the Captain, from Boston to New Orleans, then to Liverpool and to India. The soothing monotony of life on shipboard was broken by few vicissitudes. Coming to land the sisters enjoyed strange sights and the good times which always abounded in the ranks of their father's warm-hearted profession.

A New Lowell Volume

The Function of the Poet, and Other Essays, by James Russell Lowell (Houghton Mifflin). It is a delightful surprise to receive another volume of essays bearing the name of James Russell Lowell; and to find its contents to be, as the editor says, "In literary merit nowise inferior" to the volumes he collected himself. Doubtless of most value are the longer essays on "The Function of the Poet," "Humor, Wit, Fun, and Satire," "The Imagination," etc., but we confess to exceptional interest in Mr. Lowell's reviews of Howell's "Venetian Life," when that author was still a young man, and Whittier's "Snow Bound," and Longfellow's "Courtship of Miles Standish," and other volumes written in the sixties. The collection closes with a delightful example of Lowell's humor, in "A Plea for Freedom from Speech and Figures of Speech-Makers."

Poetry and Drama

Poems, by Cecil Roberts (Stokes). An appreciative introduction is written by John Masefield and lovers of poetry will agree with him that this is one of the notable volumes which will survive. The author is a journalist and war correspondent and many of his poems voice the tragedies of the war, but most of the material concerns life and love and the beauty of the world of nature. It is real poetry in form and sentiment.

Youth Riding, by Mary Carolyn Davies (Macmillan). Many of these poems have attracted recent attention in the magazines. The lyric gift of Miss Davies is unquestionable and often admirable, and her dramatic brevity not only catches but holds attention. The lyrics often have an immediacy of appeal to emotional experience which gives them power. The heart and thought of them is of the town, and yet the love of the open air is a large part of their charm.

From the Desert, by John Wesley Holloway (Neal Pub. Co.). This little volume of verse introduces a poet of the colored race, who reminds one of the late Paul Lawrence Dunbar. Pathos, humor—largely humor—and religion are woven into the poems. Many of them bear the mark of poetic genius and are soul-stirring in their appeal.

Starved Rock, by Edgar Lee Masters (Macmillan). There is much more variety, both of subject matter and metrical form, in Mr. Masters' new book of verse than in his earlier volumes and most of the poems are comparatively brief. He has stepped away from Spoon River and registers his unsatirical reactions to the beauty of the world as well as to human experience in the conditions of America. In this departure from a limiting conception and method of expression and this variety of subject and interest, the collection will be a real addition to knowledge of the author's power and scope.

Some Greek Masterpieces in Dramatic and Bucolic Poetry, by William Stebbing, M. A. (T. Fisher Unwin). The sense and the delight of scholarship which linger in England are suggested by Mr. Stebbing's attempts to express the spirit of Greek dramatic and bucolic verses in English measures. He is not hindered by the feeling that he is attempting an impossible task, and one gets from his verses a genuine sense of classical thought, and often of the classical power of expression.

Swords and Flutes, by William Kean Seymour (T. Fisher Unwin). There is a distinct difference of note in the English and American poetry of the day. Recent volumes from the other side of the Atlantic illustrate this difference. Here, for example, is a volume inspired mainly by the war, in which Mr. Seymour gives us his reaction from its experiences and sufferings, and then passes on to poems of the beautiful outside world, of friendship and of admiration. The environment is English. The lyrical note is fine and clear.

Dunsany the Dramatist, by Edward Hale Bierstadt (Little, Brown). A new and enlarged edition, containing interesting material not in the earlier volume. It presents a brief biographical sketch, a critical chapter on Dunsany's plays and short stories, a chapter on "his Philosophy," and a section of letters. The interpretation of the plays is most interesting and valuable.

A Prisoner of Pentonville, by "Red Brand" (Putnam). Pentonville is a prison in London and these are the poems of a prisoner who Rev. J. Fort Newton tells us in his introduction, was convicted largely on technical grounds. They express the soul experiences of a man suddenly cut off from his habits and hopes in life and from his family. The current of feeling runs strongly and the whole book is a human document which grips and holds attention.

The Golden Whales of California, by Vachel Lindsay (Macmillan).

The Second Book of Modern Verse, selected by Jessie B. Rittenhouse (Houghton Mifflin).

The Social Plays of Arthur Wing Pinero. Vol. III, Letty, and His House in Order (Dutton).

Contemporary Drama of Italy, by Lander MacClintock (Little, Brown).

Blue Smoke, by Karle Wilson Baker (Yale University Press).

Poems, by Robert Underwood Johnson (Yale University Press).

Reynard the Fox, by John Masefield (Macmillan).

Rhymes of a Homesteader, by Elliott C. Lincoln (Houghton Mifflin).

Miscellaneous

Pluriverse, by Benjamin Paul Blood (Marshall Jones).

The Natural History of the Child, by Dr. Courtenay Dunn (John Lane).

How to Speak French Like the French, by Marie and Jeanne Yersin (Lippincott).

Rural Science Reader, by Samuel B. McCready (D. C. Heath).

Stories for Talks to Boys, by F. H. Cheley (Association Press).

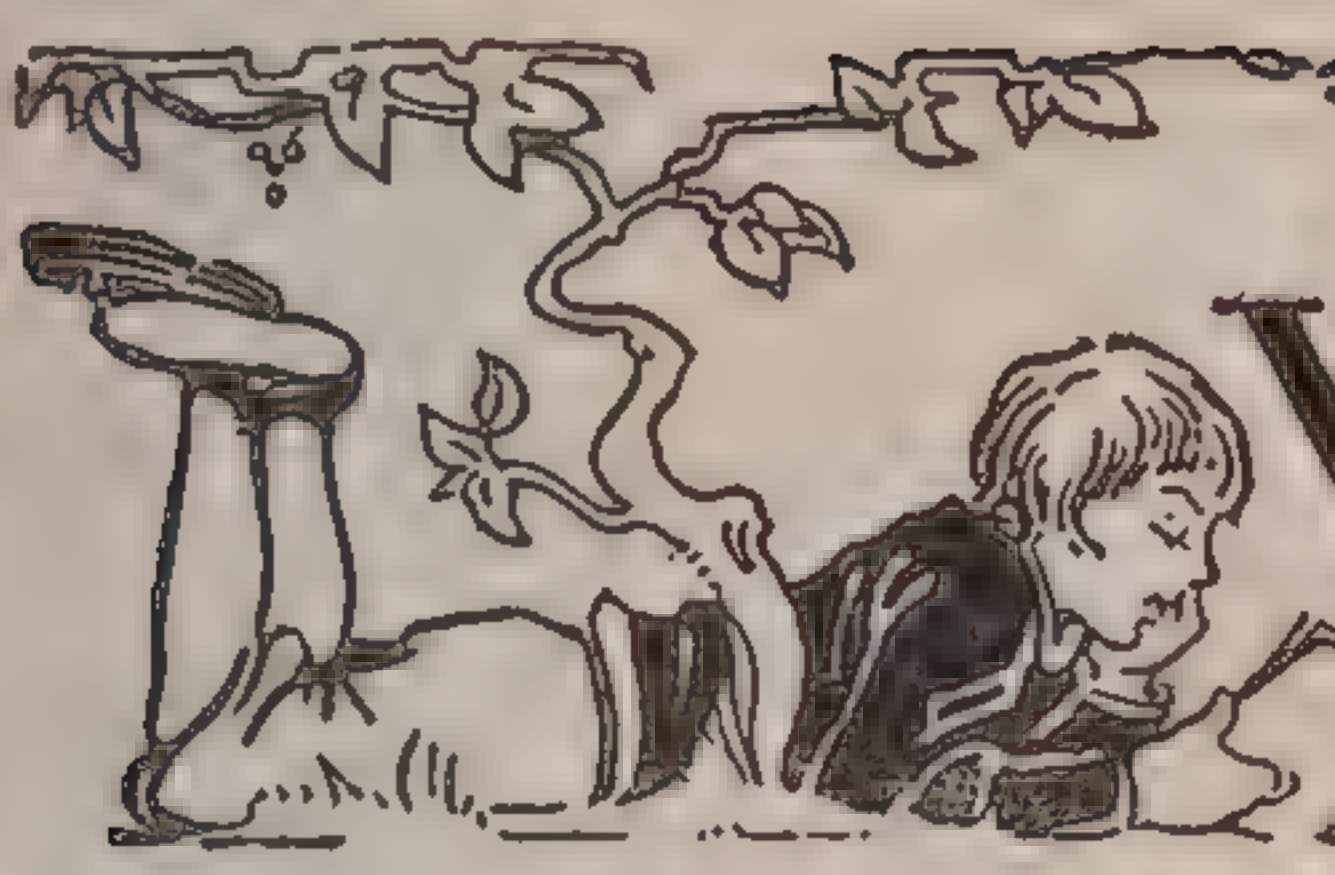
Walter Camp's Handbook on Health (Appleton).

The Modern Pistol and How to Shoot It, by Walter Winans (Putnams).

The Message of Anne Simon, transcribed by her husband (Badger).

The Christian Adventure, by A. Herbert Gray (Association Press).

Psychical Miscellanea, by Arthur Hill (Harcourt, Brace & Howe).



WITH THE CHILDREN

A Robinson Crusoe Adventure

By Caroline Benedict Burrell

If we had only studied our French in school, this story would not have happened, but Billy said it was a silly language, so we decided not to bother with it. It was easy enough not to learn anything, because this was the way they taught it: the teacher came in every day and said, "Bon jour," and we had to say it back, then she just talked on alone and you didn't listen.

The family said we'd be sorry, because Mother and Helen, Billy's big sister, and Mabel, my big sister, and Billy and I were all going to Paris in the summer; but we thought we'd get along somehow.

Sure enough, we did get on first-rate at first. We learned where the busses went and could go all by ourselves and back all right; the folks worried at first, but after we'd been to the Eiffel Tower and the Invalids alone they said we could go anywhere.

At last one night the girls said, "Let's go out to Robinson's tomorrow; that'll amuse the boys."

Of course we said right off we didn't want to go, because it didn't sound as if we'd like it, but Mother explained that it was a place named after Robinson Crusoe and you ate your lunch in the top of a tree; that sounded something like, so we concluded we'd go.

The next day we all went, Mother and Mabel and Helen and Billy and I. We took a train to a little town and walked up a long hill and came to a place where a lot of donkeys were tied up with saddles on them, and beyond these a great big picture of Robinson Crusoe with his goat and fur cap, and gun and all, painted on a board. He looked fine. There were ever so many great big chestnut trees all around, the biggest I ever saw, and little rooms like nests built in the branches, all the way up, with winding staircases between.

When we began to go up Mother said she thought she liked the lowest room best, and Helen and Mabel said they had to go a little higher because of the view, and Billy and I said at once that there was no use in having lunch in a tree if you didn't have it in the toppermost place of all; so they groaned, and said they supposed they'd have to, and we went up.

After lunch we wanted to go down and ride the donkeys, but Mother was afraid till she looked down and saw how the donkey men led them up and down by the nose, with little girls sitting just as easy in the saddles. She said we might go if we'd be careful, and not fall, and keep clean, and come back soon, so we raced down.

It was good fun for a while, for we played we were Crusoe and Friday being chased across the island by the savages and we galloped the donkeys as hard as they would go. The road was pretty straight and we knew we could turn around any time and could not get lost if we tried, so we just went on. After a good while Billy said we'd better turn around, and we tried, but those donkeys didn't see it that way, and the more we sawed and pulled at their mouths, the more they stuck their noses between their knees and wouldn't turn a bit. Still, we thought they would pretty soon, but at last the road began to bend around corners, till we were all turned around. Then we got rather sober, because we knew Mother would surely be frightened.

"Let's slide off and walk back, and let the old donkeys go on," I said at last, because it was getting a little dark; and Billy said, "All right."

He did slide off and only got bumped a little on the ground, but somehow my foot got twisted in the stirrup and my head knocked pretty hard on a stone, and the first thing I knew I was lying in the ditch with the donkeys out of sight, and Billy was—but I promised I would not tell that.

He felt better after I sat up. Some men were in a field not far off and they came running up and jabbered French at us; we talked English back just as loud as we could, but somehow they didn't seem to understand; then we pointed along the road and said the name of the town we came from, but that didn't do any good either, and when they found I couldn't walk, and Billy wasn't going to leave me, they said a lot of things and shrugged their shoulders and went off. It was something like a palaver between Crusoe and Friday and the savages, only they weren't cannibals.

Well, they all waited for us at Robinson's, and when we did not come they got frightened, just as we expected. Then they talked French to the donkey men, and at last they all started out to find us, but they took one of the wrong turns, and that was why we had so long to wait.

Well, of course they did come finally, and the girls scolded and Mother cried and they made the men ride off and get a cart from somewhere or other and take us to the train. It was pretty late when we got back to Paris, I can tell you, and the next day my ankle was awfully bad, and I had to stay indoors two whole weeks, which was a regular moral lesson. After that we came home and school began. Billy and I didn't tell anybody about our vow, but of course we had to keep it, so we are taking French this year and learning to talk it, in case of any more adventures coming our way.

The Comrades' Corner

Dear Comrades:

You are patient waiters. They say they are no losers. That remains to be seen. Anyway I agreed a couple of weeks ago to write to you about the most perfect light in the world. So here goes.

I wonder if you have ever walked through the woods at night after a rain or a damp "spell?" And did you ever happen to see ahead something that startled you? It looked like a dull light. And when you reached the spot where it was you found nothing more amazing than an old decayed stump. The light part was not something burning, but simply a peculiar thing called phosphorus.

When I was a boy, we used to buy a little piece of this phosphorus at a drug store, put it in a little bottle and carry it around in our pockets. There was not much light to it, but we used to think there was.

Light is odd, after all, especially what we call artificial light. Did you ever see any of the old stone lamps they had in ancient days? You can see pictures of them in an encyclopedia. Then came the same sort of lamps, only they were made of bronze. Peculiar wicks were used; no chimneys, of course; and grease rather than oil. How they must have smoked! One paid for his light with a smudge of smoke.

Candles were better when they began to be used. Did you ever see any old people make candles? Possibly you know a noted man who as a boy was a candlemaker in a shop. A candle, however, does not give very much light, and it would take a good many to make enough illumination for an ordinary room, wouldn't it? You certainly would hate to go back to them now, wouldn't you?

Today you use either lamps, gas or electricity. One of the things that you may have noticed is that most of the "goodness," or at least a large part of it is wasted. What you wish to get is light; what you get in the largest quantity is heat. Father's oil, gas or electricity bill would be ever so much smaller if all of what is burned came out as light.

Scientists have found that only three per cent. of the gas flame gives out light. The rest is heat. What a waste! Some of our boy Comrades should invent a way of using it to better advantage. Perhaps one of them will. If he does, he will become rich, and he will help us to be less poor.

You probably say, "But electricity is much better, isn't it?" Yes, it is, but not a whole lot. These same scientists tell us that only ten per cent. of the current burned in a bulb furnishes light. The rest is heat, which we do not really care for at that time.

Perhaps you add, "But how about the sun?" Now I wonder if any of you happen to have been out in the sun some of these hot days, say about noon. That is when the light is strongest, anyway. Perhaps you noticed that there was some heat in the light! The scientific folks say that only thirty-five per cent. of the "sunlight" is light; the rest is heat. I am sure we should be willing to have the proportion a little larger in favor of the light on a frizzling summer day. That is the reason why we like daylight saving, I suppose.

About this time you will begin to wonder if there is any perfect light. There certainly is, and I imagine many of you have seen one this summer. I have. It is owned by a little creature who does not seem to have very much use for it. He is the firefly. What he gives out is one hundred per cent. light. It is the only perfect light known. Catch one and you will be surprised to find when you get him in your hand that he is not even warm. Light without heat—what men have always wanted!

Unfortunately we cannot get them in large enough quantities to light our houses. I remember as a boy catching a lot of them and putting them in a bottle the way we did with phosphorus, but it was not a very useful pocket lamp.

And now just a word about this perfect light. Perhaps you have heard people say it is phosphorus. It isn't. There are certain cells in their bodies which form a peculiar substance. When this comes in contact with the oxygen they take in, a rapid combustion takes place which makes the perfect light that shines through their transparent bodies. If anyone could ever find the real secret of it we could light our homes and our streets with a perfect light. Strange, isn't it, that God has given this wonderful secret to one of his little creatures like a firefly?

Comradely yours,

Mr Alden

Dr. Herring — a Friend

By Clarence A. Vincent, D.D.

Twenty-eight years ago I met Hubert C. Herring on a dock in Philadelphia. We crossed the ocean on the same ship and toured England and Scotland together on our bicycles. From that time until now we have been friends and have shared each other's confidences. Nearly every year we have spent a few days or hours together and he and Mrs. Herring were to visit us on our farm one week from the day of the accident.

Dr. Herring was passing through a critical experience at the time of our visit to England. The newer views of Josiah Strong and Washington Gladden were stirring the thought of many ministers and some laymen. Dr. Herring was profoundly disturbed by them. He responded to these facts and appeals. His ecclesiastical relationships were extremely conservative and hostile to the newer applications of the Gospel. This irritated him. He was critical of the Church and rebelled against his fetters. He was reading everything that a then trusted teacher of the Middle West was writing. I was impressed with the honesty of my new acquaintance. He would follow the truth wherever it led, even if he broke with the Church and went into special social service work. It was my privilege to suggest to him that he ought to enter the Congregational fellowship, where he would find freedom. This he did later and has often expressed to me, when referring to those days, the freedom and happy days which he found with us.

During these years of intimacy I have never found him actuated by selfish motives. When he was invited to take the secretaryship of the Home Missionary Society and when it seemed likely he would be asked to take the position which he has so wisely filled in recent years, the question he asked was, "Does it mean larger service? If it does, then I must be willing to take whatever of sacrifice it brings to me." He has given himself in that spirit to every task.

Secretaries have their temptations. Power breeds pride and self-confidence. It seemed to me that Dr. Herring, while confident of strength, as every person must be who would accomplish large things, kept a real humility and teachableness of spirit. At the close of the meeting of "The Committee of One Hundred," following the International Council, he asked me, "Tell me the weak places in the Council and what the National Council at Los Angeles ought to be?" I answered him, "This is not the time to criticize. It has been a splendid meeting. You go home and get rested and then in August come up to the farm and I will give you the most careful criticisms and suggestions I can make." He and his beloved wife were coming to New Hampshire a few days earlier, but at the last moment deferred their schedule to go to Chilmark.

There was a boyishness in him, a sympathy with his friends when they needed him, a frankness and sincerity that tied him to us with indissoluble ties. He loved his Lord and had a vital experience of the Spirit's presence in his own life and work. We who knew him intimately knew how real he was, and is. We can enter in some measure into the sorrow, as we have into the affection, of his family, in this tragic hour. We cannot advise with him about Councils, nor he with us about our concerns, but we can live in the memories and hopes of a friendship rooted in the experiences and hopes of the Gospel.

You who would serve the Master, serve the Master's own.. We call for the union of all who love in the cause of all who suffer.—R. J. Campbell.

A Western Pastor's Tribute

In the Northwest, to which Dr. Herring frequently came, he was honored, trusted and beloved. We fully appreciated the remarkable combination of qualities that fitted him so admirably for his responsible and difficult post: his sanity, breadth, power of adaptation to changing situations and diverse temperaments, tenacity of purpose with openness of mind, hopefulness, courage, self-control, patience, humility, unselfishness, interest in all sorts and kinds of men, sympathy that was a real feeling for and with others, genius for friendship, grasp of fundamental truth, spiritual insight and foresight, deep religiousness of soul instinct with devotion to Christ, and sureness of faith in the church as a necessary agent of the advancing kingdom—all this, along with great capacity for work, strong administrative ability, commanding utterance, and exceeding winsomeness of manner.

Always in his visitations he brought wisdom and cheer. The title of Barnabas in either translation suited him—he was son of exhortation and son of consolation. His eloquent address, signally characterized by loftiness of range and spiritual earnestness, made but a few weeks since before the State Conference of Minnesota, will now be remembered and cherished by those who heard it as an impressive apostolic benediction and as a compelling farewell plea for a new consecration.

University of California recently presented in its celebrated Greek Theater, "Miriam—the Sister of Moses." The Missionary Education Movement, which serves all denominations, has already a number of pageants for teaching Missions. The American Bible Society has employed Mr. Percy Mackaye to prepare a pageant on the general theme of the Bible in National Life, for use in all of the Protestant churches of America on Bible Sunday, Nov. 28. The Federated Council of Churches has joined with the American Bible Society in the effort to have this drama presented in every Protestant Church of America this year.

The World Sunday School Association has announced that one of the significant features of its Convention at Tokio, in October, will be a series of noteworthy pageants participated in by both English and native people, under the direction of H. Augustine Smith of Boston University.

Mr. Percy Burrell, who has been making a survey of the development of pageants in the churches of America under the auspices of the Interchurch World Movement, announced that last year the foregoing church pageants were witnessed by approximately 1,300,000 people and that nearly 20,000 people participated in the pageants. There is no record of probably hundreds of other noteworthy plays and pageants given under religious auspices during the past year.

It is significant that the Drama League of America, an organization independent of any church, has during the past year offered three prizes amounting to $850 for the three best religious plays, to be submitted in competition, has created a permanent committee on religious drama, has appointed a sub-committee on the church and Sunday school, and has opened a religious drama department as a regular feature of its monthly publication, "The Drama."

The nation-wide interest in the use of drama and pageants as instruments of religious culture is indicated by the foregoing survey.

MAINE

Mr. Beach Leaves Millinocket

Rev. D. N. Beach, Jr., youngest son of President Beach of Bangor Theological Seminary, recently resigned from MILLINOCKET. He has preached in that town since July, 1919, and resigns to accept a call to First, Guilford, Ct. One of the chief reasons for Mr. Beach's leaving Maine is that he wishes to continue his preparation for the foreign mission field and this will give him opportunity to study at the Yale Mission School of which his uncle, Prof. Harlan P. Beach, is head.

Mr. Beach was graduated from Yale in 1916. He entered Bangor Seminary and was studying there when war service called him to France where he served with the Y. M. C. A. Upon his return he served as "Y" secretary at the University of Maine. He took the place at Maine of his brother, Rev. J. W. Beach, now in Near East work. He and his brother, Joseph, were ordained in the fall of 1918.

Mr. Pierce Leaves Second, Dorchester

The supreme challenge of a new pastorate never comes to a minister who goes to a field of labor similar to the one he is leaving even though it be much larger. The friends of Rev. Jason Noble Pierce are eager with him and for him as he goes from a strong, conservative, historic New England church in a residential community to a church amid the swirling waters of the National capital. He succeeded in SECOND, DORCHESTER, one of Boston's ecclesiastical bulwarks. Can he attain equal success in First, Washington, a field so different and which many have found exacting and baffling? It is a spiritual adventure indeed but that dauntless spirit which was upon him on the battlefields of France is still regnant in his soul. The greater the difficulties and dangers, the better he will do.

What he will do, how he will work, no one knows. Some things, however, are certain. He will not be content to be a preacher to a procession of sight-seeing visitors. He will build up a rich church life. Neither will he be content simply to feed his own flock, but will go into the highways and byways and compel them to come in. His will be a local ministry. It will also be a ministry at large. That this may reasonably be expected of him appears from the following extract from the resolutions of the Council which dismissed him from the pastorate of Second, Dorchester.

> Finding in its pastor a man peculiarly endowed with the elements of leadership, vision, convictions, courage, executive ability and great strength, the church has faced the problems of this perplexing period with a dauntless spirit and wonderful success. The traditions of the past have not been ignored but have been adapted to the needs of the day. The pulpit has ever rung true to the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.
> The very large number of additions to the church, the outpouring of its gifts for our denominational needs and for a suffering humanity, the large congregations, morning and evening, in summer and winter, bear witness to the faithful, tireless efforts of the pastor and to the strength of his pulpit utterances. Sympathetic with those in sorrow, strong in his opposition to evil in all forms, he has shown himself a true follower of the Master.
> We cannot pass without mention of Mr. Pierce's heroic and blessed ministry as Senior Chaplain of the Second Division on the battlefront in France, the honors accorded him for it and the patriotic and generous willingness of the church to spare him for this service.

Dedicated to Soldiers in World War

MEMORIAL BAPTISMAL FONT

The memorial baptismal font dedicated to the four men of FIRST, MARLBOROUGH, who gave their lives overseas during the war, was designed by the pastor, Rev. B. Z. Stambaugh, and was executed in oak by Mr. I. Kirchmayer of Cambridge. The font is supported by four massive legs, on which are carved in low relief four soldiers, representing outstanding periods of heroic service rendered to the Christian Church: The Roman, who turned back the first invasion of Western Europe by the Huns and saved the Christian Church at the battle of Châlons, A. D. 451; the Knight of St. John of Jerusalem, a crusader of the twelfth century, who saved Christian civilization from the Turks; the Pilgrim, who preserved the freedom of the Christian faith and who laid the foundations of civil liberty in America; and the American soldier of the late war, who defended Christendom against both Huns and Turks, and who carried the Pilgrim ideal of liberty to a world victory.

The Union Church in Waban

A Community Church—affiliated with the Congregational churches, but having a membership drawn from nine different denominations—this is the Union Church in Waban.

In its history as in its activities it has been a genuine product of the community. Its development has been as natural and spontaneous as the growth of the village that is its home. The organization of the church in 1911, under the leadership of Dr. A. W. Archibald, was the outgrowth of some years of informal religious services. In the following year the new church was built and dedicated. Soon after, Rev. C. H. Cutler was installed as the first minister. The membership has increased from 86 to 213. Among those welcomed to the church fellowship at the last Easter Communion were Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Lutherans, Unitarians, Evangelical Unionists and Congregationalists. The officers of the church and teachers of the Sunday school are representative of this happy variety.

UNION CHURCH, WABAN, MASS.

The outstanding feature of this Union Church is its real unity. The life of the church expresses the needs and interests of the community. Hence it shows itself, not indeed in many "services," but in the spirit of neighborliness expressed in service. The Church School, in a village full of children, has grown from less than 50 to nearly 200. The Ladies' Circle has combined friendliness with good works. Its monthly church suppers are notable events in the village social life. The budget of home expenses and benevolences has increased from $1,000 to $7,000. As all church sittings are free, this income is provided by the Every Member Canvass, successfully conducted for the last five years by the men of the church, "as friends, as neighbors, and as members of a partnership in church affairs."

The church is a veritable community center. During the war, it was the busy headquarters of the Red Cross and of other war activities. It is still the meeting-place of the Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts. The church is open for use every day of the week. In the rapid growth of Waban, the Union Church has been a social center, "transforming newcomers into neighbors, and neighbors into old neighbors, with surprising quickness." F. W. C.

Center, Meriden, Lifts Pastor's Salary

CENTER, MERIDEN, has worshiped in the same building for 90 years continuously. The beautiful old colonial meeting house has recently been painted at an expense of $1,000 and the parsonage renovated at a cost of $1,500, all of which has been raised. The sum of $800 has been paid on the parish house debt. Center has gone over the top in the Pilgrim Fund, and a good sum has been raised for the Congregational World Movement. Rev. Clayton D. Boothby, minister of Center, has completed his first year as pastor and at a meeting of the Prudential Committee a vote of appreciation was extended to him for his able and efficient leadership, and his salary was increased $200.

NEW YORK

Greater New York Vacation Schools

The Vacation Bible Schools of the Metropolitan District, which includes, besides Greater New York, the churches in the northern part of New Jersey closed their most successful season on Aug. 6, after a session of five weeks. The total enrollment of the 160 schools in this district was approximately 30,000 children, and the cost averaged about $1 per child for the 25 days. The thank-offering of the New York schools this year, an offering presented by the children and collected each day, will this year be devoted half to the missionary work of the Daily Vacation Bible School Association and half to the starving children of Europe. The cup for the best all-round school was won by the Morningside Presbyterian Church, New York City, and the banner for the best school of Brooklyn and Queens, by FLATBUSH, BROOKLYN, whose school has just ended its seventh year.

The enrollment at Flatbush this year was 181, with an average attendance of 86, and an offering of $76.02 was presented to the general fund. The conspicuous success of this school disproves the general impression that the Vacation Bible Schools are only intended for the poorer sections of the large cities. The Flatbush Church, situated in one of the finest residential suburbs of Brooklyn, carries on this school year after year, the children of its own Church School mingling with the children of all nationalities to be found on the outskirts of the district. The enrollment this year included Austrian, Bohemian, French, Russian, German, Irish, Italian, Jewish, Mexican and Norwegian, besides English and American boys and girls. A full half-hour each day is given up to Bible study and stories and a large amount of Bible memorizing done, both of separate verses and of the more familiar psalms. The time thus given the Bible work provides more actual hours of study than is given during the whole of the ordinary Sunday school year and would seem to be an effective way of continuing the work of the church school during the vacation period. So much of the material for the industrial work, which includes sewing and basketry for the girls, carpentry, chair caning, hammock making, and scroll saw work for the boys, can usually be solicited from members of the congregation and so much volunteer help secured for the individual classes in these simple arts, that almost any church may safely launch a vacation school with a pretty certain hope of success.

The director for the Metropolitan District is Rev. W. M. Howlett and the supervisor of the Brooklyn schools is Rev. E. B. MacDonald.

OHIO

Mr. Curtis Leaves North, Columbus

Changes have been making rapidly in Columbus and community. Rev. P. L. Curtis is leaving NORTH to take work with the Garrettsville Community church in the northern part of the state, near his old home. Mr. Curtis has had a happy pastorate at North and has been able to bring the church from a much discouraged condition to a condition of fine enthusiasm, with a growing interest in all that a church should stand for and with increasing concern for denominational affairs locally, state wide and world wide. A large number of subscribers to The Congregationalist have been secured. A cumbersome debt has been paid off. The pastor's salary was increased $200 during the past year. The church now has a building fund of $1,500, which will be used in remodeling the building as soon as material becomes less expensive.

Many families have been brought to the church through the labors of pastor and people, and Mr. and Mrs. Curtis and family not only carry with them the affection and esteem of the congregation but leave behind a company of men and women who will continue to support the church enthusiastically and who will faithfully follow the new pastor when he comes. The church faces a new pastorate with fervor, though they cannot soon forget the one who is just leaving.

Sylvania Pushes Forward

The members of SYLVANIA, although without a pastor since last November, have completely overhauled their building from roof to cellar, and have modernized their ten-room parsonage. All expenses are paid. Sylvania has a membership of 125, with a Sunday school of 150.

IOWA

The Sioux City Churches

Rev. C. E. Tower is rounding out six years of faithful and fruitful ministry with FIRST, SIOUX CITY. This period has seen the destruction of the old building by fire and the erection of a much larger and better equipped church in its stead. The new church is more central in its location and is moving forward with strong and steady purpose to make its ministry worth while to the life of the city and the building of the Kingdom. Pastor and people share in this larger vision and desire to be of service. Mr. Tower is "on the job" all summer. He preaches in his own pulpit each Sunday morning in August and gets his vacation by hard work on his farm six miles east of the city during the week.

Under the leadership of Rev. Joseph Steele, MAYFLOWER is pouring its energies into an effort to make real its dream of a new church in a commanding location in the city. The site has been purchased and the new church has reached the blue print stage. Just as soon as financial conditions warrant it, the building project will be pushed forward with all possible speed.

commodious parsonage which has been under construction this year. Nothing but unyielding perseverance and granite Scotch grit could have achieved this fine result in the face of the year's difficulties. The house is one of the finest in North Riverside. On a recent Sunday afternoon the pastors of First and Mayflower churches together with their wives called at the new parsonage and offered their congratulations on this splendid achievement.

Iowa Pastor and Wife Support Missionaries

Rev. and Mrs. W. G. Ramsay of Ottumwa and Miss Colby of Geneseo, Ill., sister of Mrs. Ramsay, have assumed the full financial support of Drs. H. C. and Florence P. Gebhart, recently appointed and commissioned missionaries of the American Board. Dr. Gebhart is a native of Illinois and was graduated from Knox College in 1911, and from Rush Medical College in 1916. During the war he was in overseas service for nearly two years, as a member of the Medical Department of the U. S. Navy. Mrs. Gebhart was born in Oak Park, Ill. She took special training in hygiene and physical education at Wellesley College and taught physical training in Pratt Institute. She was graduated from the University of Chicago in 1914, and from Rush Medical College in 1917. They were married in Oak Park in 1917.

These choice young people, so well equipped for foreign missionary service, were commissioned in Shawmut Church, Boston, July 4, during the meeting of the International Council. Rev. W. E. Barton of Oak Park, pastor of the candidates, preached the sermon and offered the prayer of consecration. Mr. and Mrs. Ramsay and Miss Colby were present and Mr. Ramsay shared in the service. Rev. Enoch Bell presented the Commission of the American Board. Dr. and Mrs. Gebhart expect to sail about Aug. 20, for Foochow, China Mission, where they will be stationed.

KANSAS

Reorganization of a Pioneer Church

Kansas has within her borders a church that boasts the ripe old age of 63 years—the "Beecher Bible and Rifle Church" of WABAUNSEE. Early in the fall of 1855 steps were taken in New Haven, Ct., to organize a company of Free State men to go to the territory of Kansas to help make a Free State of that territory. The Company when finally organized was equipped by Henry Ward Beecher's church with 25 Bibles and 25 Sharp's rifles with which to guard their bodies and souls and conquer the territory for God and freedom. It was out of this venture that the church at Wabaunsee was organized. For many years the church has had a useful and honored ministry to the community and the state. It boasted some names that have laid the foundations of the state: Col. C. B. Lines, Amos A. Cottrell, John H. Gould and many others. Its membership, though always modest in numbers, being only 28 at the beginning, has always been distinguished for patriotism and sturdy Christian character. At the end of 50 years 481 members had been, at one time or another, connected with the church. For some years the church has existed as an honored memory, but with no regular services or active ministry.

A thousand separate joys

Each serving dish of Puffed Grains contains a thousand separate joys.

Each grain is a bubble, thin and flimsy, puffed to eight times normal size.

A hundred million steam explosions have occurred in each, blasting every food cell.

The airy globules are crisp and toasted. They taste like nutmeats puffed. The morsels seem like fairy foods, almost too good to eat.

Yet these are the utmost in scientific foods. Two are whole grains, with every food cell fitted to digest. They are the foods that children like best, and the best foods they can get.

Serve with cream and sugar. Mix with your berries. Float in every bowl of milk. Crisp and douse with melted butter for hungry children in the afternoon.

They are nothing but grain foods. The nutty flavor comes from toasting. The flimsy texture comes from steam explosions. The delights are all due to scientific methods.

Serve morning, noon and night in summer, between meals and at bedtime. The more children eat the better. What other food compares with whole grains puffed?

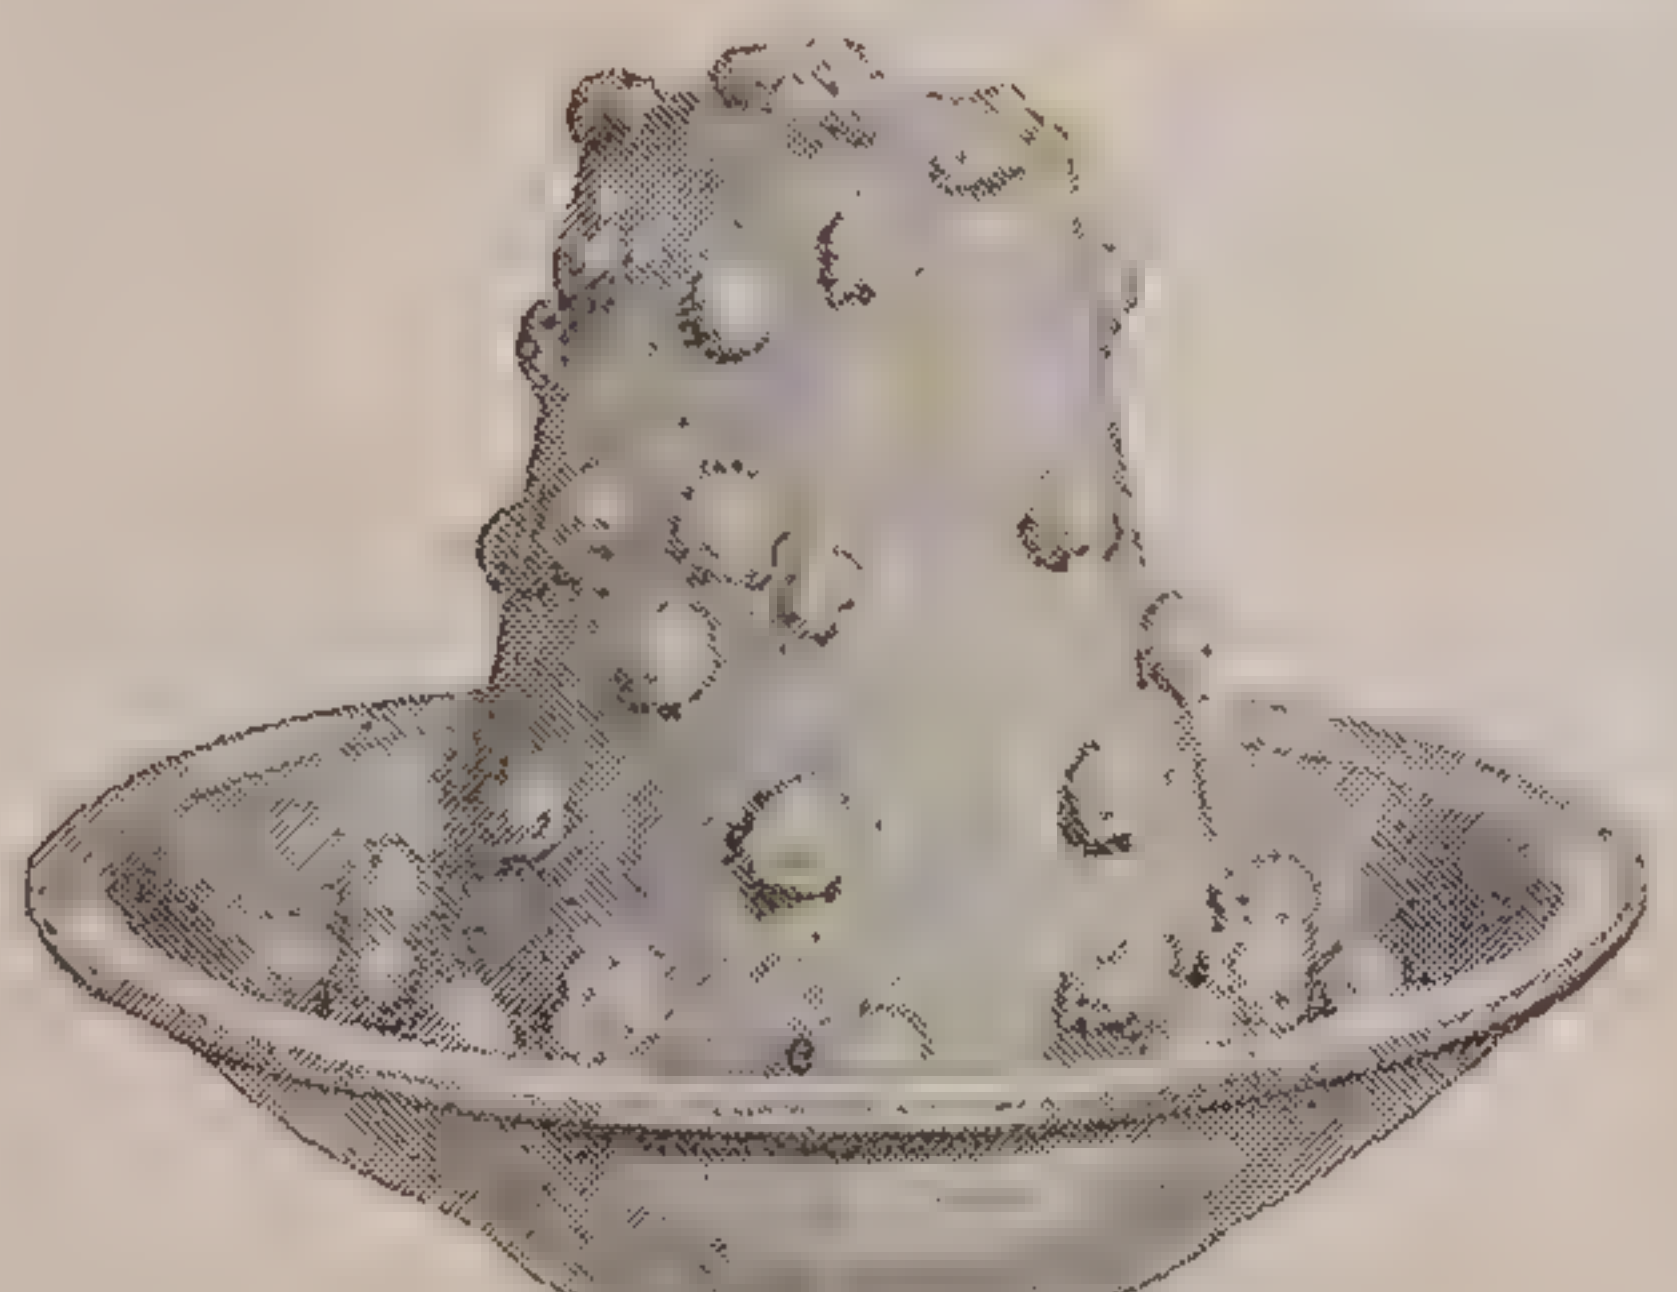
Also Puffed Rice Pancake Flour



On ice cream

Use Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs like nut meats on ice cream. They are nut-like, yet so flimsy that they almost melt away.

The new pancakes

Now we have Puffed Rice Pancake Flour, self-raising, mixed with ground Puffed Rice. The Puffed Rice flour tastes like nut-flour, and it makes the pancakes fluffy. This new mixture makes the finest pancakes that you ever tasted. Try it.

A suggestion had been made that the church be cared for as a memorial and a sort of museum of ecclesiastical antiquities! On July 4, however, Supt. J. B. Gonzales visited the church and community and as a result of his enthusiasm and earnestness the church met for reorganization. Mr. Ernest Cottrell, a descendant of the original colonists, was chosen Sunday school superintendent, and the church is now looking for a pastor to lead them in worship as of old. At the reorganization, 40 were present for the Sunday school and 51 for the church service. Once more, as in former days, the Wabaunsee Beecher Bible and Rifle Church will:

> "Give the Sabbath of the wilds
> The music of her bells."

Russell Church Sends Missionary to Africa

Russell, Rev. K. K. Clark, pastor, though somewhat out of the geographical reach of conferences and associations, has not ceased to carry on its work with vigor and enthusiasm. In addition to oversubscribing its quota to the Congregational World Movement, it has maintained a consistent loyalty to the State Conference and its program. Recently a young woman has gone from the church to be a missionary in Africa. Mr. Clark has done faithful and painstaking work in his church.

MONTANA

Regret Loss of Rev. Walter North

The entire city of Billings as well as First Church deeply regrets to lose Rev. Walter North who begins his work with Warren Ave., Chicago, Sept. 1. Mr. North's influence has been state-wide and his nine years with the church have abounded in permanent values. He leaves a united and growing organization.

Splendid Progress of Great Falls Church

Rev. D. R. MacHatton two years ago found Great Falls with only half a hundred members. By masterly leadership he has increased the number till the regular congregation is now from five to six hundred.

Organize Sunday School in Country District

On a recent trip in Powder River County, Rev. E. H. Johnson, assistant superintendent, organized a Sunday school with an initial membership of 23. Nineteen of these children had never before been in a Sunday school or religious service of any kind. This great county, almost 100 miles away from any railroad, has been assigned to the C. H. M. S. by the Montana survey and an aggressive program is being planned to meet its great need.

Terminate Federation at Helena

After two years' trial, the federation of the Disciples and Congregational churches of Helena was terminated by the vote of a small majority of the membership of the former church. The Congregational group was willing and even eager to continue the federation. With a well-equipped building, a well-organized church school, and a united membership, it is now seeking a pastor. Rev. W. G. Lockwood of Butte has supplied the pulpit recently. On July 25 Sec. F. L. Moore visited the church and held a conference with the members.

Open Air Services at Butte and Helena

A new plan for Sunday services has been tried recently and is growing in popular favor. It involves transporting the entire membership of church and Sunday school to the banks of some stream or into the cool of a mountain canyon. There the regular service of worship and song is held. Something may be lost as to the orderliness of the service but this loss is more than compensated for by the increased attendance and the spirit of good fellowship that prevails. The plan has demonstrated that the spirit of reverence is not lost in God's out of doors. Both Helena and Butte feel so encouraged by the experiment that they plan to repeat this type of service.
